Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE NO. 678 BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1867 VOL. XXVII No. 1

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beside a Streamlet.

Beside a streamlet in the vale
Two willows green are springing;
And on a spray a nightingale
Sits singing, ever singing.

Oh nightingale, teach me to sing
A song as rich as tender!
Then I will twine gold like a ring
About thy feet so slender!

"For me the heart's free-born voice,
You can no fetters golden!
To sing in solitude my choice,
Unheard and unbeholden."

When a lover comes with moan and wail
When love hath bound above thee
Thine a sigh to wail for ring and chain,
And sickening heart to love thee!

"To me, as sky its joys were by
Of freedom once deflowered
Brown nightingale until I as and die
In covert green embowered."

Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

VII

MUSIC IN BONN DURING THE LAST CENTURY AND THE YOUTH OF BEETHOVEN.

These important events, now for the first time (partly) brought to light, fall within this early period of Beethoven's boyhood: a journey to Holland (1781), where the playing of the boy to ten excited admiration; the publication of his first compositions (Variations and three Sonatas) in the years 1782 and 1783; and finally his formal appointment, although without salary, as second court organist, in the Spring of 1784, that is to say at the age of 13, by way of assisting Neefe, whom he was very much occupied, and whose place he had already often taken since 1782.

The stirring artistic and theatrical life, which Grossmann's company had brought to Bonn, was interrupted for a time through the death of Max Frederick (April 1784); but the interruption, at least with regard to music, did not last long. The new Elector, Maximilian Francis, brother of the Empress, Joseph II, the founder of the older Bonn University, brought with him the lively interest in the art which was hereditary in the Hapsburg family. He himself sang and played of the music. Soon after entering upon his reign he had detailed reports brought to him upon all branches of the administration; those upon the court music are fortunately preserved in full. They contain a personal mention of all the appointed musicians, as well as a brief characterization of their behavior and performances. Thus of Beethoven's father, then 44 years old, it says: "He has an entirely dry voice, has been long in service, of tolerable conduct and married;" undoubtedly he was quite useless, and enjoyed but distinction. Of our thirteen years old LUDWIG BETHOVEN (for so they pronounced and wrote the name for the most part) it then says: "Is of good capacity, still young, of good quiet behavior and poor." The unnamed author of the report (perhaps Count Salm-Reifferscheid) was favorable to him and wished to bring him fully into Neefe's place, whom they would gladly have got rid of on account of his "Calvinistic" faith. This attempt failed; but the young Beethoven now received 150 florins salary as second court organist.

Of the other prominent members, Mattioli was at that time dismissed on account of debts and Joseph Reicha engaged as Concertmeister in his place. Max Francis was constantly on the lookout for the acquisition of new talent, and his Capelle a few years later was one of the most excellent in Germany.

Beethoven's organ duties were not so tedious, that they did not leave him time to pursue his studies. Besides Neefe's instruction he received for a while lessons on the Violin from Franz Ries, and in 1785 composed three piano Quartets, which were only published after his death. At the same time he had now and then opportunities to hear operas of Gluck, Sarti and Grétry given by travelling companies; among others, in 1785, a French troupe played two months in Bonn. The need of a more thorough instruction for Beethoven being now felt, means were provided (we do not know exactly how) for undertaking a journey in the Spring of 1787 to Vienna, where he played before Mozart and received some lessons from him. The illness of his mother and very likely lack of means also, compelled him to return earlier than he might have wished. A letter from the young man written soon after the death of his mother, which occurred on the 17th of July following, to Dr. Schaden in Augsburg, gives a glimpse into the melancholy condition and the hopeless mood in which he then found himself in those family joys, so ready entertainment without true confidence in human powers, and moreover afraid of getting well himself, every thing conspired to weigh him down. His intercourse with those who were in a condition to lift him up, outwardly as well as inwardly, came, as Thayer convincingly shows, only after this period of his life.

It cannot have been long after, when Beethoven, now about 17 years old, was engaged as music teacher for the daughter and the youngest son of Frau von Breuning, the widow of the Councillor von Breuning who lost his life at the burning of the palace in 1777. She lived then, with her four children, at the house of her brother, the master of the Cathedral school Abraham Kerich at No. 175 on the Münsterplatz. The young music teacher soon became an intimate and esteemed friend of the household, while he placed the gifts of his uncommon talent at their service, on his own part also received all sorts of stimulus in that highly cultivated circle. Here for the first time was the splendid, unselfish[?] genius of the young man recognized; here too for the first time his deep and noble nature received its finer development and expression. Here he also found an offset to the sad impressions of his home, and a compensation for the recent loss of his own mother in the affectionate attachment of the lady of the house.

About this time the young Count Waldstein, of a family settled in Bohemia, had come to Bonn to enter upon his noviciate year as knight of the German Order under Max Francis, the Grand Master of the Order; he was solemnly knighted at the court chapel on the 17th of June, 1788. His great interest for music soon brought him and Beethoven together; he often visited him in his modest chamber in the Wenzelgasse; he became his warmest protector, and one may say, was the first to perceive the full compass of his talent and predict his future.

While Beethoven's relations to the outward world thus gradually shaped themselves better and his talent began to give him a social position, which he fully could only gain in the following years, a new artistic impulse through the foundation of a permanent Electoral National Theatre in the year 1789. Remarkable actors and singers, like Lux, Spitzeder, Steiger, Renomitz, the sisters Kalbola and the sisters Willmann and others. The orchestra also was strengthened by drawing in of new and excellent forces. Among them the two cousins Andreas and Bernhard Romberg (appointed 1790); held the first rank; next to them stood as a highly esteemed artist Franz Ries, who during Reicha's retirement as long from gout frequently supplied his place as Director; Anton Reicha, a nephew of the Director, of no mean talent as composer; Andreas Perner, an excellent violinist, who died at an early age in 1791; and especially that splendid Octet of wind instruments, which gave such delight a few years afterward in Mergentheim, and for which Beethoven had already composed something while in Bonn. It consisted of the oboists Liebisch and J. Welsch, the clarinettists Meuser and Pachmeyer, the hornists Nic. Simrock and Bamberger, and the fagottists Zillicken and G. Welsch. In this orchestra Ludwig van Beethoven played the viola (Bratsche) and in this way had the opportunity for four years, through his own actual participation, of getting acquainted with the best operas of the time, particularly those of the German school (Mozart, Dittersdorf, Benda, Schuster, &c.) and of thoroughly apprehending the effects of the orchestra, the requirements of dramatic music. His reverence for Mozart, whose Figaro, Don Juan and Seraglio (the Zauberflöte was not yet composed) stood upon the Bonn repertoire, was then firmly grounded for his whole life.

At the same time the respect which he enjoyed through his piano and organ playing, through his masterly gift for improvising (phantasiren); through his careful delivery, the like of which had not before been heard, in the circle of artists, rose continually higher. "All are all ear when he plays," says a contemporary report upon the Bonn Capella by Junker, who had become acquainted with it in 1791, during its tour on the way to Mergentheim (the chief seat of the German Order). "This writer places him in decided contrast to the piano virtuosos of that time, distinguished for rapid execution (such as the Abbé Vogler, Sterkel, &c.) and calls his playing—more speaking, more significant, more expressive, in short, more for the heart." The same informant does not hesitate to praise the great modesty and reserve which distinguished young Beethoven when all sorts of flattering testimonials were pouring upon him.

Beethoven was also considerably active in Bonn as a composer; many of his youthful works have never yet been printed and are to be found in manuscript in the possession of Artaria, the bookseller in Vienna. Of many of the works afterwards published (such as the Trios, op. 1, the Trios, op. 3, &c.) Thayer makes it more than probable that they had their first design already in Bonn. Beethoven had set the music to a little ballet of Chivalry performed by the nobility of Bonn in the masquerade hall of the palace. But on the whole an acquaintance with those works of his which were already composed in Bonn warrants the assertion that Beethoven's peculiar stamp was slow and late in pronouncing itself fully; not one of them compares in fullness and [illegible] with the well known works even of the earlier years.

In the midst of this lovely development of the artist and the man occurs an important event in the history of his domestic relations. As his father more and more [illegible] there was fear that he would lose his place, the son petitioned (1789) that one half of his father's salary should accrue to him and the father be exempt from duty on half pay. This petition, doubtless through the powerful influence of Waldstein, was granted, and so the young man of nineteen became the responsible head of the family.

Thus lived Beethoven in Bonn, respected as an artist and loved as a man of only in a little circle within which he confined himself. The central point thereof consisted of the Breuning family, with the members of which (as also Wegeler) he cherished a firm friendship until his death. In this circle too his heart was for the first time seriously affected through a penchant toward two young friends of the house, Jeannette d'Honrath of Cologne and after her Fräulein von Westerholt. By his playing, and his teaching he came also in contact with the most distinguished persons and families of the city, like [illegible] with Count Westphal (who occupied the Fürstenberg house), the Countess Hatzfeld-Fraun von Hennewinkel, the Hofrath [illegible] and others. "These," says Thayer, "were happy years for him, years of an active intellectual, artistic and moral development."

The time came for departure. The little city of Bonn could not give him what was wanting to his complete development. It had to be a master of the first rank who should still further such a talent; only in grand proportions could he find the answers for his rich [illegible]. With the consent of the Elector it was arranged that Beethoven should with special support journey to Vienna, there to receive instruction from Haydn, who then passed for the first living composer and who had already become acquainted with the young man on his journey through Bonn. In the beginning of November 1792, about the same time that the French troops approached the Rhine, Beethoven started off; he went by way of Coblentz through Hessen, through the midst of the Hessian army, to Frankfort. From the 10th of November he was in Vienna, never to see his birthplace nor the Rhine again.

We add, following Thayer's example, the most important [illegible] about the further destinies of the court music at Bonn and the dissolution of the Electorate. Mainz was taken by the French; the theatre there was broken up and some members of it, among them [illegible], came across the [illegible] and were engaged in Bonn. The approaching danger induced the Elector in [illegible] to remove to Münster, where a whole troupe followed him; but at Easter 1793, they all went back again to Bonn. At the time several noted members were called in; the favorite songstress Willmann, whose praises are sung in the Bonn Intelligenzblatt, took an engagement in Vienna. The Elector who used to spend some part of the summer in Godesberg had there a small theatre. In the most brilliant [illegible] took place in the summer of 1792 and every Tuesday there was a concert where, among others, the young Romberg brought himself out. Particularly brilliant was a performance of the Kinderfeste in the Palestrina and at [illegible] in June 1793, under the direction of Neefe and F. Ries.

And so the musical performances went on through the winter of 1793–94 again in Bonn. But these were the last good days of the Court Music. Already in the first months of 1794 Max Franz, considering the seriousness of the times and his threatened condition, conceived the plan of reducing the number of the musicians and putting down their pay; an order of a new organization is preserved. Meanwhile the danger grew; the French troops were advancing nearer; in September 1794 Max Franz abandoned the [illegible], on the 6th of October [illegible] marched into Bonn. And now the company of actors and musicians dispersed of itself; some of them remained in private positions, nominally still dependent on the Elector in Bonn; others took engagements in other places. The two Rombergs had already at Easter gone to Hamburg. The well-deserving Neefe as Max Franz did not allow him to accept an engagement so long as he was court organist, had to endure two years of pinching poverty until he found employment in 1796 in Dessau; there he died in 1798. But the Elector, who hoped at least to be able to return to his episcopal seat at Münster, already drew up a scheme for a prospective reduction of his court music establishment. This is preserved in his own handwriting. It contains the names of the musicians known to us, with brief remarks, merely settling the point of their discharge. Among those whom the Elector wished to retain in his service we find the [illegible] Reicha and Franz Ries. At Beethoven's name is the remark: "Remains in Vienna without salary, until he shall be recalled."

Thus ended with the Electorate a period of high bloom for Music and Art in Bonn.

Madame Schumann and her London Critics.

(From the London [illegible])

We are sorry to find that some remarks of ours, not about Mme. Schumann's playing, but about the opinions expressed with regard to it by those of our contemporaries, have been misunderstood. We have often been troubled with misgivings as to the direct value of musical criticism, even in those cases when it so happens that the critic understands what he is criticising. It possesses this indirect value undoubtedly—that it increases the general interest taken by the public in musical affairs. But take no matter what musical critique, strike out from it all the anecdotes, biographical details, reflections on the mutability, perversity, or on the general [illegible] of public [illegible], some expression of opinion, perhaps, on the merit or demerit of a composition may at last be found; and then it is often to be a previous opposition to some expression of opinion equally entitled to be heard. The same thing we admit takes place not only in politics (where [illegible] is part of the game) but also in literature and painting. Scientific critics, too, will disagree; but we cannot perceive any of the disputes when always the [illegible] of one [illegible] the other to be in the wrong, which in artistic matters cannot, of course, be done. A critic may by superior cultivation and eloquence persuade his readers to trust him and to [illegible] those who do not agree with him, but [illegible] it does not follow that because he is an able advocate he must also be a good judge. [illegible] lack of agreement of the [illegible] of which Mr. Hullah speaks in his very [illegible] book [illegible] to be found in [illegible] the various and contradictory opinions expressed by men having authority on the subject of Mme. Schumann's playing.

Unfortunately however we did what one or more of the three critics cited in illustration of our remarks seem also have done—we made a blunder. Instead of representing the Daily News as crying "Optime," the Times—"Bene," and the Athenaeum—"Pessime," as we ought to have done, we put the Times in the place of the Daily News and the Daily News in the place of the Times. We are now assured that if we "look at the [illegible] in the Daily News of Feb. 5 and 10 we shall at once perceive all that contradiction and misstatement" are here made; but our confusion is only increased when [illegible]; but by referring to the Daily News of the 10th we might have avoided an error committed in the Illustrated Times of the 17th.

It, of course, says that nothing in our argument is better seen if the Times had disagreed with the Daily News or the Daily News that disagreed with the Times; and we are perfectly correct in saying that both disagreed with the Athenaeum. And now, that there may be no further "confusion" and "misstatement" on this matter, we subjoin extracts, fairly and exactly made from the notices of Mme. Schumann's first performance, as given respectively by the Daily News, the Times, and the Athenaeum.

"As the principal feature of the evening," says the Daily News critic, "we must first speak of the performance of Mme. Schumann, whose pianoforte playing is [illegible] of the highest order of intellectual interpretative art, in which the personality of the player and the exhibition of [illegible] are [illegible] subservient [illegible]" "with the sentiment of the composer and the realisation of his intentions [illegible] one of the most [illegible] works of the [illegible] great order of [illegible] playing. [illegible] style [illegible] 'a thorough perception of the composer's [illegible] was in every [illegible] performance [illegible] of the artist's genius and the artist's reputation."

"The concert on Monday [illegible]," says the Times, "[illegible] Mme. Schumann made her first appearance in London since 1856. The celebrated pianist was welcomed [illegible] with the enthusiasm [illegible] St. James's Hall in every part. The extraordinary energy with which the great Beethoven's romantic and beautiful sonata in D minor, Op. 31 [illegible] and she was twice unanimously called for at the end

The [illegible], played to perfection, brought the concert worthily to a conclusion, and [illegible] another hearty "ovation" for Mme. Schumann, who can scarcely fail to have been gratified by such frank and lively marks of sympathy on the part of her many friends and admirers in England."

"The opinion of this lady has yet to be recorded," says the Athenæum critic. "Without question she is a great musician and understands thoroughly what she undertakes to do; but we find her reading frequently overdone, under pretext of freedom, and [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. The [illegible] an [illegible] to be played with [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] the grace of poetry [illegible] when the player [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] towards an agitated display of finger and wrist, and then Mme. Schumann's playing on Monday was not, to our thinking, [illegible] [illegible] her [illegible] will [illegible] the [illegible] and her habit of [illegible] [illegible] show of force. This [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for the sake of every [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] whose [illegible] [illegible] and the more [illegible] because there [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of an engagement of [illegible] [illegible], a good wife, and [illegible] mother."

[illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of polysyllables used by the Daily News critic the [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] of the [illegible] by the Times critic, and the [illegible] [illegible] Mme. Schumann's [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible]. But it [illegible] that neither the Daily News [illegible] or the Athenæum [illegible] [illegible] wrong. The former [illegible] the [illegible] in which the [illegible] of the player and the [illegible] of mechanical dexterity [illegible], &c. while the latter [illegible] a tendency towards "an agitated display of finger and wrist, and show." The former tells us [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that Mme. Schumann's playing belongs to the highest order [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] art" while the latter [illegible] [illegible] "frequently overdone, under pretext of freedom," and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] poetry." It [illegible] [illegible] "show of force" (which is [illegible] likely to impress an audience [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]) and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mme. Schumann's [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of reputation but of celebrity, and the Athenæum need not have called her "a good wife and a devoted mother."

Bach's Works.

(From "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Life and Writings," [illegible] from the German of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], as published by the Leading [illegible].)

It is easy to understand that the various forms which Bach [illegible] and his compositions [illegible] of great [illegible] in their [illegible] [illegible], as well as skill and facility in [illegible] [illegible]. All the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Bach's wonderful [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a great number of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. As the [illegible] [illegible] he could [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the various combinations [illegible] [illegible] and he could [illegible] whole passages [illegible] [illegible] finger and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. He [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible]. During the period of Bach's highest artistic perfection he [illegible] [illegible] in the basis for the taste of his own. He [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] to fashion in former [illegible] he was now above pandering to it forever and worked by strict conception and his own good taste. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of writing for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Some of his works were undoubtedly written for outside occasions, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the tastes of the hour. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] lasting. Where truth and beauty show themselves so pure and clear as in Bach's music, the feeling for that [illegible] will never cease. "When no one else"—so says one of his biographers—"has written, which I [illegible] [illegible] all other composers, and which possess the greatest abundance of the most original ideas, as well as the most freely spirit, [illegible] professional and non-professional connoisseurs. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] a real genius or not." The most fruitful imagination, the most [illegible] [illegible] the most [illegible] and acute criticism in the [illegible] [illegible] of that which never [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the most cultivated [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], the greatest [illegible] the proper appreciation of the best [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the works [illegible] true genius, and [illegible] [illegible] in Bach. He who doubts the [illegible] of Bach's works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. They [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] the true [illegible] in flower [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

It is more [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There was [illegible] [illegible] period—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—in which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and proper acknowledgment [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible].

[illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] and subsequent [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] are perhaps [illegible] [illegible]. It [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], particularly on the other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of feeling, looking, and [illegible]. During this movement all [illegible] [illegible] was overthrown [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible]. A new building was to be [illegible] [illegible] German [illegible] Vogler, Bach, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the modern [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] an aesthetic feeling [illegible] [illegible] of art.

No wonder, then, that the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] new [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] which it had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This led to a revival of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] of Bach.

Death of Sir George Smart.

That [illegible] respected professor Sir George Smart, died on Saturday morning at his residence, No. 11 Bedford Square, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. He was born in London in May 1776, and for more than half a century was at the head of the musical profession [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] York, Liverpool, Manchester, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Sir George Smart was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] 1784 [illegible] [illegible]. He was conductor of the Festival in Westminster Abbey in 1834. He [illegible] [illegible] at the coronation of William IV. and Queen Victoria, and was [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Chapel Royal, St. James's, for many years, a post now [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible]. Sir George was one of the original members of the Philharmonic Society in 1813, and the City Concerts in 1818. In [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and composer [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of Manchester. In 1836, Sir George Smart, at the Liverpool Festival, [illegible] [illegible] the

It was the Duke of Richmond, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who knighted Sir George in 1811 at Dublin. Sir George was the musical director at Covent Garden Theatre in the Kemble days, when he went to Germany to engage Weber to produce Oberon. The [illegible] German composer died in the house of Sir George, then residing at 91, Great Portland Street, on the 5th of June 1826. To the mild beatitude of Joy succeeds now its jubilee,—jubilant we clasp the world to our breast; [illegible] all the air like the thunder of the cloud, like the roar of the sea, which in everlasting motion and [illegible] [illegible] quickens and sustain the earth for the joy of Man, to whom God gave it that he might be happy thereupon.

But it is not enough; the solution is not here. This we have in the fourth or Choral part. How wonderfully the transition from pure instrumental to vocal music is prepared! First a sort of shriek of despair from the orchestra; then a recitative, that almost speaks, from the double-basses and 'celli, uttering the soul's question and complaint. A wilder shriek (diminished seventh), and faint echoes of [illegible]. Then the [illegible] of the first movements are suggested; the basses answer: No, it will not do! The two middle movements, Scherzo and Adagio, were doubtless the most widely appreciated, as it is in the nature of those movements to be always. * *

ing with the premonitions of a marvellous transformation and new birth; it reminds one of the passage, "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now," &c.

Of course, after this sorrowful close, in which the orchestra rises above itself enough to utter the actual form and motive of the human utterance to which it is tending, there is a momentary reaction, or rather relapse into the stormy and chaotic mood again, (the diminished seventh,) with which the movement opened. [illegible] "Friends, no more of these mournful sounds, [illegible]" &c. [illegible]

[illegible]

And here we have the secret of the success of the [illegible] [illegible] of the vocal part of the performance. [illegible]

[illegible]

[After the third performance.—Inauguration of the Beethoven Statue, March 1, 1856,—without chorus.]

Mr. Zerrahn [illegible] [illegible] (Quasi [illegible]) [illegible] of the Ninth Symphony began, and the [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

This was the best ending if we could not have the whole; but how one longed for the solution of the problem of that first movement! True the celestial Adagio blots it; but it would have been so much better to have gone on, and let the double-bass in those recitatives wake a path for human voices and the great chorus of the "Hymn to Joy," the Brotherhood to all Mankind!

(After the fourth performance, March 26, 1859.)

Mr. Zerrahn had labored with all the devotion of soul and body, in the drilling of his orchestra to render this great work; and, as he came through the task so happily, he must have grown by it. It seems have added to his powers, moral and artistic. It was a victory to strengthen one through life. The orchestra did their part admirably; so that some slight flaw in a bass part here, or a trumpet there, could be small criticism, when, as a whole, the complicated and immensely difficult work came out so clear. And more than that, it was played with real fervor.

The fourth movement also opened clearly. The "Joy" tune, so plain and simple, yet so pregnant, was hummed over by the basses, and played round with fanciful and happy humor by the reeds, &c. Oh! images of gratuitous children frolicking in front of a festival procession, and then rang out with all the thrilling energy of the whole orchestra [illegible] ... more exciting lesson. The difficulty of course came when the great point was reached of human voices. It is not of the greatest of heroes to strike the magic blow at the right moment; that [illegible] ... recitatives and so broke the back of the ... the double-basses had done in their instrumental. Mr. [illegible] succeeded to a degree highly creditable to himself; it was fully adequate to the conception of Beethoven. Mr. Adams, tenor and Miss Twichell, contralto, added to their reputation with all intelligent and reasonable listeners.

(After the fifth performance, April 1, 1859.)

It is easy to pour out enthusiasm and at the best suggest by all the possibility that the composer could have a real something by [illegible]. He at least ... expressive words, if we knew the man Beethoven [illegible] ... the expression from his Symphonies, &c., only we clearly that we read the spirit and temper of his soul. As if he wanted to write it out in music, and more always do, and not merely to make a work for the idle pastime of an hour. They also must in all way make show ... come down to bring all great and high things down to the level of their own life.

It is only fair to say, so many paragraphs have done, that, while the fourth movement must be allowed to have a certain ... [illegible] by the words "Freude ... Extra Symphony Concert.—Benefit of the Orchestra.

BEETHOVEN'S "CHORAL SYMPHONY" occupies a large part of our space to-day, to the exclusion of much customary matter. The Harvard Musical Association having successfully completed their second series of eight concerts (the eighth yesterday was too late for notice now), have decided to give one more for the double purpose of ... those ... of their efficient Orchestra by what they trust will prove a good Benefit, and of bringing out ... in Boston after too long an interval of eight years Beethoven's last and sublimest Symphony, in the Finale of which the instruments call in the aid of human voices, giving musical interpretation to the most significant verses from Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" (Lied an die Freude).

Well do we remember the first time we heard it, when it was given for the first time in this country at Castle Garden in New York by the Philharmonic Society, increased to about one hundred instruments,—a hastily ... crude, confused attempt, and yet, so ... ... the grand features of the work ... full of suggestion ... to ... ... forever after. In Boston it was first attempted in February 1853, by the Germania Musical Society under Bergmann, who performed it twice with marked success, although the interest was not unanimous. In 1856 (March 1) the first three instrumental movements, minus the Finale with chorus, were performed again on the memorable occasion of the inauguration of Crawford's noble statue of Beethoven, presented to the Music Hall by Mr. Charles C. Perkins. Finally, in March, 1859, Mr. Zerrahn brought it out twice, in full, in his "Philharmonic" concerts; and then upon the impression which it made was certainly such as to warrant the expectation of its annual return as regularly as that of "The Messiah." Indeed, the short comings in the execution, such as they were naturally in an isolated effort, only showed the importance of repeating the experiment at shorter intervals with the same forces, so that they might get accustomed to each other and the work. That hope was disappointed, and now after eight years we take it up anew from the beginning, believing that the improved musical means and taste of Boston will ensure a better success this time, before it is fully told, and that the zeal developed at this effort will not suffer itself to grow quite cold again for want of at least one of such telling.

The Ninth Symphony is not so difficult to understand, and certainly not so incoherent as many have imagined with little preparation. It needs a key to be sure, and to hear the connection of all its parts, especially the relation of the voices to the orchestra, should ... beforehand. Many have already done this, but many of our readers also have not and will come to it as new listeners, wondering what it all may mean. For their sakes, at the risk of self-excuse, we have reproduced from old volumes of the Journal parts of the record of our impressions after the several performances alluded to. By reading them, incomplete and vague as is the portion we preserve, one can scarcely help getting some light on the Symphony which will make it at least more intelligently. We have also given Wagner's curious parallel of its movements with passages in Goethe's Faust, which was translated years ago. Those who like to look into the structure of the work a little more technically will be aided by the able analysis of all the four movements contributed to this Journal (Vol. XIV., 1859) by our good friend Capt. C. A. Schmitt.

This Concert will be on Friday Afternoon, April 12, at half-past three. It will be, as we have said, for the benefit of the Orchestra, who have served us so faithfully in the cause of the highest, purest music during the past two seasons. Surely every subscriber to the past concerts will recognize the debt of gratitude. The musicians, who compose our orchestra, have mostly a pretty hard time of it to make both ends meet. Like art they have had to earn their bread chiefly outside of really artistic occupations and by catering to tastes not classical or earnest or refined. Let them feel, then, that the lovers of the best music are now numerous enough and earnest enough and united enough to make all that they may do in the spirit and direction of true Art safe and profitable to them. The Symphony Concerts have demonstrated that the purest programme can be made to pay; let us multiply as much as possible the calls for this higher occupation on the part of our musicians, till they shall find their best material support in it, as well as the dignity of their profession set above reproach. The thousands of persons who were delighted by the Concert lately given for the Orphans, will ... forget the noble generosity with which these [illegible] [illegible] gave their services on that occasion. Now is the time to remember them.

The Symphony will form the Second Part of the Concert. There will be a short and brilliant First Part, consisting of Mendelssohn's picturesque "Meeresstille" Overture; Mozart's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], by Mr. HUDDLESTON; and Weber's Polonaise in E (Liszt's transcription, with Orchestra), to be played by Mr. LANG, who made such brilliant effect with it last winter. The quartet of solo singers in the Choral Symphony will be Mrs. H. M. SMITH, Mrs. J. S. CARY, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY and Mr. HUDDLESTON. All the artists volunteer their services.

NEXT IN ORDER. There has been [illegible] March as full of music as of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], to be sure, rather under the head of [illegible] than of Art!] On Thursday Mr. PARKER repeated, by request, his set "Schubert Matinée." Yesterday came the eighth and last Symphony Concert.

This evening, Miss [illegible] [illegible], the very pleasing and artistic contralto singer, [illegible] [illegible] concert in Mendelssohn Hall, which we understand to be designed as a [illegible] benefit by the artists who take part. And well has she deserved it, not only by her art, but also by her readiness to serve other artists and good public causes upon the occasions. The programme is choice. Miss Ryan herself will sing the fine old Aria from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito ("Non più di fiori") with Clarinet obligato by Mr. T. RYAN; a couple of songs by Mendelssohn; a Schumann Duet with Mr. [illegible]; and a Duet from Così fan tutte, with Miss C. M. [illegible]. Mr. Huddleston sings the exquisite tenor air from Mozart's Seraglio, and Miss Loring a Tyrolean Song. Mr. [illegible] plays the Andante spianato and Polonaise by Chopin. The Orpheus club contribute Mendelssohn's festival music to Schiller's "Ode to the Artists" and a couple of part-songs; and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club an Allegro from Mendelssohn's E flat Quartet and a Finale from Raff.

Also this evening the "New England Conservatory of Music," at the Music Hall, [illegible] itself by a Concert, of which a leading feature will be the production of an original Piano Concerto by Mr. [illegible] [illegible], one of the directors of the new institution. Four excellent vocalists (Soprano, Contralto (new to Boston), Tenor and Bass) are announced; also three organists, including Mr. J. K. PAINE, fresh from Germany; and an Orchestra with Mr. ZERRAHN as Conductor.

To-morrow evening (31st) one of those "Grand Sacred" Sabbath concerts, which reach a deal of [illegible] by their huge vans of advertisement and do much [illegible] "for the million" not separating wheat from chaff. These are managers' concerts; but somehow or on the light of a true [illegible] does not seem to burn so clear when managed.

April opens on Monday with five nights of Italian Opera;—Mme. [illegible] [illegible]'s troupe here to close, [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and Mme. [illegible] [illegible] and Signor [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A pretty strong company. On Monday "[illegible]," [illegible] "Traviata;" Tuesday "Norma;" Wednesday the "Barber of Seville"; Mme. [illegible] taking the chief role in each.

Review of Concerts.

[illegible] [illegible] CLUB. The fourth and last subscription concert, at Chickering's Hall, was crowded and gave lively satisfaction. The programme consisted of three noble compositions.

1. Beethoven's Third Quartet (in G flat, op. [illegible]) was repeated and with [illegible] [illegible] interest to many listeners. It is a thing to hear and brood upon again and again. Subtle and complex in its polyphonic interweaving of parts, thoroughly imaginative, rich in contrasted moods; yet all consistent, all one inspiration, it came out clearer in the rendering, one of the happiest efforts of the Club.

2. The earlier one of the Schubert pair of Trios, the op. 99, in B flat mentioned in our last. The piano part was played, and splendidly, by Mr. ERNST PERABO again, taking the place of Mr. PARKER, who was ill. It impressed us more than before.

3. The favorite [illegible] Mendelssohn Quartet the composer, here one in D, op. 44, which most of his [illegible] recognize as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a hour.

The Quintette Club has greatly freshened up their laurels in this eighteenth season, and have really [illegible] [illegible] the interest in this high class of music. We [illegible] the lovers of such would have gladly filled the room for several more evenings; but we understand the Club are going on a Western concert tour with Camilla Urso and Mr. Phillipps, and we wish them all success, and that they leave us that they may find good seeds along with the places not [illegible] they have.

Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA gave a fifth "Schumann Soirée" on the 14th, with this very interesting programme:

Sonata No. 2, in G minor, Op. [illegible]	Schumann
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
Song. [illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] for [illegible] and Piano	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
Grand Sonata [illegible]	[illegible]

After hearing the G minor Sonata, we felt inclined to like it with Winkelmann to the very much [illegible] earlier one which Mr. Petersilea has played before; here were fine passages, but also much that was [illegible] dying. We must sincerely thank the young artist for introducing us to these [illegible] Adagio a [illegible] of Schumann's early and somewhat [illegible] [illegible] genial period. Mr. [illegible]'s Op. [illegible] pleased us more in the Prœludium than in the Scherzo, which appeared more common. The three little Romances, which Mr. P. played with Mr. Rosati, were quaint and full of individual charm. The Sonata by [illegible] [illegible] we did not hear. Mr. HUDDLESTON's singing of that impassioned, beautiful song Nun [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], with its broad rhythm [illegible] by the [illegible] of the poem, was capital and so [illegible] well sung. The Schubert song was hardly done too. Mr. Petersilea's rare talent and [illegible] [illegible] performance of the Beethoven longer Sonatas.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The Afternoon Concert of Wednesday the 20th, offered the orchestral pieces the Freyschütz Overture and Beethoven's first Symphony; a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] also "The Awakening of Spring" by somebody with [illegible] [illegible] music from the great Bach, and a [illegible] [illegible]. Mr. A. SUCK played a solo on the Violoncello (Fantasia on Schubert's "Schwanlied-Weise" by Servais) in a highly artistic and acceptable manner; and a [illegible] for the four French Horns of the Orchestra by [illegible] [illegible] was a new and interesting feature and [illegible] well. Mr. [illegible] [illegible] conducted in the absence of Mr. Zerrahn.

Last Wednesday's programme included the Overture to Oberon and the romantic C minor Symphony of Gade [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The second movement was particularly relished. Mr. HENRY SUCK played a Violin Fantasia by David on Russian themes [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], he has greatly improved. An Andante and Rondo from Weber's Piano Concerto in E flat, pleasing [illegible] [illegible] compositions full of tender grace [illegible] [illegible] the second light and charmingly playful, was played by Mr. HOWARD DOW and won considerable applause. A Strauss waltz wound up the whole to [illegible].

MME. CAMILLA URSO received the just compliment of a Concert in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, at the hands of Boston musicians, to whom she played again Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, in which we never heard her equal. Several distinguished artists took part, the foremost attraction being the young soprano, Miss HARRIS, from the Italian Opera. Great and miscellaneous was the crowd and the enthusiasm; but the affair was rather [illegible] mixed and too [illegible] to be the compliment which so true an artist as Mme. Urso ought to have. A [illegible] of [illegible] followed in kind [illegible] "[illegible]"] the very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

A nobler compliment is conveyed in the following which appeared in the daily papers, and which all concur as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Boston could refuse to sign, unless he would place himself in the false position of appearing slow to recognize the highest artistic excellence,—

BOSTON, March 7, 1867.

Mad. Camilla Urso—Dear Madame:

I take great pleasure in transmitting to you the enclosed tribute of admiration for your artistic talent from the musicians of Boston. With best and highest personal regard, believe me sincerely yours,

THOMAS RYAN.

We, the undersigned members of the Musical Profession in Boston, who have been recent witnesses of the extraordinary musical talent displayed by Camilla Urso in her performances on the violin herein our presence and duty [illegible] [illegible] it [illegible] be allowed [illegible] to more thoroughly [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] in this department of the art, so [illegible] upon many occasions to say in so [illegible] perhaps, that we [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] heard [illegible] [illegible] belong to [illegible] [illegible] professional [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

We are [illegible] [illegible] more [illegible] to follow this line of our [illegible] [illegible] in few ideas of our opinion has [illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] been duly appreciated by the general public. In her recent performance of Concerts in Boston, whether in Mendelssohn's great concerto or the works of Vieuxtemps and De Bériot, the same remarkable skill has been exhibited. But we would [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] her performance of the [illegible] concerto of Mendelssohn, one of the most difficult works for the instrument; her playing of which was so marvellously fine and near perfection itself as to carry our highest admiration. It is not enough to say that it was a wonderful performance for a woman; [illegible] a genuine taste rendering, which probably few men living could improve upon.

It may be [illegible] [illegible] to characterize her playing, but a few [illegible] [illegible] be pointed out [illegible] her complete repose of manner, [illegible] of style, broad, full and vigorous, a wonderful fill a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of true accent and fall an wonderful staccato, remarkable firmness in [illegible] [illegible] as it is [illegible] as nearly perfect as the human [illegible] [illegible] allow. [illegible] [illegible] these are all held [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] warm soul and love [illegible] [illegible] to her work, we have an artist, who may truly be called a phenomenon [illegible] [illegible] worthy favor of Las [illegible].

MUSIC IN NEW YORK. The fourth Philharmonic Concert contained the "Magic Flute" Overture; Beethoven's Second Symphony; Liszt's Poème Symphonique "Tasso;" Chopin's [illegible] Concerto, played by Mr. S. B. Mills; and Donizetti's "[illegible]" and Mozart's "Il mio tesoro," sung by Sig. Lotti. The orchestral performances, under Bergmann, [illegible] to have been admirable.

Mr. WOLFSOHN concluded his "Beethoven Matinées" last week with the great Sonata op. 106. The other Sonatas were [illegible] [illegible] op. [illegible], No. [illegible], and the one [illegible] "[illegible] Adieux" [illegible] op. [illegible]. Herr Frederick sang Schumann's Gretchen am Spinnrad and a Lied by Mendelssohn.

German Opera is going on in a modest way at the Stadt Theatre, where Tell, Masaniello, Freyschütz, &c., &c. are given by some of the old company to fair audiences, more with the hope of consolidating the thing for future times, than of brilliant production.

Oratorio, even Handel, whose New York critics have so often pronounced out of date, has had several triumphs lately both in Steinway Hall and in Brooklyn. Samson and Judas Maccabeus having been very successfully brought out under Mr. Bristow's direction, with the aid of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Mrs. [illegible] and others. A week of Oratorio Festival in June is in preparation.

Mme. Parepa-Rosa has sung in Italian Opera through last past week, with Adelaide Phillipps, Brignoli &c. to great acceptance. Her characters have been Leonora in Il Trovatore, [illegible], Donna Anna (one of [illegible]).

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 23. The last of the Symphony Concerts of Messrs. JARVIS and SCHMITZ was given on Thursday Evening, at the Musical Fund Hall.

Symphony in B flat, No. 1	Robert Schumann.
Violin Solo, Concerto [illegible]	Vieuxtemps
[illegible]
Concerto for Piano, op. 58	Beethoven.
[illegible]
Violin Solo, [illegible]	Prume.
Overture, [illegible]	Meyerbeer

The weather was most unpropitious, but the friends of good music were not to be discouraged when they could hear for the first time,—I blush to write it—a Schumann Symphony in Philadelphia. It is something to be able to say that this lovely creation is no longer an absolute novelty with us; and this is the most satisfactory reflection I can suggest, after [illegible] over the merits and defects of the performance. The rendering of the Symphony was by no means what was desired, for the proper and complete evolution of the beautiful ideas that crowd this remarkable work. A Symphony, and above all a Schumann Symphony, cannot be produced with full effect by an orchestra unhappy in the possession of one only 'cello, and that of but moderate excellence. Hence the beauty of the Larghetto movement remained wholly concealed and lost to a cultured ear, and the work, the most incomplete feature of its lovely character, was the necessary consequence. In justice to Mr. [illegible], the conductor, however, let it be said, that the supposed presence of two able 'cellists from abroad was prevented by the [illegible] storm. The last movement, being less complex in character, was more satisfactorily rendered than the others; but there was little on the entire performance, such a [illegible] of light and shade as to [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible]. Indeed, [illegible] a matter of congratulation that the attempt has at last been made, even in that unsatisfactory manner, to introduce Schumann to a Philadelphia audience; and that the reception was hearty enough, notwithstanding the unpleasant circumstances mentioned, to warrant another and more conscientious presentation. Though that the people, [illegible] false lights, have not led upon that effort, I am confident, furthermore, that the Directors of these concerts, profiting by this season of experience, will appear on the necessity of a more perfect [illegible] of the orchestral elements, [illegible] always [illegible] control; and that before long, in view of the competency of the material, and the requisite [illegible], we may have an orchestra worthy of comparison with any similar association in the land.

Mr. JARVIS, careful and accomplished pianist as he is, was especially happy in his interpretation of the Beethoven Concerto, introducing the Cadenzas of Moscheles, the particular appropriateness of which, he is said to due deference to the custom that seems to have obtained in this respect, I confess to a backwardness in appreciating.

It is high praise to confess to the greatest pleasure in listening to such hackneyed nonsense as La Melancolie and the 1st Concerto of De Beriot,—which was substituted for the Vieuxtemps Concerto,—represented by Madame Urso, one of the most finished artists of the French School, who has united so vivid Vieuxtemps, and who in these performances again charmed us with her graceful bowing, pure tone and delicately nice execution.

It is proper that I should here record the compliment paid Mr. Schmitz by the members of his orchestra, on this occasion, in the presentation of a very handsome conductor's baton.

Mr. JARVIS gave his last classical matinée on Thursday, March 10, at the Academy Foyer, with the assistance of Messrs. Gaertner, Kelton, Plagemann and other prominent musicians. Mr. Jarvis's solos were a Sonata of Weber and the Rhapsodie Hongroise of Liszt, the brilliant and extremely difficult finale of which was admirably rendered. This concert closed with Beethoven's Serenade Septet in D minor, which was performed with much care, Mr. Jarvis doing complete justice to the very difficult piano part.

The 5th matinée of Mr. WOLFSOHN's Series of six took place on Friday, March 18, in the same place, with this programme:

Fantasie, C major, op. 15	Schubert.
Prayer of Erin, "Rhapsodie"	Beethoven.
[illegible]
Songs, [illegible]	[illegible]

Miss [illegible]'s rendering of the exquisite Beethoven Aria was far from satisfactory, and I cannot commend her conception of it. Her voice and method are [illegible] pleasant, the former possessing very little flexibility and becoming, at times, disagreeably harsh. Unless appearances greatly mislead, her répertoire in classical singing has not included the largest portion of her life. This very frank criticism is necessary, after the fulsome praise with which her début here was heralded. Mr. Wolfsohn's performances were, as usual, each more successful. He has bravely mastered the intricate difficulties of the "Robert" Fantasia, and his delicate rendering of the Chopin and Schumann morceaux, and his still great interpretation of the Beautiful Schubert Fantasia, led cause that his excellence is of a steadily progressive character. The bent of this gentleman's several years' patient and conscientious study of Beethoven are plainly manifested in these performances.

Let me not omit to mention here that Mr. Wolfsohn has a concert in contemplation, a sort of "farewell affair," I suppose, inasmuch as he proposes a European tour, limited study, thereafter,—to be given at the Academy of Music on the 11th of May, at which he will perform the Choral Fantasia of Beethoven, with the assistance of the Mendelssohn Society and the German Orchestra, under Mr. Schmitz's direction. Other celebrities, including M. Theo. Habelmann, will assist. This concert will probably terminate the musical season and will doubtless prove a very superior entertainment.

At the Second Concert of the Mendelssohn Society on next Saturday, March 26, Mr. Thunder performs the Choral Fantasia, with the assistance already noted.

The Germania Rehearsal of to-day presents this programme:

Overture, Martha.	Flotow.
Adagio.	Beethoven.
Andante [illegible] Symphony, op. 6.	Gade.
Overture, [illegible]	Berlioz.
Selection, "L'Africaine."	Meyerbeer.

Thayer's Life of Beethoven.*

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.)

IV.

The article from the Neue Zeitung which we have given in the last two numbers, contains, according to its title, only an abstract of Thayer's first two Books, ending with a brief notice of Beethoven's first visit to Vienna. We resume the thread of the narrative where Beethoven went to Vienna a second time never more to leave it.

"Like the great number of students and young people," says Thayer, "who came there every year to find teachers and instruction, had this small and slender, swarthy and pock-marked, black-eyed and black-haired young musician at 22 years journeyed to the capital, to pursue the study of his Art still farther with the small and slender, swarthy and pock-marked, black-haired and black-eyed old master." Beethoven in fact is said to have had even more of the Moor in his aspect than his teacher Haydn. At first we find him occupied with setting up his domestic establishment in young bachelor fashion. A little Diary ("Tagebuch"), the existence of which was quite unknown till now, gives us a purely human peep into the beginning of Beethoven's Vienna life and makes him appear as rather an orderly young man, who regularly wrote down his expenditures and from time to time drew the balance he were made hand and coverts as [illegible] over his expenses. At the same time he seems to have had the design to make himself (and so an elegant young fellow; we find in the Diary the address of a dancing master! But he must soon have felt somewhat low in spirits, for not only did the 100 ducats fail him, which had been promised him from Bonn, but presently a Jew's message came, to the effect that his father had suddenly died, and thus raised a question about the salary which he had thus far received for the father and the brothers, who had removed with him to Vienna. Fortunately through the mediation of his friend Franz Ries, in Bonn, the payment was for a while continued; but only for a few months, and then every shadow of support from this quarter is lost, and the young artist sees himself thrown back upon his genius and his industry.

The main object of his stay in Vienna, Haydn's instruction, was kept in view from the outset. It began soon after his arrival (November 1792) but only lasted to the end of the year 1793. It is already well known, that teacher and scholar were never able to satisfy each other. Beethoven wanted to become firmly grounded in theory; but Haydn does not seem to have been the man for that. He allowed violations of the strict rules to pass unquestioned in the pupil's exercises, while at the same time he wounded the young artist, who already stood firm in his way of composition, by what he deemed unnecessary remarks about his works. Moreover the suggestion that he should call himself "Pupil of Haydn" on the title page of his Sonatas (Op. 2) which Beethoven declined to do, made the relation still more difficult between them. It appears, nevertheless that Beethoven wanted to keep on pleasant terms with Haydn and would now and then treat him with chocolate or coffee,—which entry "for me and Haydn," occurs several times among the expenditures. It is known that Beethoven at the same time took lessons of Schenk, and then on account of Haydn's departure for London "was given over" by him to Albrechtsberger (January 1794). Probably Beethoven took lessons on the Violin also of Schuppanzigh; for the Diary contains the memorandum: "Schuppanzigh 3 times per W. (Week?) Albrechtsberger 3 times per W. (Week?)." Thayer finds that the lessons with Albrechtsberger also did not extend much over a year, partly because Beethoven was already greatly taken up with other occupation, partly because the larger half of the book of Studies which has been preserved, falls within a much later period. Thayer confirms the statements of G. Nottebohm about "Beethoven's Studies," for instance when he says of the great understanding between the scholar and the new teacher.

The condition of music at that time in Vienna, to which the author devotes the second Chapter of this Book, is already known through several writers, such as Otto Jahn and others. We know that the Italians reigned at the Court Opera, while the other opera companies, such as those of Schikaneder and Marinelli, were already far gone in decline. The church music seems to have stood "upon a very low standpoint." Public concerts there were none, with the exception of those old "Akademies" for the benefit of widows and orphans of musicians. On this side, therefore Beethoven could expect but little present advantages for the future. So much the more active was the social life and private musical life in Vienna, particularly through the finely musical feeling of the many wealthy patricians who spent a part of the winter in Vienna, and some of whom even in summer lived not too far from Vienna in the country and there partly through their own larger or smaller Capellen partly by the active participation of themselves and their friends, cultivated music with great zeal. These were the circles in which Beethoven had at first to gain a foothold and know how to gain it. Thayer brings before us the musical amateurs who distinguished themselves in those years and describes the way in which they pursued music.

It is not to be wondered that Beethoven soon conquered the field for himself. He was already known even from Bonn to many of the nobles; he was the "pupil of Haydn," also in high favor with Count Waldstein whose social relationship reached into the highest circles of nobility. Moreover it is conceivable that so such eminent piano player and improvisator, no such interesting composer had appeared since Mozart. One can see [illegible] what an impression those three Trios, Op. 1 made in these circles, and how our young composer [illegible] the Vienna ten form immediately won him many warm admirers. While Beethoven was not exactly scrupulous [illegible] and did not even hesitate to write dances for a [illegible] ball of the "Society of Plastic Artists," which made him an enormous number of friends, he was on the other hand great [illegible] to hold back in the publication of his larger works. He wanted the Trios Op. 1 and then again the first two Concertos to become well known [illegible] before entrusting them to a publisher. About the publication of the Trios Thayer communicates some very interesting documents, which exhibit the Beethoven of that time in the character of a decidedly good business man (einen guten "Rechenmeister!")

After all this, we believe that we may expect from the continuation of this new description of the life of Beethoven many an important disclosure about the master's outward fortunes and his inward development of character; and we look forward to the coming volumes with a longing interest.

The Bâton

(From the London Orchestra.)

The earliest practical use of the bâton in London orchestras, appeared on the beat of the first [illegible] of the leader's fiddlestick was in 1826 when the opera of Oberon was produced at Covent Garden under the direction of its composer,—Weber. The bâton used upon that occasion is said to be among the relics of Weber in the possession of the lately deceased [illegible], Sir George Smart. Unlike the formidable weapons which are now used in concert orchestras the bâton of Weber—similar to those now in use in Germany—was short, and served all the legitimate purposes for which a bâton is required. The modern custom in London concerts of wielding a long stick stretching forth both hands and distracting the attention of the audience with no very definite mode of making the beat intelligible to the performers, is highly objectionable and quite unnecessary. In large theatres, with the complex elements on the stage and in the orchestra, and in the direction of monster festivals, the case is different. Yet on all occasions, the beat should be decisive, symmetrical and intelligible. In no case should the bâton's movements deviate from the established rules of marking the divisions of the bar. The important use of the bâton is to mark the changes of time, assist the accompaniment of recitatives, and guide the performers in passages of mixed rhythm which abound chiefly in modern heavy music. The advantage of the bâton over the absolute system of beating time with a fiddlestick and the feet of the violin leader is acknowledged; but in the hands of persons neglectful of the legitimate system of making it serve no real purpose, always visible, and intelligible to all hands, conducting becomes a positive nuisance. There is no need of raising or lowering the bâton beyond the level of the head, and as for those wild gyrations about the head and below the elbow of the conductor, the swinging about of the body, with both hands out stretched, and a suppressed "finish" to impart observance of a pianissimo, they are quite unnecessary. The conductor should be placed so that every member of the orchestra shall see the motion of the stick; and one of the chief qualifications of a conductor, apart from his experience in orchestras, is to know thoroughly the score of the work to be performed. The list of foreigners who have successfully wielded the bâton in England includes names of European fame: Weber, Chelard, Mendelssohn, Moscheles and Wagner.

Since the Philharmonic Concerts were first established (thanks to the talent and influence of Mr. Costa) there has been a complete change in the character of our English orchestras, and what was once considered a satisfactory performance of a symphony would not at the present day escape criticism. The organization and discipline of bands have seldom engaged the attention of English musicians, nor is there a single treatise in the English language on the structure of orchestras, and the just balance of voices and instruments in combination. It is seldom that a new institution, or the remodelling of an old institution, affords a conductor the best chance of [illegible] form a complete and efficient band. Mr. Costa has been engaged these years ago in England. In forming the band of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, in 1847, he had the unprecedented advantage of including the élite of the performers at Her Majesty's Theatre, with the choicest professors of other bands, making together the most numerous and effective band in Europe. In remodelling the vocal and instrumental resources of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts Mr. Costa introduced the best people of his opera band to assist the amateurs, and the result of his labours and organization at Exeter Hall, the Royal Italian Opera, and the Philharmonic Concerts, when under his direction, are too well known to need discussion. The improvement of orchestral performances since Mr. Costa first wielded the bâton in Her Majesty's Theatre some thirty years ago is most remarkable. Rehearsed operas that required half a dozen full rehearsals under the old system are now produced at [illegible] or three. It should be mentioned that all the [illegible] under Mr. Costa is the most punctual of artists, and by his example others [illegible] to be equally punctual. He knows the value of the musician's time during the short [illegible] of the musical season, and no unnecessary trouble is given to his band at rehearsals. His scores are systematically prepared, each [illegible] errors or variations arising from faults in the copy are noted, [illegible] though for the copyist to examine. When necessary the band is instructed to repeat an [illegible] passage without recommencing the entire movement, and thus time is economized and the performers are spared those delays which, under the direction of less skilled conductors, they are often doomed to suffer. No wonder, therefore, that Mr. Costa is deservedly popular among artists and with the musical public of England for his admirable organization and discipline of choirs and bands.

Haunts of Harmony in the City of London.

Music-halls are a development of the "Free-and-Easy," which no doubt is a well-bred descent from the "Magpie-and-Stump Club," described by De Foe in his "Journey through England." Every Wednesday and Saturday a number of gentlemen, lawyers and tradesmen, met in a great room in Long Acre, where they drank "nothing but ale," each gentleman having his separate mug, which he chalked on the table as it was brought in. A harp played continually at one end of the room, and from time to time some member of the company would rise and entertain the rest with a song. The gossips were seldom less than a hundred in number, and order was maintained by a "grave old gentleman in his own grey hairs," and within a few months of sixty years old.

The "Free-and-Easy" is now going out of fashion, but specimens still exist in some. Sadler's Wells Theatre, in Swallow Street, Piccadilly, and at the Waterloo Road. Of these, the first-named is supported by the Jewellers' Society, and meetings are convened every Saturday evening. On entering, a visitor is expected to deposit a penny in the plate at the door, and the money thus collected serves to provide an annual dinner for the aged inmates of the Jewellers' Almshouses. The day before Christmas are the old people called at the room where the meetings are held, and receive their money. The regular supporters of the institution are allowed to be present and watch the proceedings.

The weekly meetings take place in an upper room, furnished with one or two mirrors, and a good many gas-jets. The [illegible] and [illegible] aged [illegible] of a [illegible] which extends up the room, [illegible] and commence the chairs of the president and his colleagues. A couple of flower-planes [illegible] degree of a [illegible] and the place, near which he would we stand, occupies a [illegible] space between two windows, and facing the [illegible] by which the visitor enters.

The performers are totally amateurs. A young gentleman volunteers a song or a recitation; an ex-corporal an military hat and original version of the "Death of Nelson," breaks down in the middle of the second stanza. He exclaims "Extremely sorry, gentlemen, but—" "Try back, try," cries the audience encouragingly, and the vocalist is moved to fresh efforts by wholly undeserved [illegible] plaudits. He bows his thanks, makes a pass at his mysterious face with a [illegible] and vanishes in [illegible] of a vanishing fresh place. His successor, [illegible] everything goes like a charm all the end of the [illegible] when [illegible] from another flank. An energetic old gentleman [illegible] his shoulders up and [illegible] the most alarming manner and an [illegible] in [illegible] complaint, "Try back, a bell [illegible] back." The young musician, thus aligned, recovers a [illegible] place and sails a good town [illegible]. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that [illegible] Saloons were not [illegible] the vocalist of average [illegible] as a [illegible]. He joins the crowd of his own voice, and [illegible] one song alone at displaying his versatility in several.

We remember an elderly gentleman of haggard appearance who [illegible] the [illegible] evenings in question, and whose [illegible] was to favour his company with recitations from the "Idea of the World," delivered at a [illegible]. Vapidity regarded as a [illegible] was much more remarkable for [illegible] than the extraordinary [illegible] which he [illegible] selections from "Pickwick" and "Little Dombey."

A plan [illegible] a "Free-and-Easy" is expected not only to perform [illegible] but to "sing" an extemporised [illegible] for the various performers.

The [illegible] is elected week by week, and distributes [illegible] among his friends who rally to his support, and form a [illegible] ready to applaud every effort, good, bad or indifferent.

Sometimes professional gentlemen will volunteer a song, and their efforts are sure to yield unbounded satisfaction.

In conclusion, we may add that there is not much in the way of sociality done at the "Free-and-Easy" here alluded to, but there [illegible] quantity of drink consumed, and it is worthy of remark that the audience is a [illegible] composed of the male sex.

There is a harmonic meeting held "every evening throughout the week" in a fine [illegible] room at [illegible] Swallow Street, Piccadilly. The audience in [illegible] gentlemen's servants and [illegible]. It [illegible] to meet well [illegible] and a [illegible] appears on the premises [illegible] consequence the [illegible] of agreeable. The performances are more remarkable in connection than [illegible] and the "pleasant company" [illegible] in the programme as [illegible] of the day" is made up of [illegible] professionals as [illegible] who [illegible] the sake of [illegible]. The accompaniments are rendered upon a piano and [illegible] the vocalists have concluded their [illegible] they [illegible] to mingle with the audience and refresh themselves at the expense of their admirers.

There are "Free-and-Easies" in country towns, at which young ladies, who can play the piano and have a tolerable voice, [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] or three [illegible] a week. It seems [illegible] they are provided with board and lodging [illegible] a [illegible] their [illegible] food is seldom too abundant, and their [illegible] [illegible] being a [illegible] by [illegible] treated on a [illegible] back. The duty of [illegible] the [illegible] described [illegible] to perform solos on [illegible] and accompany the amateur vocalists, who are generally common workmen, agricultural labourers, and [illegible].

About twenty years ago the list of respectable concert-rooms was headed by the "Cyder Cellars" and "Evans's." The entertainments to be found in these places were more of the convivial, and whilst the latter has been altered and purged of its impurities, the former has disappeared altogether. The surviving establishment, half supper-room, half music-hall, and one of the lions of London, is situated at the western extremity of the Piazza, Covent Garden. It is subject to peculiar and stringent regulations. Ladies are not admitted except on signifying their [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] privilege of watching the proceedings from behind a screen. The whole of the performances are sustained by the men and boys, and an efficient choir of men and boys sing glees, madrigals, ballads, and selections from operas. The accompaniments are supplied on the piano and harmonium. The vocal music was introduced by Mr. [illegible]—possibly the Herald's [illegible] of [illegible] music-halls. A celebrated [illegible] was there as Joel [illegible] his [illegible] to death. In [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible]." After years of service he retired from the platform, but in his old age he reappeared at the [illegible] and by employed himself [illegible] for the benefit of the [illegible].

The new hall, one of the [illegible] in London, was erected under the management of Mr. Green, the present proprietor, and from designs by Mr. [illegible]. Its proportions are grand, and the dome, upon which [illegible] been contributed an [illegible] lately about [illegible] Mr. Green [illegible] the honour of having raised the [illegible] of its entertainments to [illegible] from [illegible], but [illegible]. On the occasion of our last visit we heard [illegible] music, English, German, [illegible] performed with admirable precision, taste and delicacy. Books containing the words of the songs are left on every table, and [illegible] the commencement of each composition its number is indicated on a board placed in front of the platform.

Gentlemen anxious to engage in converse on any [illegible] to conduct themselves to the [illegible] different, but in the body of the hall a [illegible] conversation went well on here. The [illegible] is a spacious room supported by [illegible] and [illegible] with paintings of celebrated actresses. For the art [illegible] we are indebted to the enterprise of Mr. Green. Previous to the erection of the new hall the [illegible] now adjoined was used as a singing-room.

During the early portion of the century the apartment in question was held as a [illegible] dinner and coffee-room. It acquired the name of the "Star," from the [illegible] of men of rank by whom it was frequented. It has been said that [illegible] was at one time of [illegible] in [illegible] than in the [illegible] day. The present hall in which the [illegible] Department forms a [illegible] portion of the Covent Garden Hotel. It was erected at a time when the improved quality of the performances required more space than could be commanded in the old saloon. The garden, which during the last stage of its existence degenerated into a receptacle for a broad and seedy shrubs, was famed for having been the property of the well-known Sir Kenelm Digby [illegible]. At a later period it contained a cottage in which the Kembles occasionally dwelt, when the [illegible] this was a popular [illegible] the neighbouring theatre. According to [illegible] it was in this cottage that their talented daughter, Miss Fanny Kemble, was born.

A curious [illegible] is [illegible] certain members of the Kembles for the year [illegible] and designed as a [illegible] for the reception of literary men of [illegible], was purchased by Mr. Richardson, the last proprietor of "[illegible]" against the [illegible] and treated as a [illegible] house above the [illegible] in the old music-room. It has a [illegible] to a [illegible], and its [illegible] the same [illegible]. It was [illegible] House on [illegible] of the [illegible]. [illegible] in 1771, [illegible] Richardson [illegible] of November 1805. It was described by its proprietor in [illegible] of knowledge and [illegible] of "feed and [illegible]" "[illegible]" adds the writer, "[illegible] and well furnished." "[illegible]" [illegible] men here.

It may interest our readers to learn that the present proprietor of "Evans's" directed the chorus in the first performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Green superintended the chorus arrangements for the same composer's incidental "Walpurgis Night."

It is but doing Mr. Green justice to add that he is zealous in carrying out the views with which he commenced his enterprise, and we recommend "Evans's" to the notice of "steady young men" who admire a high class of music, are so harm in a good supper, but avoid theatres and the ordinary run of [illegible]. The performances commence at eight and conclude about one. The accommodation is excellent, the company select, the waiters are attentive, and the refreshments of the best quality.

It was on a moist and gloomy evening within the last six weeks that we crossed the River Thames [illegible] a small steamy [illegible], and, threading [illegible] of those tortuous and fragrant thoroughfares familiar to the students of penny novels, found ourselves in full view of the [illegible] front of "Canterbury [illegible] Saloon," and in close proximity to Mr. Price's patent [illegible] manufactory and that popular place of resort the "Fine Arts Gallery and Canterbury Hall."

And whence did this structure derive its name? The archiepiscopal residence is in [illegible] vicinity and we believe [illegible] the circumstance that we shall [illegible] to the [illegible].

A few steps more and we had crossed the threshold, but our hopes of a fresh and sudden sensation of [illegible] doomed to disappointment. The [illegible] we [illegible] but [illegible] area, [illegible] and balcony [illegible] closely [illegible]. The waiters moved [illegible] and fro and [illegible] their napkins [illegible] off the approaches of sleep, and the young ladies behind the bar either [illegible] contemplation [illegible] and stared [illegible] listlessly [illegible] until they were looking right through the back of the stage at some object on the far horizon [illegible] to dispel [illegible] one stood with one [illegible] low [illegible] and performed feats of dexterity with complicated [illegible] of wood [illegible].

We strolled [illegible] into the "Fine Arts Gallery" and [illegible] by contemplating Mr. Hughes's great picture of "[illegible] Hyde Park." We were forced [illegible] of so [illegible] elegance [illegible] the right of [illegible] of the sign on the subject of the [illegible]. [illegible] spirits were sufficiently depressed already, and we preferred [illegible] our attention to [illegible] a Quinton [illegible] so [illegible] and [illegible] bearing [illegible] and [illegible] which no public picture gallery can be [illegible] complete.

We paused for a moment [illegible] front [illegible] view of the Thames from Westminster Bridge, and then turning suddenly discovered [illegible] the company of one or two young gentlemen who wandered [illegible] up and down the room and occasionally [illegible] their proceedings by [illegible] two down and [illegible] a scream afterwards [illegible] we had the room [illegible] to [illegible]. In the [illegible] the [illegible] company [illegible] by [illegible] and [illegible] in [illegible] to the [illegible] of [illegible] sight [illegible]. [illegible] a [illegible] Abbey [illegible] week-day.

When the [illegible] the [illegible] such as is the composition to which we have adverted—came to a close, as [illegible] a [illegible] good [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] the best artists in London." But alas! for [illegible] confidence in [illegible]. [illegible] forward [illegible] platform [illegible] and having his [illegible] which [illegible] the [illegible]. No sooner had he retired than the [illegible] with his [illegible] and he [illegible] to [illegible] the very [illegible] of a [illegible] audience [illegible] the second song as depressing as the first. Upon this we resigned ourselves to [illegible] and gathered what [illegible] as could be [illegible] the architectural peculiarities of the building [illegible] and [illegible] of those by whom it was frequented.

"The Canterbury," though a spacious and well-arranged hall, has but small pretension to beauty. The decorations are of a cheap and [illegible] description and a prevalent [illegible] in the [illegible] of [illegible]. On each side, and at one end, are projecting galleries; at the other is a stage of moderate dimensions. The ground-floor [illegible] with tables, is supplied with tall [illegible] chairs; the balcony is reached by a handsome staircase, rising from a spacious vestibule [illegible] a refreshment bar; and the picture-gallery [illegible] entry [illegible]. The audience [illegible] between half-past five and [illegible] being [illegible] during the [illegible] stages of the proceedings and [illegible] from about eleven to the fall of the curtain.

The [illegible] of a Canterbury man, it may be imagined, the reverse of aristocratic; being for the most part petty tradesmen, clerks, shop-lads, mechanics and soldiers. Whole families may occasionally be seen in attendance; and since, as is most halls at a distance from the West-end, the olive branches are as sufficiently represented as the parent stem, the songs sung are at least [illegible] by [illegible] of [illegible] from a [illegible]. The taste of a Canterbury audience, though based upon correct moral principles, is the reverse of [illegible]. A form of entertainment that would be coldly received at [illegible] would be [illegible] at the [illegible] on the other side of the water. [illegible] are [illegible] with [illegible] applause and [illegible] generally performed by the band seems to yield more genuine delight than a selection from "Faust," or even the eternal "Orphée aux Enfers." The Canterbury has acquired a deserved reputation for [illegible] formerly [illegible] by the [illegible] Mr. [illegible], and [illegible] the [illegible] of ballet [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible]. A [illegible] popularity, and bore the title of [illegible] was [illegible] known as [illegible] which we had the pleasure of witnessing and enjoyed [illegible].

But to resume our narrative. The gentleman in black [illegible] were [illegible] the [illegible] to [illegible] a [illegible] burlesque, upon which the Italian landscape curtain [illegible] up and [illegible] the [illegible] and made room for a second landscape of the [illegible] the [illegible] stage, and its [illegible] by way of apology for clouds. In the middle of the stage stood an uncomfortable contrivance suggesting the idea of a [illegible] which was intended to portray a [illegible] of [illegible] material. The band [illegible] and [illegible] there [illegible] in a [illegible] a gentleman [illegible] one of two [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] to the [illegible] of the [illegible] by whom the performance seemed to be accorded a perfect good faith as a legitimate [illegible] tragic art. Richard III having been disposed of according to precedent, the [illegible] brought [illegible] became [illegible] place and the [illegible] comedian [illegible] a [illegible] which [illegible] critics, [illegible] the [illegible] whole [illegible] able. [illegible] Italian landscape [illegible] the [illegible] and a young lady [illegible] her powers in a ballad she [illegible] by [illegible] accompaniment by [illegible] up and down the gallery and requesting [illegible] to "make half [illegible]." When the [illegible] of the [illegible] had been brought to a close, another "great comedian" appeared and achieved [illegible] popularity by [illegible] a [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] humor. His song bore [illegible] reference to the [illegible] advantages in the married man and the [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] appeared [illegible] by which the singer returned [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] his cap [illegible] to the air of the [illegible] here, [illegible] some [illegible] two [illegible] and [illegible] and high moral [illegible] attaching to the [illegible] of [illegible]. The applause [illegible] the [illegible] was greeted in [illegible] powers [illegible] dancing in the most [illegible] manner and [illegible] the [illegible] better [illegible] the [illegible] reappeared [illegible] of [illegible]. He had [illegible] to [illegible] in a [illegible] about the stage [illegible] and then [illegible] what [illegible] from the [illegible] that the [illegible] might [illegible] and [illegible] by the [illegible] of the band [illegible] a [illegible] medley [illegible] of "[illegible]" and "When Johnny comes marching home."

Music in the Boston Public Schools.

(From the Annual Report of the School Board, by Rev. R. C. Waterston [illegible].)

VOCAL AND PHYSICAL [illegible].

This department in our schools exists, upon philosophical principles, the best exercise of the vocal organs, [illegible] system of physical training. Professor [illegible] instructions has not only conferred great benefit upon the pupils, but has rendered valuable service to the teachers; enabling them to carry out his plans; developing the physical powers, and aiding, in a remarkable manner, the management and modulation of the voice in reading; and so laying a good foundation for the improvement of music, the advantages of which cannot fail to be seen, even by the most superficial observer.

INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC.

Much as has been done, for instruction in music, through former years, we believe that never was the whole course so complete as at the present time. Formerly, there were separate plans, [illegible] by teachers who had no uniform [illegible]. Now, under the general direction and supervision of the Committee on Music (of which it is [illegible] to say that Dr. J. Baxter Upham has been the efficient chairman for [illegible]), the three departments of Primary, Grammar, and High Schools have been placed in the hands of Messrs. [illegible] and Mason, [illegible] teachers peculiarly adapted to their work, possessing [illegible] and [illegible] in unison with each other, [illegible] with a remarkable [illegible] of imparting knowledge and [illegible] of the pupils. The course of music [illegible] elementary principles [illegible] to the [illegible] to [illegible] through a [illegible] to be [illegible] a [illegible] advance with [illegible] under the [illegible] which will follow. The school festivals in the Music Hall are among the most gratifying occasions [illegible] in this city. They are [illegible] proof [illegible] of the proficiency of the pupils and the appreciation of the public.

Music, introduced in our schools, exerts most an elevating and refining influence through the whole process of education. It is not only the cultivation of one of the most [illegible] and [illegible] gifts God has bestowed on his children, affording a [illegible] a joy and a [illegible] that [illegible] life [illegible] than this,—it is an actual help in the development and culture of all the other faculties. The [illegible] with greater ease and success because of the influence thus exerted. The mental faculties are sympathetic; the spirit of music, blending with, and flowing through all [illegible] life. As there [illegible] hidden [illegible] in all created things, [illegible] but by [illegible] and [illegible] the nature of the child the powers which [illegible] a [illegible] and therefore [illegible], so when a [illegible] is [illegible] to develop itself in [illegible] with the whole educational process. It is more than a mere pleasure, even when pursued as a recreation. According to the [illegible] it may become [illegible] with the breath of life, [illegible] the whole [illegible]. Have we not [illegible] this? Is there, at any [illegible], a [illegible] a sense of [illegible] or [illegible]. [illegible] the delightful [illegible] of music. How [illegible] some [illegible] through a [illegible]!

What a new interest does the cultivation of music [illegible] into the affections of home! How [illegible] powers [illegible] this gift, as added charm. Separate as the schools are from the Church, [illegible] pleasant to remember that every church and the Sunday school connected with each church has the advantage of [illegible] knowledge of music that has been thus gained. The [illegible] are [illegible] with [illegible] well developed and richly modulated voices, [illegible] from the School. There is [illegible] been [illegible] introduced from the school into the Sanctuary [illegible] the [illegible] house of God. Whenever the voice of the great congregation unites in anthems of praise, so that [illegible] of melody [illegible] like the waves of the sea, we have one of the grand results of the teaching of music in our public schools.

So, also, the perceptible growth of a true musical taste in the community, and the increasing desire for a higher order of music, has come in part from the same source; and will doubtless show itself more and more.

The constant, systematic, thorough teaching of music to more than twenty-seven thousand children, in every walk of life, through a whole city, and then [illegible] from one generation to another, must produce an [illegible] for good which cannot but be widely and deeply felt.

[illegible]

Overture to "Waverley." Op. 1.

What a contrast to Bennett's Harfes, that raging [illegible], the terror of the Fisher [illegible] whom [illegible] is simply an awful monster with hungry eyes. But where do we find him to-day? By the crackling hearth of a [illegible] country house amongst [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] girls!

Before the famous Overture to "Waverley," Walter Scott's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] charming length [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] still my favorite of all the modern English novels. To this Berlioz has made his music. People will ask, "To which chapter? to which scene? why? with what object?" Critics always want to know just what composers, [illegible] cannot tell, and if one do not understand the [illegible] [illegible] of what they criticise. Good heavens! when will the time come that no chaff no longer be asked when we come by [illegible] [illegible] composition? Search for [illegible] [illegible] as much as you please; [illegible] [illegible] leave [illegible] in peace. Here, however, the motto on the title-page I find some clue:—

"Dreams of love and [illegible] chagrin
Once [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]."

This puts a melody on the [illegible] [illegible] at the present moment I should like, above all, for the orchestra to [illegible] [illegible] the overture [illegible] [illegible] of modern [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the story. It would be easy to describe it—either in a poetical style, by depicting the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or by [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of its construction. Each way [illegible] [illegible] music has its value; at any rate the first [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the latter his [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] you [illegible] to take it. But Berlioz's music must be heard; even looking at the score does not help one much, and it is useless to try to gain any idea of it at the piano. Often the whole point of a passage lies in its instrumental effect; in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], even to the most practised [illegible], can [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] on paper. If one thoroughly examines the thoughts, and considers them separately, they often seem commonplace, even trivial, but as a whole, in spite of much to offend and startle a German ear, the music has for me an irresistible charm. In each of his works Berlioz is different; in each he has ventured on new ground; I hardly know whether to call him a genius or a musical adventurer. His lightnings flash [illegible] [illegible], but it [illegible] [illegible] awful smell of sulphur behind it. One moment he lays down big [illegible] and truths, and the next, off he goes like [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has no [illegible] to the first beginnings of musical culture and [illegible] (And the greater number of people have not) it [illegible] [illegible] appear a fool and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for a [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] around, and on whom he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. That explains the [illegible] his compositions have met with, and the fact that it often [illegible] for one of them to reach its [illegible] [illegible] a proper performance. But the Overture to "Waverley" will make its way more easily. Everybody knows the story and its hero; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] as then the motto—

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]?"

I sincerely trust that the Overture may become known in Germany. It can [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] those poor overtures in which nothing, however good, can be of any use. It is curious, by the way, that the Overture bears a [illegible] resemblance to Mendelssohn's Meeresstille.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] on the title-page should not be [illegible]. He calls this Overture his "Opus 1," and says that he cancels his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Opus 1" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Overture is henceforth to be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], the second "Opus 1" will [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. One should, therefore, make haste to become acquainted with the work, which, in spite of some [illegible] weaknesses, far surpasses, in greatness and [illegible] of invention, any instrumental music which France has lately produced.

LISZT

Bravura Studies, arranged for the Pianoforte, from Paganini's Caprices (In Two Parts).

The original work is entitled, "24 Capricci per Violino solo composti e dedicati agli artisti da N. Paganini. [Opera 1.]" Twelve of these adapted for the piano by Robert Schumann appeared so long ago as 1833 and 1835. An arrangement of some of them also appeared in Paris, but I do not remember by whom they were done. Liszt's collection contains first of the Caprices and an adaptation of the celebrated "Rondo à la Campanella." He also was to have printed the [illegible] in simple [illegible] out of the [illegible] of the violin part, the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] produce their effects by different means. The all-important task was to produce the most effect by adequate means. Every one who has heard Liszt knows how thoroughly he understands the capacity and qualities of his instrument. It must, therefore, be most interesting to see the [illegible] [illegible] of the greatest violin player (as far as regards bravura playing) of this century treated by the greatest piano player of our day. A glance at the collection, with its wonderful array of notes, ranged up and down like the rafters of a house, is enough to show that we have no trifle to deal with. It is as if in this work Liszt had wanted to disclose all his experiences, and to bequeath to posterity every secret of his playing; in no better way could he have manifested his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than by a work like this, so carefully worked out even to the smallest details, and reflecting the spirit of the original with perfect fidelity. If Schumann aimed rather at bringing out the poetical side of the compositions, Liszt, without neglecting this, has shown rather its [illegible] in mechanical difficulties. He very rightly [illegible] the pieces "Bravura Studies," since they are just suited for playing as [illegible] as show-pieces. But there are not many who could thoroughly master them, perhaps not more than four or five in the whole world. However, the following will not prevent people from attempting them. Many are glad to approach even in a [illegible] way the highest summits of executive perfection. When one closely examines this collection, there is no doubt that by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But the title "Study" answers for much in this case. We are to practise diligently whatever seem to be the rest.

These are, perhaps, the most difficult pieces ever written for the piano, as the only indication for the [illegible] [illegible]. Paganini probably meant to express this in his characteristic dedication, "Agli artisti," as much as to say: "We are accessible to artists only." That [illegible] [illegible] with the present arrangement. [illegible] [illegible] real artists of high standing could make anything of these. From this point of view alone can they be judged. We must forego a regular analysis and comparison of the arrangement with the original. I would take too much space, and is best done with both before one. It is interesting to compare the first Study with Schumann's arrangement of the same, a comparison in which Liszt expressly invites us by copying the latter bar by bar [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the sixth Caprice. The last number contains the Variations which also form the last number in the original edition, that probably suggested to Ernst his "Carnaval de Venise." From a musical point of view this one is not the most interesting of the whole; but even here, in the small space of a few bars, one finds the most prodigious difficulties, such as even Liszt himself must have to study. Whoever can master these Variations so as to play them in the easy playful style which they require, and make them go like stones in a puppet, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the world [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] will crown with golden laurels, as having Liszt-Paganini.

LISZT AT LEIPSIC.

Would that it were possible for two, my friends, my unknown readers, and all you who [illegible] [illegible] hope to hear this great [illegible] for yourselves, and yet eagerly treasure every word in reference here. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] possible for me to give you a picture of so [illegible] a character. But the difficulties are great. His outward man by the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. He has been thus compared and his head has been compared to Schiller's and Napoleon's. And inasmuch as all eminent men [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in common—especially their energy and force in the eye and mouth—the comparison is more or less accurate. In particular he resembles Napoleon when young, as the well-known portraits of General Bonaparte—pale and thin, with [illegible] marked profile—the expression of the [illegible] [illegible] concentrated in the brow. He also bears a remarkable likeness to the late Ludwig Schunke—a likeness extending to their common art, so much so that while Liszt was playing it often occurred to me that I was listening to something I had heard before.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "To characterize his art is a hopeless task. It is not the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ing of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It is rather the [illegible] of a great audacious nature, who has the very gift [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], with the boundless [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the ordinary deadly [illegible] [illegible]. There are many [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who in many respects equal Liszt; and yet not one that all infallibly to him, because they have not his energy that holds on. One often hears, with [illegible] [illegible] Thalberg might enter the lists with him. But it is only necessary to look at the heads of the two men to profit the result of the contest. I recollect a well-known Vienna artist saying that his countryman Thalberg had the face of a beautiful high-bred lady with the nose of a man, but that Liszt might sit to any painter for a Greek god. And there is something of the same difference between their playing. As a player Chopin comes nearer to Liszt—at least he is not a whit behind him in fairy-like delicacy and grace; but nearest of all artists are Paganini and Malibran, from both of whom he confesses to have adopted very much.

At the present time he is scarce thirty years of age. The successive steps of his career are so well known to my readers that I need not recall them. Suffice it to say that he arrived in Leipsic already crowned with an amount of honor which falls to the lot of few but artists, and with his reputation firmly established. It was thus difficult to say anything to that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the rooms and the [illegible]. And the plan was actually tried. It was surely not Liszt's fault that the announcements were so made as to mystify the public, and that there were mistakes in the arrangement of the concert. But these things were [illegible] [illegible] by a well-known anonymous [illegible] to excite public feeling against him, that he was [illegible] of coming to Leipsic only to satisfy an [illegible] love of gain. We dismiss, once and forever, such unworthy [illegible].

The first concert, on the 17th March, was a remarkable sight. The audience were crowded together [illegible] [illegible]. The very room did not look the hall, and the orchestra was filled with seats for the public. In the middle sat Liszt. He commenced with the Scherzo and Finale of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, [illegible] strange choice, that in several accounts [illegible] a happy one. In one's own [illegible] room with a friend or two it is possible to forget the orchestra in the transcription, which is certainly most carefully done; but a public in the very hall in which one had heard the symphony over and over again, played by the band in the most finished style, the comparative weakness of the piano was severely felt, and the more severely the more ever [illegible] it is [illegible] to render the masses of orchestral sound. A simpler and more suggestive arrangement would probably have been more effective. But to accord the purposes of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his own [illegible], that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] the lion shake his mane. This [illegible] [illegible] was soon to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. His next piece was a Fantasia on themes by Pacini, played in a very extraordinary fashion. But I would willingly have exchanged all the [illegible] and audacious execution displayed in this for the magical delicacy with which he interpreted the Study that followed it. With the single exception of Chopin, I repeat that I know no one to approach him in this style. He finished with his well known "Chromatic Galop," and then, as the plaudits were [illegible], played the equally well-known "Bravura Waltz."

Liszt was too exhausted and unwell to give the concert announced for the next day. But, in the meantime, a musical festival was in preparation, of such a nature that neither he himself, nor any one else present, should ever forget it. The giver of the festival—Mendelssohn—had purposely chosen the programme from compositions unknown to his guest, viz., Schubert's Symphony in C, his own Psalm "As pants the Hart," the Meeresstille Overture, three Choruses from St. Paul, and, for the wind up, Bach's Concerto for three pianos, to be played by Liszt, Hiller and himself. The whole thing had a completely [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] light's hours, such as one can hardly hope to enjoy again for years. At the end Liszt played a solo, and wonderfully too. The party separated in a [illegible] of delight and enchantment, and the cheerful and bright expression which [illegible] every face there, as it were, like a thank-offering to the [illegible] of the festival for his homage to the talent and fame of his brother-artist.

Liszt's most genial performance, however, was yet to come. This was Weber's Concertstück, with which he opened his second concert. On this evening the whole audience, both professional and non-professional, were in the most [illegible] [illegible], and the orchestra [illegible] which preceded [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] everything before and beyond. He started the concerto at once with a force and majesty of expression befitting a procession to the [illegible], and carried it on with increasing power bar by bar until he seemed to dominate over the whole orchestra, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

* I have often found that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], though, on the other hand, they are seldom wanting in [illegible] [illegible].

At this moment he really looked like the great conqueror to whom we have already compared him, and the shouts of applause might well have been mistaken for "Vive l'Empereur!" Besides the Concertstück, he gave a Fantasia on themes from the Huguenots, Schubert's Ave Maria and Serenade, and finally, to the demand of the audience, the Erl King. But the Concertstück was the glory of the whole performance.

Who it was that suggested the crown of flowers which was handed to him on the stage by a favorite lady singer I know not, but it was certainly well deserved. None but a narrow and spiteful nature could carp, as some have carped, at a friendly act of homage like this. To give you, by thanks, the pleasure which you this day enjoyed, this great artist had sacrificed years of his life; all the labor his art had cost him you know nothing; he gave you the best he had, his heart's blood, his very nerves, and you grudge him a paltry garland!

Liszt, however, would not remain in debt. He was evidently much pleased with his warm reception on the second evening, and immediately stated his readiness to give a third concert for any charitable institution that might be selected. Accordingly on Monday last he played for the benefit of the Society for the Relief of Indigent Musicians, as, on the day before, he had done so likewise for the poor. The room was crowded to suffocation. The object of the concert, the programme, the co-operation of the [illegible], and above all the presence of Liszt himself, combined to excite the public sympathy. He arrived from Dresden in the morning, and although fatigued with his journey and with the long performance of the day before, went immediately to rehearsal, so that he had only a short interval before the commencement of the concert. Repose he had none. It is also only necessary to mention the fact, [illegible] with which Liszt played in the evening was but the natural consequence of his recent labors. He showed his friendly feeling by choosing for the concert compositions by three personal friends, Mendelssohn, Hiller, and myself. He selected the new (Summer) Concerto of the first, some Studies of Hiller's, and several numbers from an early work of mine called "Carneval." It will astonish many a timid performer to hear that he played the greater part of these pieces, completely at sight! The "Studies" and the "Carneval," indeed, he knew slightly before, but the Concerto he had not seen till a day or two previously, and, in fact, it was impossible for him to have found time in this short period for any proper study of it. I remained in [illegible] fact that the rhapsody of [illegible] had little impression on a general audience [illegible] dismissed [illegible], saying that he hoped it would. Nevertheless, I still believe he had deceived himself!

And here I may be allowed a word or two on that composition of mine. It owed its origin to the accidental circumstance that the name of a small town in which a musical friend of mine resided contained letters answering to the scale notes of those of my own name; and this suggested to me one of those jeux d'esprit which, since Bach with his example, have been common enough. It was composed piece by piece, partly in the time of the Carnival of [illegible], in a mood [illegible] seriousness, and the whole is close enough. Afterwards I added titles to the different pieces, and called the whole collection "Carneval." It contains many things which may charm individual hearers, but the moods of the music change too rapidly to allow of its being followed by the general public, who dislike being disturbed every few minutes. This fact, as I have already said, had not been sufficiently considered by my good friend Liszt; and though he played with so much warmth and geniality as probably to affect people here and there, yet the audience at large remained unmoved. With Hiller's Studies it is not very different. [illegible] made their way, and two of them—in D flat and in E minor—were received with great favor. Mendelssohn's Concerto we know [illegible] in all its beauty, [illegible] Liszt played it, as I said, almost at sight, [illegible] which it would be impossible for any one to do here like him. His powers of execution were [illegible] in full glory in the last piece of the programme—the "Hexameron"—a set of variations by Thalberg, Herz, Pixis, and himself. It is really wonderful to think when he can have found strength to repeat, as he did, fully half the variations, and then to the rapture of the audience, to wind up with his Galop!

In conclusion I have only one thing to regret—that he did not give the public an opportunity of hearing him in any of Chopin's pieces, which he plays incomparably and with the greatest affection. In his own room he cheerfully plays anything one asks for and when I have listened to him there with astonishment. He left us on Thursday morning.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. (From the Times, March 5.) A very interesting novelty was introduced on Monday night, in the shape of an Octet, for string and wind instruments, by Schubert. Some will, doubtless, think it strange that this remarkable work should never till now have been heard at the Monday Popular Concerts, but they can hardly have taken into consideration the enormous number of compositions, almost every one of which have been brought forward at St. James's Hall since February 1859. It should not be forgotten that even Mozart and Beethoven have left many splendid pieces that still await a hearing; that Haydn has at least fifty quartets wholly unknown to the large majority of Mr. Chappell's supporters; that Spohr has a very great number to select from; and that Mendelssohn is not by any means exhausted. The movement on behalf of Schubert has of late introduced a new element, and while the degree of [illegible] belonging to that genius is likely to remain a moot question, his works are now frequently allowed to take precedence of others about which there could possibly be no question at all. Not only Schumann but Schumann's disciple and imitator have been admitted, and only the other night we were favored with a specimen of Herr Johannes Brahms, about whose significance opinions are [illegible] light that was to clear up all difficulties. Nevertheless the Sextet in B flat for string instruments, of Herr Brahms failed, admirably as it was played by Herr Joachim and his associates.

That Schubert was one of the most wonderfully gifted of musicians is beyond dispute. His six hundred songs alone would have proclaimed him; but now one great instrumental composition after another, in the shape of symphony, quintet, quartet, sonata, &c., comes to reveal it with [illegible] emphasis. Not the least surprising among these is the Octet introduced for the first time on the occasion under notice, a work of genius if there ever was one. The two movements—andante with variations and minuet with trio—omitted from the scheme of which the entire work consists are comparatively unimportant, although none who are acquainted with them can deny their beauty. They are, however, in due measure [illegible] manner which happily Schubert very rarely adopted. On the whole, therefore, the Octet may be said to have enjoyed a fair opportunity of appreciation; and, thanks to its splendid execution by MM. Joachim, Ries (2nd fiddle), Zerbini (viola), Piatti (violoncello), Reynolds (double-bass), Lazarus (clarinet), C. Harper (horn), and Winterbottom (bassoon), the audience were well satisfied [illegible] the continuous fountain of sound which kept up its [illegible] from one end to the other. The applause at the termination was boundless, and two of the movements—the exquisite andante [illegible], and a scherzo with trio that might have been signed "Beethoven"—would assuredly have been listened to again by the whole room, so engagingly [illegible] the one, and so full of vigorous life the other.

Herr Joachim added to the attractions of the concert by the most magnificent performance ever [illegible] of J. S. Bach's marvellous Chaconne, with [illegible] the thunders of applause that followed compelled the unequalled artist again to come forward and play the opening prelude to one of the same composer's solo sonatas. The pianist was Herr Ernst Pauer, whose classical [illegible] was exhibited in his choice—the solo of the Fantasia in F sharp minor by Mendelssohn. The other instrumental piece was Beethoven's trio in E flat No. 1, Op. 1, played by MM. Pauer, Joachim, and Piatti.

(From the Musical World, March 30.) Mme. Arabella Goddard took her annual benefit on Monday evening, and once more [illegible] by producing for the first time at these concerts Beethoven's grandest pianoforte sonata in B flat major, Op. 106, written by the illustrious composer late in life, [illegible] work had to be sold in London to meet the then existing necessity Beethoven had for funds. He wrote his friend and pupil Ferdinand Ries:—"Don't forget Sonata Op. [illegible] and the money." The work, however, has hardly ever been played as it contains passages insurmountable to most pianoforte performers. In one of the [illegible] the theme, which is particularly striking, is worked through several progressions of harmony, until the adagio is reached, which is of the truly Beethoven kind, [illegible] throughout. This at last gives way to an adagio, in the remote key of F sharp minor, which, perhaps, is the most impassioned movement ever written for the piano. Beethoven seems, as it were, to have taken his favorite instrument into his confidence, and knowing as we do, the anguish of his mind at the time of its composition, it would seem that he poured out his soul in the wonderful lamentation [illegible] through the various transitions of keys until apparently wearied with itself it dies [illegible] effect. The listener is [illegible] awakened from his reverie by the concluding allegro [illegible] dashed off, which being in the fugue style, [illegible] ideas which Beethoven knew so well how to treat. The climax [illegible] is reached by a [illegible] passage built upon the original theme. Mme. Goddard, by the exercise of her splendid talent in producing so intensely [illegible] a work, has earned the thanks of all amateurs, [illegible]. The fair performer seemed to linger on the pathetic tones of the great adagio movement with a fondness that spoke with an eloquence we can only record but which is impossible to describe. When Mme. Goddard retired after this remarkable display a perfect ovation followed her, and she was compelled to reappear on the platform in acknowledgment of applause as hearty and genuine as ever [illegible] accorded to any artist on any occasion. The concert opened with Mozart's quartet in D minor, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, performed by Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. The last named [illegible] also performed a [illegible] in C major by Beethoven, in such a manner as to obtain an encore for the finale. The concert concluded with the Kreutzer Sonata, played, of course by Mme. Goddard and Herr Joachim. Mr. Cummings sang Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," from Jephtha, [illegible] in the shape of a song entitled "The Sinner," written by Mendelssohn in 1831 and now for the first time published. Mr. Benedict was the conductor.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. (From the Orchestra, March 9.) The Philharmonic Society inaugurated its fifty-fifth season on Monday, Mr. W. G. Cusins appearing for the first time in the post of conductor, vacated by the retirement of Professor Sterndale Bennett. The late conductor retired with the respects of many of the Society's well wishers, for his personal friends were [illegible] admirers. As a conductor Professor Bennett might have attained a higher position if his abilities in other respects had not thrown these special talents into the shade. Mr. Cusins has undertaken a task of [illegible] which, however, we consider him fully equal. Despite occasional [illegible] and [illegible] supporters, we [illegible] Mr. Cusins with the power to [illegible] any emergency [illegible] opinion further substantiated by his successful debut on Monday. The ordeal was no light one. Mr. Cusins had before him [illegible] the new conductor is the man for [illegible]. He [illegible] full control over his band, and [illegible] interest of the task before him. In the first piece of the programme, the C minor Symphony of Mendelssohn, composed in 1824, when the composer was between 14 and 15, the qualities of conductor and band were put to the test, but Mr. Cusins was evidently acquainted with every [illegible]. A stronger trial was Beethoven's glorious Symphony in A, but [illegible] successfully surmounted. An overture of Professor Bennett's—the "Naiads"—was given as a little [illegible] compliment, which was perfectly appreciated by the audience; and Cherubini's Anacreon overture made up the programme. Herr Joachim was in great force, and his Bach playing showed to great advantage with the orchestral accompaniment played in such a manner as to preserve a correct musical perspective. The vocalists were Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. H. Cummings.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR. A second extra concert was given when the "Antigone" was repeated, omitting [illegible] of the read text, which Miss Kate Saville [illegible] delivered. The [illegible] was highly [illegible] occasion. A miscellaneous selection followed including the overture to Cherubini's "Deux Journées" and to "Oberon," and an admirable playing by Mr Charles Hallé of Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in G. Miss Ada Jackson sang very well, and Mr Cummings was in excellent voice.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. The [illegible] was commenced March 20. We had the "Walpurgis Nacht" cantata executed in a style which only had [illegible] sole singing of Mr. Leigh Wilson, who was inaudible beyond the first half dozen rows of stalls. Miss Julia Elton was [illegible], if her audience were not; Mr. Lewis Thomas sang carefully and well. Haydn's familiar symphony in E flat was performed with much gusto, and the elaborate andante found general favor. A [illegible] pleasing effect was attained in Schumann's vocal piece, "Gipsy Life," sung by eighty choristers and full orchestra: it provoked an encore. Mme. Schumann's playing formed a [illegible] point d'appui; the delightful concerto by Mozart, in D minor, and the Choral Fantasia of Beethoven [illegible] her [illegible] and [illegible] style of playing [illegible] wonderful beauty.

OPERA. Of Verdi's new opera, "Don Carlos," the correspondent of the Orchestra writes (March 1st) as follows. Verdi's imagination like that of his own gypsy Azucena, seems still haunted by the whirling music of bygone days.

As regards the lyrical portion, I can only repeat my first impression. It is [illegible] dull, and is delivered [illegible] by a [illegible], a great [illegible], and he [illegible]. Of the [illegible] there is a [illegible] more to be said, though less equal [illegible]. I told you [illegible] Schiller's and [illegible] he there [illegible] from the original [illegible] I had no [illegible] and the "dramatic" interpolations, [illegible] and a [illegible] there are no improvements. But so as one very rarely [illegible] the plot of an opera, [illegible] dialogue [illegible]. The [illegible] scene represents the forest of Fontainebleau. The ground is covered with hoar frost, which [illegible] Don [illegible] the Don [illegible] the Marguerite. Elizabeth of Valois [illegible] has escaped from the neighboring [illegible] from whose [illegible] the [illegible] her lovely [illegible]. The [illegible] and [illegible] for [illegible] and [illegible] Frenchmen [illegible] their [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] for [illegible] must [illegible] the Bagarini, [illegible] powder [illegible] these [illegible], and [illegible] we must therefore suspend our criticism on the first act. The second is dull enough. A [illegible] the dreary corridor of the St. Just Monastery. [illegible] Philip [illegible] the [illegible] of Charles the Fifth [illegible]. In the next scene the Marquis Posa [illegible] with the Don [illegible] for the Princess [illegible] become his father's bride, and the Don's respect for his papa does not [illegible]. The Don has evidently some dread of M. Vandal, [illegible] his liberty to be [illegible] the [illegible]. In the next act he [illegible] the Queen and [illegible] the Princess of Eboli [illegible] the Queen [illegible] Verdi all over. [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] "Trovatore" [illegible] the [illegible]. The [illegible] of the [illegible] the Place and Cathedral [illegible]. The gloomy King Philip marches at the head of a [illegible] his [illegible] the [illegible] the Queen, for an [illegible] the [illegible] of a [illegible] is already prepared. [illegible] Place, and a goodly batch of unrepentant Protestants stand ready to be grilled. Don Carlos [illegible] at the head of [illegible] Flemish deputation [illegible] for some privileges [illegible] provinces, and [illegible] mercy [illegible]. The King [illegible] no mercy, no privileges. [illegible] his sword, and [illegible] he would [illegible] M. Lavastre's [illegible] is disarmed, and the King [illegible] the [illegible], his [illegible] and paternal pleasures being [illegible] by the [illegible]

The speech which recurs this [illegible] in [illegible] in his melody; it may become popular as the marches in the "Prophète" and "Faust," without, however, resembling either; and exquisitely beautiful is the Queen's prayer for the souls of the heretics as they writhe at the stake during the auto da fé. The last act is a wild confusion of discordant sounds. They who had fallen asleep—and their name was legion—dreamed that they were in the Tower of Babel, and the wakeful fancied that they were in the Exhibition, where the [illegible] of myriads of [illegible] of angry exhibitors who did [illegible] in that [illegible]. Concerts.

THE HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION brought its second series (of Eight Symphony Concerts) to a successful close on Friday afternoon, March 29. All of these occasions will remain memorable with [illegible] but scarcely one of them proved more delightful than the last. The only fault was that at length it largely [illegible] the usual two hours. This was the programme:

Toccata in F, composed for Organ. Arranged for Orchestra by [illegible]	Bach.
Concert Aria. "[illegible]" [illegible] Obbligato.	Mozart.
Miss [illegible] and [illegible]
Pianoforte Concerto, in G, Op. 58 [illegible]	Beethoven.
Third Symphony [illegible]	Beethoven.
Andante Spianato and Polonaise [illegible] Op. 22 [illegible] Piano with Orchestra.	Chopin.
Overture [illegible]	Mendelssohn.

The Bach Toccata rolled along more joyously even than it did last year, and in the orchestral form is certainly more [illegible] than upon the Organ. How full of hearty, healthy life it is! It [illegible] sense of generous, [illegible] power, of genius [illegible] strength, by its [illegible] conformity to law, or rather of genius [illegible] with [illegible] true to itself and [illegible]. [illegible] full of grand and joyous [illegible] music. We heard the pianist say (during its rehearsal) that it put him in the right state to play afterwards, it "sounds so comfortable and makes one feel so comfortable." And so indeed it proved when his turn came.

What better place than this, then, to [illegible] Mr. [illegible]'s admirable playing of Beethoven's fourth Concerto, the most poetic, lovely [illegible] of them all, in G? His [illegible] of the same task was one of the [illegible] experiences of last year's concerts. Then we thought no praise could be too much for his rendering of it and we were moved to write: "In technical respects and [illegible], [illegible] conception and feeling [illegible] every beauty so thoroughly musical and vital [illegible] lacked nothing, nor, as a whole, could we conceive of its being played better. The Allegro is extremely difficult, a series of [illegible] sages" (all products of one creative mood, however, and related by close logical affinity), [illegible] flights of fancy, delicate and bold, in which a certain [illegible] plenty of bravura is thoroughly vitalized with poetry,—commentaries and reflections, as it were, from the highly charged orchestral background where the continuity of the main theme is all the time kept up. Those passages were played with perfect precision and fine accent, no exaggeration and no falling short; even those double trills in the same hand which one would think too much for any mortal fingers, came out clear and [illegible]; and the elaborate cadenza by Moscheles, in which he struck out great chords [illegible], made great effect. The Andante, short as it is, a sublime [illegible] piece of transcendent beauty, full of meaning. Here the musing, subdued, cantabile passages, in answer to the repeated stern call of the orchestra, were as purely musical and [illegible] [illegible] toward [illegible] the [illegible] all about [illegible] be made [illegible] were [illegible] form, by the graceful Rondo Finale, with another Moscheles cadenza. Mr. [illegible] before, had never played with orchestra before, and [illegible] placed himself in the front rank." Has he not kept the place? And could anything be further from the fact than the disparaging record which certain newspapers [illegible] of his performance of the same work the second time? In comparing our unreserved praise of last year with the fresh impression this time, we cannot find [illegible] the least exaggerated and therefore [illegible]. Indeed the artist seemed to do even better than before, and to [illegible] touch [illegible] light and shade, in exquisite finish, in intelligent, intelligible conception and feeling of the work as a whole, to have gained, if that were possible. Such possession with the spirit of the whole, such mastery of every detail, was enough to ask of any [illegible];—and yet it has been hinted that he came to [illegible] unprepared! Such was not the feeling of the [illegible], judging by the breathless attention and the spontaneous applause, and surely not of artists and musicians, who compared [illegible] delight after it. In the piece from Chopin—Andante for piano alone, followed by brilliant Polonaise with orchestra, the performer still grew in favor and was recalled with great warmth and unanimity.

The Aria "[illegible]," in which Mozart seems to have worked up some of the superabundance of lyrical [illegible] for which he could not find room in his first great opera "Idomeneo" [illegible] been heard here once before, in the superb singing of Parepa-Rosa. It is in the largest, noblest, highest dramatic style of the composer, an anticipation of his true Donna Anna [illegible]. Miss [illegible] had a trying task and made a good success in it. She threw herself into it with feeling, and while her rendering was unequal, partly from want of greater weight of voice, there were passages which came out with right dramatic ring and fervor. It was an earnest, sincere lyric effort, and went to the heart. Perhaps the richly [illegible] Violin obbligato part, which Mr. [illegible] played so [illegible], caught the light too much to allow the voice due prominence. Orchestrally and vocally taken all together, it was a noble piece, and we hope that another time the opening recitative may not be omitted.

The "Heroic Symphony," third of the nine, and first of the great ones, in which Beethoven was all himself and like no other, had not been heard here for some years. It is more seldom played than any other but the ninth, and, for some reason hard to explain, it seems to excite less enthusiasm in a general public. Yet it is one of the grandest, richest and most beautiful of symphonic creations; altogether noble and heroic in its whole intention, setting with a steady, broad, resistless current toward its end. Possibly the somewhat broken up, ingenious character of the last movement, with its variations and polyphonic learned air in the working of two themes, may distract and fatigue the mind at last, after the clear and unmistakable splendor of the first Allegro, the profound sorrowful, great grief (with [illegible] of divine hope) in the Marcia funebre and the exciting [illegible] of the [illegible] Scherzo. But from beginning to end the whole work is crowded with ideas, and these [illegible] [illegible] themselves on a grave hearing. The time [illegible] think the Symphony was better appreciated than ever before in Boston. Mr. Zerrahn had given it a careful rehearsal, and the orchestra were well up to their task.

The Mendelssohn Overture was also a revival of long ago. "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" it has been common to translate the title, thereby conveying a wholly false and absurd idea of its meaning: for how could there be a prosperous voyage over a calm sea? It is one of the most picturesque of Mendelssohn's overtures, and one of the most graphic and delicious instances that exist of the [illegible] power of instrumental music—not descriptive in a clap-trap literal way, but as a true scene which describes emotions and [illegible] pictures, left [illegible] to the [illegible] of the hearer's free imagination. It is a musical picture in richly blended, [illegible] subdued, now fresh-est colors. First the long-drawn [illegible] from [illegible] harmonies, with sense of variety of quiet in them, recall the feeling of being becalmed at sea; but the art is too interesting [illegible] to [illegible] try there to let it become tedious. Then the rising of a breeze, which seems to creep through all the sails and tackle of the good ship, and set all in [illegible] and motion, till every thing at last takes one direction and with buoyant rhythm, and exhilarating melody [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] before the wind; a plenty of [illegible] thoughts [illegible] and there [illegible] for a moment [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from 'cello, bassoon, &c. heard now and then [illegible] the general [illegible], snapped [illegible] and serenade and sentimental happy [illegible] to deck under the stars; [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] all a [illegible] good [illegible] [illegible] the motion as smooth and tranquil as an infant's sleep, and now what means those great sighs, in full chords, repeated higher and higher that spring up as those led and [illegible] sign [illegible]? Every one who has been [illegible] slowly along in mid ocean must have heard these and they reveal a true secret of a last [illegible] characteristic in ocean life. Mysterious sounds of an appalling grandeur, but merrily as we bound, forget my [illegible] and well [illegible] of [illegible] and blaze of trumpets [illegible] [illegible] strong [illegible] [illegible]. One of the happiest renderings which our orchestra have ever given us was this.

And fitly with this closes the good ship Symphony Concerts, with [illegible] colors [illegible], "Harvard," safely into port at the end of this second happy and successful voyage.

A proper celebration after landing, with grateful testimonial to the gallant crew (the orchestra) was the performance of the Ninth Symphony, with "Hymn to Joy," yesterday, in a Festival with that same picture Overture for frontispiece; of which next time.

Miss Anna S. Ryan's Concert, at Mercantile Hall, March 30, was a well-earned and hearty compliment to herself, and an occasion of real musical interest, as the programme shows:

1. Allegro from Quintet in B flat...		Mendelssohn.
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
2. Toccata, [illegible]		Mendelssohn.
Stephen Webster, Beikler.
3. Aria. [illegible]		Mozart.
With [illegible] [illegible] by S. Ryan.
4. Piano Solo. [illegible] and [illegible]		Chopin.
Mr. Leonhard.
5. Tyrolean Song.		H. Proch.
Miss Ludwig.
6. Duet. [illegible]		Schumann.
Mrs Ryan and Mr. [illegible]
7. Part Songs. a. The [illegible] b. [illegible]		[illegible]
8. Songs. a. [illegible] b. [illegible]		Mendelssohn.
Miss Ryan.
9. Violin Solo. [illegible]		F. Schubert.
[illegible]
10. Aria. From [illegible]		Mozart.
[illegible]
11. Duet. [illegible]		Handel.
Misses Ludwig and Ryan.
12. Second Finale. [illegible]		Meyerbeer.
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The concert began late, and we were only able to hear the first three pieces. Mendelssohn's noble chorus to words from Schiller's "Ode to the Artists" (sung here some eight years since at the Schiller Festival) was well sung by the "Orpheus," and made as effective as the hall would allow. Miss Ryan had chosen admirably in her Mozart Aria and sang it with [illegible] warm sympathetic voice and good style and expression, though from accidental cause with not entire freedom from constraint. It was however a highly creditable and rewarding effort.

New England Conservatory of Music. This suddenly arrived institution (already, we are told, extremely flourishing in a business way) inaugurated itself in a Grand Vocal and Orchestral Concert in the Music Hall on the same evening (March 30.) The programme was rather [illegible] [illegible] and much after the [illegible] or any classically educated model; both contained some [illegible] things and others in terms of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] array of soloists. An orchestra of [illegible], under Zerrahn, opened the concert with the "Hebrides" overture and closed it with the Finale from the Fifth Symphony. Miss Houston sang again the "Vorrei [illegible]" [illegible] Mr. H. Suck for Violin Obligato, and with more favor than before it [illegible]. Mr. J. K. Paine [illegible] a warm reception [illegible] first appearance since his good experience [illegible] in Germany [illegible] his performance of his Organ Fantasia and Fugue in E minor [illegible]. Mr. Whiting played a couple of Organ pieces (Transcription, by Best, from Schumann and Prelude of his own.) Mr. J. W. Whitney sang "It was a[illegible] your hearts" (Eli [illegible]) with [illegible] [illegible]. The Benedictus from Haydn's [illegible] Mass was sung by Miss Houston, Miss [illegible], Messrs. Wallace & Welch with Organ accompaniment by S. P. Tuckerman.

The vocal point of interest however was the singing of the new Contralto, Miss Huntley Sherwood, from New York. She has the best [illegible] piece, an Aria by Mercadante, [illegible] only heard her in her "Three Fishermen," ballad (sung for an encore) and in one of Mr. Gerhardt's Lost Songs" called [illegible] [illegible] a short [illegible] in declamatory place, in mod-[illegible] and quite effective. The lady has one of the richest, clearest and most serviceable contralto voices that we have heard for a long while; [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] among other things, to get imbued and [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] of good music.

Lastly we come to the chief feature of the [illegible] Mr. Eugene Gerhardt's Piano Concerto [illegible] played by himself, for the first time [illegible]. The Directors of the new Conservatory, we suppose would hardly allow that their own original compositions should be often put on trial in concerts for the education of the taste of their pupils; no doubt, they would agree with us that Conservatory Concerts, of all others, should be classical. But as Mr. Gerhardt is a new man among us, assuming directorship in an institution with ambitious name and claims, it is but natural that he should wish to present his credentials in the shape of a composition in large form. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] period. His execution is unquestionably clear, brilliant, even, well sustained, and he stands well as one among the best pianists of this new [illegible] [illegible]. Of the Concerto as a composition it is harder to speak with certainty after a single hearing; but there are our impressions. The first movement (Allegro con spirito) has good decided themes, well worked up in the main; and a little too much of the fragmentary modern operatic sort of episodes, à la Lost [illegible], &c. and no constant [illegible] [illegible] the piano always in the most conspicuous [illegible]; orchestration clever somewhat crude. We liked this movement the best as having more of pith and unity than the others. The slow movement (and yet not slow, Andante quasi Allegretto) pleasing enough, but not sufficiently contrasted with the character or tempo with the first. The Finale is a Pastorale, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of low [illegible] and high [illegible] [illegible] (from [illegible] found from Beethoven in the Trio of the [illegible] Symphony Scherzo, and suggests the comparison). [illegible] [illegible] but not finely hung under orchestral coloring [illegible] and often coarse. There are [illegible] a leading phrase of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony turned up and [illegible] [illegible] to go on. On the whole, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] ably, and [illegible] [illegible] not much in its [illegible], but among its [illegible] occasional models, able to return with hope and needing [illegible] to refined and clarified. But these are only some of first impressions.

Mr. Perabo's First Schubert Matinée, March 29, was mostly a repetition of the ninth (March 8), and drew a crowded [illegible] audience. Hummel's Septet, Schubert's E flat Trio and [illegible] Sonata in F minor (played with [illegible] [illegible]) made even better impression than before. The vocal contributions were by Mr. [illegible], who sang Schubert's "Aufenthalt" and "Frühlingsglaube" in his best style.

Orchestral Union. The sixth concert offered Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture and Mozart's E flat Symphony. A young lady Master [illegible], a pupil of Mr. Eichberg, made her debut as a violinist in a Variation piece by De Beriot, leaving a most favorable impression. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a pure and true [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This week gave us Cherubini's fine Overture to "Anacreon" [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven's 8th Symphony. Miss [illegible] [illegible], a pupil of Mr. Kreissmann, made her [illegible] [illegible] public and performed Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise in a really artistic manner, at least for a pupil. Much may be expected of her.

We are sorry to lose the Concert Complimentary to Mr. G. F. Hall, lately returned from seven years of vocal study in Europe. Hi. Baritone is said to be of the noblest quality and he is [illegible] [illegible] Signora Cañeza and Sig. Brignoli [illegible] [illegible]. He [illegible] [illegible] from [illegible] and Verdi, except the two fine orchestral pieces ("Melusina" overture and fifth Symphony of Mozart) conducted by Mr. Lang.

Chicago City Ballet Opera, [illegible] much [illegible] [illegible].

New York. Fidelio was given last Thursday by the Germans at the Stadt Theatre, with Mmes. Johannsen and Rotter, and Messrs. Himmer, [illegible] Weinlich and Graf. Hermanns was to appear this week in his great part of Falstaff in Nicolai's "Merry Wives." Robert has been given too, "in splendid style," with Mlle. Sanchez as Alice, Mme. [illegible] as Isabella, and Hermanns as Robert.

A novelty at the Academy of Music [Maretzek's troupe) has been Petrella's comic opera "The Carnival of Venice." The Albion says of it:

The plot is simple, but wisely selected in support of comic opportunities. Signor Mosca, [Rollin] removes to a secluded ruro near Venice for the purpose of isolating two daughters, Albina and Rosetta [Miss Kellogg and Tescari] from certain persistent admirers. Leaving home, and depositing the keys at the mansion with a stupid old servant, Cola [Signor Ronconi], his back is no sooner turned than the daughters, aided and abetted by a maiden aunt, Mlle. [Mme. Natali-Testa], whom Cola lets alone, are there to visit Venice and participate in the Carnival. There they meet the Gondola fellows, and, after sundry most humorous adventures, the party return home. The last act is occupied by a final and determined assault on the rural retreat, by the lovers, Orazio and Fabrizio, [Baragli and Marra] and the castle [illegible] of the fortress is compelled to surrender at discretion. Then the happiness of the lovers and ... The best portion of the music lies in the [illegible] "Finale" [illegible], especially the concerted [illegible] commencing "Signor, credetemi" and is likely to become very popular. The gem of the opera occurs in the second act, when the daughters and the aunt before poor Cola to sin by taking them to the Carnival. The music is in the form of a canon and quartet for two soprani, mezzo-soprano and [illegible], and is both effective and original. The another [illegible] of this act, beginning "Donne non [illegible]," in which the entire dramatis persone take part ... one of the [illegible] and most pleasing numbers—the more so that the somewhat prohibitive one with which he are really made. The third act affords Signor Ronconi an opportunity for displaying his uproarious [illegible] comic resources. In the last scene occurs a passage "Ogni ..." which is one of the best pieces of buffo-writing extant. The [illegible] in the opera rather contributes [illegible] to the general harmony than shine as particular morceaux. "Il Carnevale" differs from "Crispino" chiefly in this very absence of detached arias for the [illegible] voices, and in the great amount of ensemble music. The music throughout the [illegible] and most dance-like and the composer has caught the [illegible] of the national character in its "hours of ease."

Philadelphia, April 1.—The following was the programme of the 2d Concert of the Mendelssohn Society given last Saturday evening at the Musical Fund Hall:

Overture "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Germania Orchestra.
Grand Chorus for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
Spring Song; Song without Words, No. 6	Mendelssohn.
Germania Orchestra.
Trio from [illegible] "... Venus"	Verdi.
La Carità; Soprano Solo and Chorus	Rossini.
Four-Part Song "Early Spring"	Mendelssohn.
"The Three Gypsies" Chorus	Mendelssohn.
Grand Choral Fantasia	Beethoven.
For Piano Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
Pianist ... Thunder

By these performances which were mainly experimental, and which, so far as the Society is concerned, have been successes, Mr. Lord and his able and experienced conductor Mr. H. G. Thunder, have demonstrated their fitness for the difficult task assumed by them of organizing and developing a real singing society. The "Mendelssohn" has already taken its position as an amiable and prosperous rival of the older "Handel and Haydn," and there seems to be sufficient esprit among its members as well as energy in the directors, to ensure the stability of the organization. The Society numbers among its members several soloists of great promise, whose first appearances have been made under its auspices. Two of these, Misses Gormley and Forbes possess voices of unusual power and sweetness and will doubtless soon occupy a prominent position among our Philadelphia singers. These ladies are both pupils of Mr. Thunder long and favorably known as one of our most intelligent and thorough musicians, whose performance of the Beethoven Choral Fantasia at this concert let me once more be commended.

The Turner-Stein and Endgrell opera is the attraction for the coming week. Trovatore, Norma and The Barber being promised for the first three performances. Our public will regret the substitution of Parepa-Rosa [illegible] for Adelaide Phillips in these representations.

Mr. Carl Rosen, pupil of Mr. Wolfsohn, announced a concert on Friday evening, April 12, at the Musical Fund, with this programme:

Piano Solo, Scherzo, B-flat minor, op. 31	Chopin.
Mr. Carl Rosen.
Songs, { a. I hear a small bird calling	Mendelssohn.
Miss Augusta Rosen.
Violin Solo, Les Regrets	Leonhard.
Mr. Wenzel Kopta.
Cavatina, (Ebben, ... "Per ... lagri")	Petrella.
Miss Clara Prindwood.
Rondeau brillant, op. 62	Weber.
Mr. Rosen.
Serenade, (Transcription) The Bedouin ...	...
Miss Rosen.
Violin Solo, The Witches Dance	Paganini.
Mr. Kopta.
Song [illegible]	Brinsmead.
Mad. Brinsmead.
Piano Solo { a. Serenade, op. 35, No. 5	Heller.
Mr. Rosen.
Song, [illegible]
Written for this song by ...	Schubert.
Duo for two Pianos, A ... of the Dance
Mad. A... and Mr. Carl Rosen.

Mr. Kopta, the principal attraction, has created quite a sensation by his performances elsewhere, and his debut here is awaited with much interest.

The "Germania" for their Rehearsal to-morrow afternoon, present this programme:

Overture, La Dame de Haute ...	Auber.
Cornet Solo (An Songs)	Voss.
Cupid's ... Waltzes	Gungl.
Symphony, Consecration of Sounds, (Finale)	Spohr.
Overture, Antigone	Mendelssohn.
Introduction and Duet, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai.
	Bernard Bach.
	Meretrix.

Farmington Conn. The pupils of Mr. Karl Klauser, the excellent teacher in Miss Porter's young ladies' school, who for many years has done so much to keep up a high classical tone among them, gave a Soirée on the 18th of March with the following choice programme:

Overture "Egmont" for 4 hands	Beethoven.
Nocturne, Duet	Mendelssohn.
Ballad in F major, op. 38	Chopin.
Fantasia and Fugue in ...	Mozart.
Twelfth Night Serenade	Meyerbeer.
Duet and Chorus	Bishop.
Rondo from op. 70 (Wanderer) ...	Beethoven.
Invocation, C sharp minor, op. 26 No. 1	Chopin.
Song	Schubert.
Andante and Scherzo from Symphony in C for 4 hands	Schubert.

Equally interesting were two concerts given at the same school (April 1 and 2) by Messrs. Mills and Thomas of New York who, though crowded with business before the departure for Europe, managed to pay a farewell visit to the admired Klauser's pupils. These were the 31st and 32nd of the regular Classical Concerts; programmes as follows,—

SOLOS.

Sonata, E flat, piano and violin	Mozart.
Sonata ..., op. 26, for piano	Beethoven.
Romanza for violin, in ..., op. 40	Beethoven.
Romance from the E minor Concerto, op. 11	Chopin.
Fantasie for piano, op. 49	Chopin.
Sonata [Kreutzer], op. 47, for piano and violin	Beethoven.

MISCELL.

Sonata in A, op. 12, No. 2 piano and violin	Beethoven.
Paraphrase, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Liszt.
Simple Serenade in A ...	Taubert.
"The Abendlied" ... op. 11	Schumann.
Valse in D flat, op. 64, No. 1	Chopin.
Serenade piano and violin, [illegible]	...

Worcester. On the evening of Fast Day the "Choral Union" (composed of the old "Mozart" and "Beethoven" Societies) gave a concert to an audience which packed Mechanics' Hall. The first part was miscellaneous. A Mendelssohn Organ Sonata (Mr. E. B. Parkhurst); Cavatina from I Puritani (Mrs. Smith); Recit. and Aria by Mozart (Mrs. Munroe), "O rest in the Lord," from Elijah (Do.); Recit. and Aria (Mr. James Whitney); and choruses from Elijah.

Part II consisted of the music to Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," adapted to the wholly different subject of "England" by the accomplished [illegible] librettist of our English concert-books. It was sung without orchestra with good piano accompaniment by Mr. B. D. Allen, Carl Zerrahn conducting. The Symphony was exceedingly well performed.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Hail, glorious Apostle. (Hymn for St. Patrick's day.) T. Comer. 40

A glorification of Ireland's great apostle, whom we all reverence. There are quite a number of verses, which go rapidly in the spirited air of "St. Patrick's day in the morning." Arranged for chorus.

Fall of Fun. Song. H. Paul. 30

About a man whose individual good nature, and fancy ways, caused people to shake their sides for twenty miles around, where he began a joke.

Fairy voices and dreams of beauty. (Ah! ...) Cavatina. Mercadante. 60

Is a difficult, yet not beyond the reach of any one with a flexible voice, and would, probably be very effective as an exhibition piece.

Harvest day. "Tale the bristle rolling," "Harvest scheme." Coxeme. 40

Another of a very charming series, with an elegant movement of melody. The merry harvest maidens sing as they bring the sheaves, and do not forget to drop, now and then, a bundle for the gleaner. English words as in the song above, by T. ...

Beautiful Nell, sing on. Song. T. H. Howe. 30

Somebody's heart. Song. C. A. White. 30

Two good songs, by well-known composers.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Idaho Wise Lancers Quadrilles. Godfrey. 60

Godfrey's compositions are getting to be widely known, and he can hardly be accused, as far of making one pale piece. Try this while it is new.

La Venice and Carolina. Quadrille. Morn. 40

An old title, but the music is spirited and pleasing.

Wood and Polka, by D'Albert. For 3 performers. Rimbault. 75

Is a very pretty sight to view three young performers at one piano, with their nimble fingers keeping time together. This new piece, which is brilliant and not difficult, is excellent for practice, and good every way.

Palermo Quadrille by D'Albert. For 3 performers, by Rimbault. 75

Like the above, very brilliant, and a useful lesson piece.

Mendelssohn's Wedding March. For 3 performers by Rimbault. 1

Needs no recommendation or description further than saying that the triple arrangement makes it a very easy and quite within the small hands of young players.

Falling spray. Tremolo. L. M. Harvey. 50

Very effective as played by Mrs. Harvey and will, doubtless, be a favorite.

Mabel Waltzes. Piano and Violin. Godfrey.

Arranged for Soirée concerts. The two instruments agree wonderfully well, when fairly played.

Daisy Dean Quickstep. C. Faringer. 30

Books.

The Orchestra. A collection of Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Contra Dances, Polka Redowas, Schottisches, Marches, and Serenade Pieces. Arranged for Two Violins, Clarinet, Cornet and Bass. In five books. (One for each instrument.) For the Set, complete. $6.00

A [illegible] of new and favorite music, for small orchestras.

Music by Mail.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Programme Music.

The difficult question how far instrumental music may go [illegible] in the representation of thoughts and situations is often regarded in too narrow a spirit. It is absurd to suppose that a composer takes up his pen with the miserable intention of expressing or depicting this or that actual fact. But let us not [illegible] undervalue the force of external influences and impressions. An idea will often act unconsciously on the musical imagination, the eye will often influence the ear; and the eye, being the most active of our organs, keeps constantly mirroring the outlines of objects amongst the melodies and harmonies, which, as the music advances, become shaped and moulded into definite forms. The more the musical element associates with itself thoughts and images such as [illegible] the more poetical and picturesque will be the composition; and the more imaginative and exact in the conception of the composer the more will he arouse and exalt his hearers. What is to prevent Beethoven, in the midst of his conceptions, being suddenly possessed by the idea of immortality? Why should his inspiration not be kindled by the image of a mighty hero? Or why [illegible] some other composer not to be inspired by the recollection of happier times gone by? Are we to be ungrateful to Shakespeare because he has evoked from a young musician a work worthy of himself? or, in a word, shall we be unmindful of Nature, and deny how much we owe to her beauty and her majesty? Can music tell us nothing of Italy, of the Alps, of the ocean, of a spring morning?

It is even possible for music to derive a charm from images so distinct as to make it very likely that they can be expressed. I was told by a composer that while writing a certain little piece he was continually haunted by the image of a butterfly swimming down a stream on a leaf, and this gave the music a delicacy and naïveté which nothing could give but an actual image of the kind. In such exquisite genre-painting Schubert was a master; and I cannot resist recalling how a friend of mine, and whom I was playing over Schubert's four-hand marches, on my asking if he had not definite figures before his mind, answered by saying: "Certainly; I was at Seville, a century ago, among the dons and dames promenading in long pointed shoes, rapiers, and all the rest." And the remarkable thing is, that I was myself seeing the same vision! Pardon me, reader, and bespeak not my pure parable.

Programme or no programme, the one question is, "Has the music anything in it? above all, has it genius in it?"

Requisites for a Good Performance.

Think for a moment what circumstances must concur in order that a fine composition may be heard to full dignity and glory. There must be, first, in the work itself and deep intention [illegible] [illegible] in its composition; next, enthusiasm in the execution, thereby [illegible] in the performers—the whole orchestra playing like one man, fired by an inward striving and moved by one [illegible]; on the part of both hearer and listener, audience and artist, the exact mood; but at the moment, lastly, a thoroughly happy combination of all circumstances of time and space, conducive to seeing and feeling, &c.; finally the power of evoking and communicating one's impressions, feelings and ideas, and of seeing one's pleasure reflected in the faces of one's friends.

Such a concordance is almost like throwing sixes, and each turning up six.

Miscellaneous.

Composers, like mothers, often love those of their offspring best which have given them most trouble.

A man who is acquainted with Shakespeare and Jean Paul, will make very different music from one whose sole instruction has been Marpurg, and the contrapuntists; and the same is true of one who has mixed in the full stream of life and another who believes the Professor of harmonies to be the ideal of all possible excellence—even though the abilities of the two are equally good, and their studies equally arduous.

3.

The Song is perhaps the only branch of music in which any really important progress has been made since Beethoven.

4. Composing for the Stage.

A young Composer who attempts for the first time to write for the Stage has two things to keep expressly in view,—first, to employ all he has that he is master of, and next, so to employ it as to make an effect and please the public. The first of these is no more than the rule of the second. How much that one has learnt and is able to do must be suppressed and relinquished when the object is to please such audiences and [illegible]! An opera is no trifle. Set him to the best musician to write for the theatre for the first time, and he will make a hundred blunders. He is bound not to do too much. He must give his singers opportunities for repose. His orchestra must have its proper pauses. The mechanical features of the stage, and the laws of the boards, what consideration, and experience do they not require! Before the composer can think of the public, the manager must be satisfied. How much fine music has often to be sacrificed because the composer thought only of his music and not of the boards he was writing for. Much weary labor must indeed be gone through before a piece can come before the audience in a really effective shape.

Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.

BY [illegible] J. C. LOBE.

(Translated for Dwight's Journal from Die Gartenlaube.)

It was the beginning of November in the year 1821, when three members of the Weimar Court Band, one of them the writer of these lines, in obedience to a summons from His Excellency, the Privy-Councillor von Goethe, were ushered by the servant into the reception room, in the front of his house, opening upon the Frauenplan.

Three desks stood ready for us at the side of the opened piano. Upon the latter lay a bundle of manuscript music-pages. Curious as I always was about all matters connected with music, I peered over the leaves of the different pieces, and read "Studies in double Counterpoint;" on another sheet, "Fugues;" on a third, "Canons." Then came "Quartet for the piano, with accompaniment of violin, bass-viol, and violoncello." On all the pieces was the name, "Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy." The notes were written in a fine, neat hand, and so far as I could tell by a rapid, cursory examination, the compositions showed an expert, educated artist. The name Mendelssohn was unknown to me as that of a musician.

We had taken our instruments from their cases and were tuning them in accord with the piano by way of preliminary, when there entered a tall man who, on account of his stiff military carriage might well have been taken for an old [illegible] cavalry sergeant. He was not, however, a stranger to me,—I had visited him the year before in Berlin,—it was Professor Zelter, the well-known director of the Berlin Musical Academy, Goethe's intimate friend and companion.

He greeted us all courteously, myself as an "old acquaintance."

"I have come here, gentlemen," he continued, "in order to make a request of you as an introduction. You will presently become acquainted with a lad, of only twelve years old, my pupil, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. He is skilful as a performer upon the piano, and will more his talent for composition, will probably astonish you even more. The boy is however of a peculiar disposition. The loud applause of an audience of amateurs produces no impression upon him, but he is eagerly on the watch for the judgment of real musicians, and accepts every such criticism as [illegible]; for a childish nature is still too inexperienced to be able to distinguish between good-natured encouragement and well-meant opposition. Therefore, gentlemen, if you should possibly be exacted to the height of a song of praise,—which I at the same time equally hope for and fear,—I beg you to pitch it in a moderate key, with not too loud an accompaniment in fine, in C sharp, [a transposition for C major?—Ed.] the most natural note in the scale. Thus far I have been able to guard him from vanity and too high an estimate of his talents,—those miserable enemies of all artistic progress."

Before we could make any reply to this somewhat peculiar address, the lad Felix came springing into the room,—a handsome, buoyant boy, with a decidedly Jewish cast of features, slender and active. Thick, wavy, black hair fell upon his shoulders, goodness and animation sparkled in his eyes. He looked at us a moment inquiringly, then came to us, and gave his hand to each with friendly confidence, as if we were old acquaintances.

With Felix had also entered Goethe, who returned our respectful bow with a friendly greeting.

"My friend," said he turning his back toward Zelter, "has brought with him a little gentleman from Berlin who has already given us to-day a great surprise as a performer. Now we shall also make his acquaintance as a composer, and for this I must ask your cooperation. Let us hear then, my child, what thy young head has produced," he continued, gently stroking the lad's long, glossy locks.

The latter ran immediately to his notes, placed our parts before us on the music-stands, opened the principal part upon the desk of the pianoforte, and took his place quickly on the stool before the instrument. Zelter stationed himself behind Felix, to be ready to turn the leaves of his notes. Goethe went places to one side, with his hand behind his back. The little composer glanced toward us with sparkling eyes, we had the instruments [illegible] strings of our instruments, an inclination of his dark locks, and the performance began.

Goethe listened to every note with the keenest attention, but without remark, except perhaps at the end of a phrase an occasional "Good!" or "Bravo," which he accompanied by a kindly nod of approval. Mindful of Zelter's warning, we also only by our gratified looks ventured our approval to the child, whose countenance glowed with an ever-deepening [illegible], as the performance progressed.

When the last composition came to an end, Felix sprang from his seat, and turned to each in succession with a questioning look. He seemed to wish to hear some expression of opinion, as to his performance. Goethe, however, probably instructed by Zelter, took up the conversation, and said to Felix,—

"Bravo, my son! The countenances of these gentlemen," motioning toward us, "express plainly enough that your compositions have pleased them well. Go, now, into the garden where they are waiting you, and refresh and cool yourself for your [illegible]!"

Without reply, the boy darted from the room. As we looked inquiringly toward Goethe, to see whether we were to be dismissed he said:—

"Remain, gentlemen. I [illegible] gentlemen. My friend and I wish to hear your opinion of the lad's compositions."

A conversation of some length then passed between us, the details of which I am [illegible] no longer able to give, after the lapse of so many years, especially as I find no memoranda of them in my note-book. Many arguments and sentences, however, have remained imprinted upon my memory, for my later and more intimate relations with Mendelssohn frequently gave me occasion to call to mind my first meeting with him.

Goethe expressed his regret that we had so short an acquaintance with the little fellow only in concerted pieces. "In these musical prodigies," said he, "we nowadays, so far as regards technical skill, no longer so great [illegible] but what this little man achieves in the execution of fantasias, and of pieces at sight, borders upon the wonderful, and I could never have believed it possible for one of such tender years."

"And yet at Frankfort you heard Mozart in his seventh year!" cried Zelter.

"Yes," rejoined Goethe, "at that time I was myself only twelve years of age, and most certainly I, like all the rest of the world, was in the highest degree astonished by his extraordinary proficiency. What your pupil, however, already achieves, bears the same relation to the performance of Mozart at that age which the cultivated language of a man does to the lispings of an infant!"

"Certainly," said Zelter, smiling, "so far as mere manual execution is concerned. Felix plays at sight, as a simple exercise, and without missing a single note, compositions by which Mozart in his day transported the world with astonishment. But still many others can do this also. What I look at, however, is the creative genius of the lad, and—gentlemen," continued he, turning to us, "what think you of his quartet composition?"

We declared on our part, with fullest conviction, that Felix had shown many more original thoughts than had Mozart at the same age, for the latter had then produced nothing but threefold imitations of what already existed. Accordingly we had a right to conclude that the world would here, a [illegible] a second and greater Mozart, and that the more surely because he was in full enjoyment of exuberant health, while all other outward circumstances were favorable.

"May it be so!" said Goethe. "But who can say how a soul may develop itself in the lapse of years? We have seen so many talents, giving such fair promise of future achievements, go astray and deceive and disappoint our high expectations. From such and from, however, we may hope that this youthful genius will be guarded by the teacher whose good fortune has given him to Zelter."

"I strive to be very strict with the boy," said Zelter, "and, [illegible] his own independent labors, seek to hold him in check by the pursuit of rigid counterpoint studies. But how long can this continue before he escapes my discipline? Even now I can teach him nothing more of essential importance,—and once free, then first will it be manifest in what direction his own guidance will lead him."

"Yes, and especially," said Goethe, "in the exuberance of a teacher a problematical matter. Whatever the artist creates, which is truly great and original, he can only find within himself. To what teachers do you think Raphael, Michael Angelo, Haydn, Mozart, and all world-renowned masters, have owed their immortal creations?"

"It is true," remarked Zelter, "many have begun like Mozart, but as yet no one has equalled him in contrapuntal achievements." (Of Beethoven no mention was made, and therefore we have not mentioned his name.)

"Felix has imagination, feeling, and technical ability all in an unusual degree. In everything that he does, he manifests good sense and sharpness, and certainly for those [illegible] ideas, but as yet it is only pretty music which still creeps upon the earth; we do not yet hear in it the accents of genius. In this I have not deceived myself. Do you not think so, gentlemen?" As he himself had expressed the opinion, we could not but assent. "But I can tell you to add, in his early [illegible] compositions, too, those accents were not yet audible."

I also hazarded the question whether this quartet, as we had heard it, was entirely the child's own work.

"Yes, indeed," rejoined Zelter; "every note written by his own hand, and—treated too, entirely by his own mind.

"What you have heard he has just completed without any assistance whatever. I know not the principle of many teachers. In order to exalt themselves in teaching, they revise and correct the productions of their pupils until little or nothing remains of the ideas of the latter and then give them out as the work of the scholars. That is nothing but disgraceful swindling and charlatanry. They deceive not only the musical public and the public, but also the pupils themselves, who readily imagine that they have done everything themselves. It is an evil which has already proved the ruin of many a talent really of a high order, and hampered it in the higher development of its powers. My pupil, however, I leave to his own resources; I let him do what he is able to do at the time. In this way the desire of creating remains ever fresh and active, because of the zest of his [illegible] therein, [illegible] with what he has done and the pleasure which he takes in his success, is not embittered by criticism. There comes soon enough of itself. The judgment grows and expands, and with the means the inducement to break and better production. In this way, has this lad of twelve already written more than many a man of thirty. Let them out as I will, there they are, the necessary steps, which no one, not even the greatest genius, can do without or spring over. If Heaven shall only guard for us that rare plant from all baleful influences, more assuredly will it unfold itself as a bright exemplar of genius and beauty!"

This is all I can remember of that conversation.

The boy had grown to a man. I had watched with interest the constant rise of his reputation and fame; had enjoyed such a [illegible] of his compositions as they appeared one after another, each one more important, more elaborate than its predecessor, but for seventeen years I had not seen their author personally. Now he was the celebrated Director of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, which by his talent and ability had been raised to such pre-eminence. Of all this the performances of the orchestra, under the baton of Mendelssohn as leader, had become renowned as the very best which could be heard in the way of concert, overtures, symphonies and delicately-elaborated execution of concerted music. What wonder that I longed to participate in the pleasure? So I set to work and wrote a composition for grand orchestra, and after it was completed applied by letter to Mendelssohn with the request that I might be allowed to bring it forward in the Gewandhaus. I spoke of no pecuniary compensation, but only expressed the wish that I might myself direct the rehearsals and performance of my composition.

I soon afterward received a friendly letter from Mendelssohn, in which he informed me that my composition had been received with favor, its performance decided upon, and that it would also be very agreeable to the direction if I myself would bring it before the public. I mention this letter particularly, on account of a paragraph which characterizes his nature, so noble, amiable, ever tender, and ever ready to render assistance to the utmost of his power, especially to those of his own profession. He writes: "It seems to me desirable also, that a remuneration—though at least to cover some portion of your travelling expenses—should be offered to you, although you say nothing of this. Our means are, it must be confessed, very limited; nevertheless I thought this might not be unwelcome to you, and I also understand that the directors are of the same opinion." This was in November, 1838.

Soon afterward I came to Leipzig with my piece. Mendelssohn received me in the most friendly and cordial manner, and, during the rehearsals assisted me with his advice most zealously in order to render the final execution of the piece as perfect as possible. When on the eventful evening he came to me in the orchestra, and perceived the state of nervous excitement in which I was, he said,—

"You seem to be anxious."

"Indeed I am most heartily anxious," I rejoined.

"Ah, bah!" said he, "there is no need of anything of that sort. Your work is good; that you know as a matter of course. And what the public may receive to-day what will that amount to? Do we ask for our lot as that has so often befallen the greatest masters of all times with their very best works?"

My composition received at the Leipzig rehearsal and [illegible] Fortune. I was most thoroughly dissatisfied, and from that time forward renounced the pleasures of composition.

Subsequently I passed many a happy hour with Mendelssohn. He came frequently to Weimar, and on those occasions he played his most recent compositions to us and many of his most particular friends, either at my own house, or that of the then music-master Montag. But he always forbade any larger assemblies at such times.

"Let us have some music this evening," he used to say, "but quite by ourselves. It would be a great bore to have all our coats and play in our short-sleeves." One evening I did not come home from the rehearsal of an opera until ten o'clock. While hastening from my wife met me with the question,—

"Who do you think has been here? Mendelssohn! He is passing through the city." (If I am not mistaken, this was on his bridal tour to Frankfort.) "and was sadly disappointed not to find you. 'I'll tell you what, my dear Frau Lobe,' said he, 'I will spend the two hours which I have to wait here before the post goes out, with you, and, if agreeable, will play something for you.' So he seated himself at the piano, and for two whole hours, almost without interruption, played the most beautiful pieces for me alone, and extemporized divinely."

One may well imagine that my wife has not forgotten nor ceased to be proud of that evening. At another time we had some music at Montag's house. Mendelssohn played his D minor Trio. Then we undertook a quintet of my own composition, and in this he played the second violin very correctly and skilfully. When opportunity offered, however, he sought in other ways, also, to do me some kindness or service. Thus, for example, he spoke most favorably of the above-mentioned quintet to my noble patroness and benefactress in many ways, the Grand Duchess Maria Paulowna, who expressed that generous lady caused me a very handsome present, "in consequence," as she wrote, "of an honorable recognition of your professional exertions by Dr. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy."

TWENTY-SIX YEARS LATER.

It may perhaps be little known that this vigorous, healthy man seems to an extreme degree, always so cheerful, so happy in all his relations, and recognizing so clearly his good fortune, was at times impressed with the presentiment of an early death. When he was bringing forward his "Faulst" in the Cathedral at Weimar, we were sitting together one day after a rehearsal at his room at the "Erbprinz," and I—at that time an arrant hypochondriac—remarked that I would enjoy but little of his later compositions. He rejoined,—

"If, my dear friend, you will survive me many a day!" I laughed at this assertion of his, but he interrupted me more seriously and decidedly with the words "I shall not live to be an old man!" And then, as if he repented of that declaration, his features assumed their most cheerful expression and he changed the conversation to a discourse of the rehearsal just ended, in which he especially dwelt upon and extolled the zeal of and ready co-operation of all those associated with him in the performance.

How could I dream at that moment—when my companion was in but his fortieth year and the fulness of health—that a few years later his prophecy would be fulfilled. In 1847 I removed to Leipzic, and found him in glowing health and spirits, seemingly not in a very direction [illegible] joyous many an entertaining and instructive conversation with him, and one year after, in 1847, when only in his thirty-eighth year, twenty-one years after my first meeting with the handsome, spirited lad at Goethe's house, the great master was borne from his residence in the Königsstrasse, to the Paulus Church. Among the mourners who followed his bier was the writer of these facts.

A contemplative stroll down the New Cut, Lambeth, served to ensure an agreeable and amusing to find entertainment in the west, we had a peep at Harmony, and it was to the Oxford. The approach to this popular place of amusement is sufficiently showy. Here in profuse accordance with architectural rules. To the majority of our readers, who have been familiar, they have noticed it as they hurry to and from the city, and persons passing at a certain hour have possibly marvelled at the masses of lime, including trees, rocks, and fragments of paper [illegible] being sent from the arcade on to the pavement, or over the pockets [illegible] wary pedestrian. At the end of an arched and richly decorated passage, the sides of which are ornamented with looking-glasses rising from gilt pedestals, through a double staircase; and in the balcony, and beneath it are doors, respectively conducting to the stalls and area. As regards its internal appearance, the Oxford is a mass of colour to excite us from chandeliers, gilding and paint so combined as to form a whole generally pleasing, but with no great respect for received rules of art. The refreshment bars and supper rooms are on the left as you enter, and in conspicuous positions in front and on each side of the stage are numerous pegs and boxes handsomely fitted in Byzantine drapery. As with those at the Oxford and a superior storey, to see at the Canterbury and in sheets, thinly composed of the male sex. We believe, however, that the prices of admission are in both halls much about the same, being sixpence for the area and a shilling for the balcony and stalls.

At the time of our arrival, which was a little after nine, a negro gentleman, in consummation, came in, was in the middle of a comic song, the point of the purport of which we were unable to catch, and a burst the hurrah between the verses was carried, and, with one of those complicated saltatory movements familiar to the initiated as a "break down." The song being ended, the Nigerian retires, and "Tanged in red uniform, a selection from Balfe's opera "The Light Dragoons." Upon this the curtain rose in front of the stage, costumes were known aside and divers ladies and gentlemen occupying the band rooms, and lasting waiters appeared. The latter assumed a position facing the audience, the former being occupied a slightly raised platform at the rear, and the members of the chorus fell into order at the sides—the ladies in front, and the gentlemen behind. The conductor also stood near one of the proscenium boxes, glanced round to see that everything was in working order, waved his hand to ensure the requisite degree of silence, stamped lightly his foot lightly on the floor, and the performance commenced. It is not within our province to comment at length either upon the quality of the music, or the manner in which it was interpreted; it will be enough to remark that though containing much that is lively and agreeable, the "Light Dragoons" is rather deficient in originality, and so far as we can judge from the selection, inferior to the opera of "Lara," by the same author, which was produced a year or two ago at Her Majesty's Theatre. With regard to the merits of the performance, every one did well, but the honors of the evening were reserved for Miss Russell and Mr. A. St. Albyn. It may be as well to add, that the selection at the Canterbury are rendered by the same artists as those at the Oxford.

The opera being ended, the [illegible] of the evening resumed, bustled forward and met with deserved applause in some amusing "character" songs and burlesque representations of popular singers. He was succeeded by Mr. Reynolds, of the Coldstream band, who played effectively on the cornet, and at the conclusion of a ballad sung by Miss Fitzhenry—a tall young lady in a green moiré gown with a white satin border—the chairman wrapped decisively with his hammer, and announced a performance by the "great comedian" who had made such rapid efforts to burlesque Mr. Keen, at the Canterbury. His entertainment—a mixture of prose and doggerel rhyme—was received with marked coldness, but a supplementary effort pat and necessary, the [illegible] success of the audience and the animating performer [illegible] and a [illegible] of bones. However, he reappeared, and upon the occasion of a [illegible] bored such remarks in his jargon as calculated to appease the general ill-will [illegible]. He was extremely sorry he had done his best; had never met with such treatment before, and he felt that there was no ill feeling in the matter. He had but lately returned from Scotland, and had been absent from the metropolitan stage for many years. Yet had been, he was so extremely unwell that he ought never to have left his bed. Whereupon an energetic individual, of shewy pretensions, and an enviable power of lung, exclaimed "Then go home to bed." Never could the gossip [illegible]. But the motion was seconded, the "great comedian" retired, and as even several failures have a depressing effect upon the spirits, an arranged a spare copper or two in [illegible], and soon afterwards quitted the hall.

The astonishment that had resulted in such unpleasant consequences was also exploded, with which [illegible] upon [illegible] from a [illegible] song [illegible] reminiscences of the [illegible], and an [illegible] exercise. [illegible] all of the [illegible] of the various [illegible] had with whom the [illegible] professed, to have been at different periods of his life [illegible]. The audience endured a great deal of rubbish in a laudable manner, [illegible] that the [illegible] backs the back of their pockets was the following [illegible] effect of the comic Muse recited at the [illegible]: "The Cork Leg."

> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible] "That's the idea"

—a statement that appeared, general [illegible], and led as a frame for which the phenomenon may have been [illegible] that the [illegible]. It is consolatory to reflect that compositions of the kind above quoted are things of the past, and that, though there is still room for improvement, the popular taste has progressed [illegible].

Let those who regard teetotaller festivals with a jaundiced eye seek a remedy for their depression in a timely visit to the Alhambra. It is certainly the most cheerful as well as one of the best-conducted places of amusement in London. In such natural part articles need no description for those who are ignorant of the building in its present state, I am [illegible] which it [illegible] when [illegible] as a Panopticon [illegible] the [illegible] Panopticon of Science and Art. [illegible] is not only admirably appointed, and as nearly have [illegible], but, unlike most theatres, it is seldom [illegible] ventilated, and enjoys a happy [illegible] from offensive odours. The heavy chandelier which formerly hung from the roof has been replaced by an ornamental border of gas jets and a central light so arranged as to diffuse but little heat though it is at once picturesque and useful. The best is one of the best in London, and if utterly classical music is [illegible] you [illegible] a [illegible] and [illegible] performed in a manner to satisfy the most exacting connoisseur. The Alhambra ballets are not to be spoken of lightly. They are triumphs of art—salutary pictorial and mechanical. The glories of such productions as "King Hempery" and "The Hobgoblin Feast" are powers of fascination at distance. The "scene pantomime ballet" brought out at Christmas abounded with fine ask [illegible]. The most astonishing feats were performed by a [illegible] who impersonated a "troll" of an undeveloped type and peculiar habits; and to judge from the applause of the audience, the Clown, Harlequin, Pantaloon, and Columbine were as efficient as any in London. In "The Mountain Gorge" we have an Eastern ballet, and some useful hints to Mussulmans and Croesus. We learnt from it that guns are not only of service in a fight, but wonderfully efficacious in a dance, especially when handled by ladies; also, that there is a degree of picturesqueness in an arrangement by moonlight, which can be duly appreciated only when we are in perfect good humour with ourselves and neighbours, and untroubled by any fear of the [illegible] Tartar Court. The overhanging rocks, [illegible], clear waves and luminous atmosphere are miracles of scenery, and all thoughts of the paint-pot, brush or mechanical contrivance are effectually forbidden.

Whatever your position in the Alhambra, you will always see and hear to advantage. As much cannot be said even of our small or theatres, and it should be remembered that he was building in Leicester square is capable of accommodating as many as 3,000 persons. Not an inch of space is [illegible] at the back, and the [illegible] means of access to and escape from the various parts of the building [illegible]. [illegible] a half of a hundred feet long, and as [illegible] and [illegible] by every [illegible] with the [illegible]. The prices of admission are moderate, and range from sixpence for the upper balcony to three or four guineas for a commodious private box. We may add that, for the convenience of those who object to mixing with the crowd, reserved seats have been provided, price four shillings each. Mr. Strange reckons it among the best and cheapest evening's amusement in London. There is comfort, amusement and everything is good of its kind. More than this we cannot say, unless it be further given to add that the Alhambra Palace is [illegible] the only redeeming feature of Leicester square.

On the site of an old fashioned inn, known as the White Lion, and [illegible] in the Edgeware road, and within half a [illegible] of the Marble Arch, there has been erected a handsome and spacious music hall bearing the title of The Metropolitan. Its internal arrangements are highly resemble those at the Alhambra, [illegible] on a [illegible] scale, and while the prices of admission are proportionately moderate—being sixpence to the area, [illegible] for the balcony and a shilling for the stalls—the accommodation is excellent and the entertainment generally of a superior order. Of late, the whole of the interior has been [illegible] re-decorated, the mall area has [illegible] in respectability, and the refreshments have undergone a marked and much-needed improvement.

There is a stage, supplied with a picturesque act drop and a fine stock of scenery, but too limited in extent to allow of any very spectacular display. The band though small is efficient and the entertainments include the usual allowance of [illegible] would-be comic songs, [illegible] and [illegible] dancing. "Mythological [illegible]" were announced at one time, but have been wisely discontinued. Ben Lion, [illegible] termed the "wonderful [illegible]," performs extraordinary feats with hoops and ball [illegible] from "[illegible]" and the sensational element is supplied by a [illegible] of [illegible] gentlemen who [illegible] in [illegible] and who [illegible] by the [illegible] on the [illegible].

The Jolly Nash [illegible] the [illegible] good-will of the audience and [illegible] a double encore, but has to apologize for not complying with further demand. The popular favorite seems to possess but a moderate share of talent, though much [illegible]. He has an air of [illegible] and good [illegible] which pleases his [illegible]. His efforts [illegible] of a [illegible] with his friends. When the audience join [illegible] chorus he smiles and keeps time with his hand. He is always [illegible] but to gratify reasonable desires, [illegible] his friends are [illegible] he [illegible] through [illegible] such pleasant terms as to carry [illegible] to [illegible] and arouse [illegible].

There are a couple of [illegible] some halls opposite the barracks at Knightsbridge. They are respectively entitled The Lion and The Trevor, and if the former is the more [illegible] conducted, the latter is decidedly the more amusing. The Sun has lately been rebuilt, and is now a commodious, well lighted, and [illegible] hall. Its a composite style of architecture, of which the most prominent features appear to be [illegible] Gothic extraction and classical [illegible] of utterly impossible men on [illegible] horses. The passage in the entrance is of a gorgeous and [illegible] only [illegible] conducts to a spacious [illegible] of the roof is supported by a couple of [illegible]

Grecis, who from the west [illegible] are formed after the manner of [illegible]. The hall itself, though spacious and substantial, serves much of the chapel. The "[illegible]" are approached by an underground passage, [illegible] of the catacombs at Kensal Green, and having reached them, and glancing backwards, you observe a large gallery, resembling the [illegible] of old fashioned churches. It is occupied by both medium and ordinary men, refreshing themselves with creature comforts, and attentively regarding the business of the stage.

The chairman, who occupies a raised seat in the "stalls," is strict in enforcing order, and it is pleasant to observe the snug little party which gathers round the table whereat he presides. In addition to being an energetic and courteous manager, he apparently possesses the gift of mental abstraction to an extraordinary degree, and even during the progress of a comic song he may be observed making notes and abstruse calculations with a degree of [illegible] as once unique and impressive.

The performances usually commence with an operatic selection, and conclude with a composition of soaring [illegible] the "War March of Priests," from Mendelssohn's "Athalia." It may be doubted whether music of so ambitious a cast comes within the scope even of the "greatly enlarged" orchestra, and we might have fancied that the audience would have preferred a waltz or a galop; but the conductor [illegible] his doctor on fact, and it is gratifying to think that classical music is already on its journey to Hammersmith.

The "company" at the Sun at Knightsbridge Music Hall appears to be made up of a few "stars" and a good many "sticks." Amongst the former are [illegible] [illegible] and Warde, who "[illegible] the house [illegible]," in a species of ditties followed by much [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the admirable, and the great Vance. With regard to the last-named gentleman [illegible] [illegible] has been [illegible] upon. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the "[illegible]." If he could conquer this propensity, by weightiness [illegible] the semblance of the "[illegible]," he would escape [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In the [illegible] of a [illegible] member of the [illegible] [illegible] he [illegible] perfectly [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] effectively [illegible] sight of all the character represented. There is no ease and nonchalance in the performance that are specially chosen up. Though the [illegible] of the [illegible] are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] some of the most [illegible] [illegible] are the most admirable [illegible] [illegible] apparently spontaneous. The "[illegible]," a perfect [illegible], every costume is appropriate, and the affected [illegible] and career of [illegible] are sufficiently marked; but not so decided as to degenerate into buffoonery. In "[illegible]" there is much to admire, particularly the [illegible] of the [illegible], the [illegible] [illegible], rapidly shifting changes of countenance, and gradual merging of awkward shyness into [illegible] [illegible]. The "[illegible]" is a [illegible] piece of [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]. The "great Vance" has an average voice, which he employs effectively. We have been told that he is not gifted with the 'professional' [illegible], but [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] [illegible] degree of success, and [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]; [illegible] by the majority of his [illegible], but he possesses a certain quaint originality which is incapable of being reproduced in other persons. We are acquainted with one gentleman who has [illegible] [illegible] so long as he refrains from action only [illegible] his mouth closed; [illegible] though, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] up, his performances [illegible] or later degenerate into unmeaning buffoonery; and though there may be something [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible], it is one of those efforts of genius to which [illegible] should not be had more than half a dozen times in five minutes.

A recent [illegible] of the London Missionary Society's press, at Hong Kong, has just been received by the Rev. John [illegible] of [illegible]. It is a small [illegible], consisting of about a dozen of our most favorite psalm tunes, such as [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Chinese [illegible] and the Notes. A [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at Hong-Kong has [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a Tonic Sol-fa [illegible] [illegible] in connection with [illegible] Church. In a letter which accompanies the little book, there is the following very interesting information:—"As I believe this to be almost the first attempt to teach the reading of music to these wonderful people, perhaps you will allow me a few words of explanation. Chinese hymns are very easily [illegible], [illegible] other nations are [illegible]. Therefore, nearly all the tunes I send you are written. Begin at the [illegible] end of the book, and read from right to left. The Chinese themselves have no notes and no idea of music. Their instruments can produce only two or three notes, and their singing is screeching in falsetto as no kind of tone. About six months ago, it was proposed to commence a singing class, in the hope of forming a choir for the Chinese service at Union Church. With the help of Dr. Legge (London Mission) and Mr. H. Abeg, a good number were gathered of all ages. A large 'Modulator' (pictorial representation of the scale used by sol-faists), was procured. An attempt had been made before to use our method, but the young gentleman who conducted it knew no Chinese, and Dr. Legge, no music, so it fell through. Sheets of [illegible] were used at first. When these became cumbrous, Dr. Legge kindly printed the tune-book. In the sight singing, if the tune be an easy one, as St. [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], it is perfectly sung the first time without error; if a difficult one, two or three trials may be required. Difficulties have been met with peculiar to the [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] were utterly [illegible] there. Why they asked, should a [illegible] [illegible] be up, and a grave note down? Their voices are harsh to a painful degree, and their talent for [illegible] wonderful. They must never be asked to go above F, and after half an hour's singing lose all command of their voices. They also [illegible] [illegible]. The notes fa and la [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] give them great trouble. Many means were [illegible] and most [illegible] ways of [illegible] them. All however are [illegible] to try. The class has now been introduced into one beautiful church, as a choir for the native service, and after a short struggle with the old principle, of each man singing as was good in his own eyes, the service of song is improved and improving.

OPERA. The annual proclamations of the rival managers are out, as loud and long as ever; and behold the Royal Italian (Covent Garden) actually opened on the [illegible] [illegible] with Norma, the principal role by Mme. [illegible], who won her English success in that last year; the other parts by Mad. [illegible], Signor [illegible] and [illegible]. Faust was to come next. Mr. Gye promises but one new piece: Gounod's Romeo and Juliet (with Adelina Patti); and Verdi's Don Carlos (with Pauline Lucca). The list of engagements furthermore includes Mlle. [illegible], Mlle. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] (first time in England), Miss Morensi (American), Mlle. Lablache and Mme. Dell' Anese. Messrs. Mario, Neri Baraldi, Naudin, Fancelli, Bossi, Mazzuo, Cotogni, Gardoni (the last three new to England). [illegible] Graziani, Capponi, [illegible] [illegible], [illegible], Ciampi, Coppetti, and (another first appearance) Bagagiolo. Of course Costa is conductor.

Her Majesty's opens this very day (the [illegible]) and Mr. Mapleson's proclamation is in sprendiloquent style worthy of an Gilmore. For prima donna assoluta he announces Titiens, Mlle. Nilsson (first appearance in England), Mlle. [illegible], from Hanover; Mlles. Sinico, [illegible] from Genoa, and [illegible] [illegible] Munich. For mezzo-soprani and contralti: Mme. Demeric Lablache, Mlle. [illegible] (new), from Madrid, Mlle. [illegible] (new) from Lisbon, and Mme. Trebelli Bettini. For tenors Mongini, Hohler, Tasca and [illegible]; baritones and basses: Santley, Tondo, Foli and Rokitansky. The operas promised are: Verdi's La Forza del Destino (first time) and I Lombardi; Rossini's Tell, Semiramide and Donna del Lago; Spontini's Vestale; Nicolai's Falstaff; Mozart's Don Giovanni and Nozze di Figaro; Gounod's Mireille; Meyerbeer's Dinorah and Huguenots; Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia; Beethoven's Fidelio; Weber's Oberon and Freyschütz; Cherubini's Medea; Bellini's Sonnambula. Sig. Arditi is conductor still.

The recent Concert record of London is so rich in interest that we must copy largely:

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. Herr Manns, the conductor of these popular entertainments, seems to have done more than any man to overcome the English prejudice against Schumann. Lately he has brought out Paradise and the Peri. The Musical World, still harping on the "laborious dullness" of this beautiful Cantata, says:

Nevertheless, the Schumann question is just now the most significant musical question of the day, and Herr Manns deserves the gratitude of the thinking public for allowing them such excellent opportunities of judging for themselves. With the exceptions [illegible] [illegible] he may be said to have [illegible] way; but, unhappily, his occasional chorus is by no means as efficient as his instrumental orchestra. Thus, while the instrumental part of the music was more satisfactory on Saturday than heretofore, the choral parts were not much better. Nor can it be forgotten that on the first introduction to England of Paradise and the Peri, at the Philharmonic Concerts, the music of the Peri was undertaken by Mme. Lind Goldschmidt, and sung in such a style as to render every [illegible] hopeless. A more [illegible] part was [illegible] [illegible] for a human voice; and this, on Saturday, was evidently felt by Mme. Lemmens Sherrington, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The other soprano was Miss Robertine Henderson, who does whatever may be assigned to her competent or [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] well. Miss Julia Elton was the contralto; Mr. Cummings—[illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible]—tenor, and Mr. Lewis Thomas principal bass baritone. The whole cantata, with the exception of a baritone air and a chorus in the third part, was performed; and the effect was [illegible] [illegible]. Nevertheless, the last movement in the second part obtained an encore from a [illegible] of the audience, which was accepted with eager alacrity by Herr Manns.

The same article goes on to show how interesting otherwise the Crystal Palace concerts are:

Far more interesting was the operation, at the preceding concert, of the exquisitely beautiful entr'acte from Schubert's Rosamunde, with the addition of an air de ballet which, in spite of its unaffected simplicity, was quite worthy of the rest. Such [illegible] [illegible] would make the fortune of many a composer who aimed no lower than opera bouffe. On this occasion Mme. Rudersdorff sang in [illegible], which, as before, was unanimously called for again. At the same concert Herr Joachim gave a magnificent reading of Beethoven's violin concerto; the best of the four overtures to the opera of Leonore (Fidelio) in its way—interesting as any of its successors, was performed; and Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's lovely [illegible] admirably written and brilliantly scored overture, In Memoriam, was repeated, creating even a [illegible] impression than at first. The work more than any other from his pen, justifies the high expectations we have always entertained of the young composer. In addition to Beethoven's concerto, Herr Joachim played the gavotte and charming [illegible] [illegible] from his [illegible] concerto, the whole of which was to have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] besides the prelude to J. S. Bach's violin sonata, No. 3, as arranged by the composer himself with orchestral accompaniment and styled "Sinfonia." By the way, of pianists we have had of course Mme. Schumann, who, with Beethoven's great concerto in E flat, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] in which as the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphony in D minor (No. 4) was included in the programme, as well as the finest of Mendelssohn's concert overtures Die Hebriden (Fingal's Cave) which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] been so perfectly executed. Mme. Madeleine [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] gave the audience of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] concerto of [illegible] Moscheles [illegible] [illegible] should be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] two concertos besides the "G minor" and that with the "Grand [illegible] March" as theme for finale the one chosen for the occasion by him [illegible]. To [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at another concert the second and most brilliant pianoforte concerto of Mozart [illegible] [illegible] admirably played by Mr. Franklin Taylor, who has more than once distinguished himself at the Crystal Palace, but never so conspicuously as by his fine performance of this splendid work. [illegible] the [illegible] of which he entered thoroughly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as his execution was correct and effective. On the same day the symphony was Beethoven's No. [illegible] the overture Wagner's Tannhäuser—to name two things in music more utterly opposed in every respect than which would be impossible. Which of the two is really music?—might be asked. [illegible] we are not. Add to all these two things a [illegible] Aria of Spohr executed in the noblest and most "classical" style by M. Sainton, who was, perhaps [illegible] playing so wonderfully well as now; Beethoven's Eighth Symphony (in F); Professor Bennett's concert overture the Naiads, and other pieces too numerous to specify. The fact is that the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts form a musical season, and a rich one, of themselves, and are enough to tempt any "Amateur," with means at disposal, to take up his residence at Sydenham for the sake of them.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The appointment of Mr. Cusins as Bennett's successor in the conductorship is far from being unanimously approved; but there seems to be a disposition to give him a fair trial, and that so consistently, so far as we [illegible] well. In the second concert an Orchestral Suite by Bach was played. The World says:

The series of concerts promises well. The directors are exhibiting unusual spirit. They have commissioned M. Gounod, Mr. Benedict and Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan to write new works expressly for the society; and last not least, Professor Bennett has consented to add a slow movement to his symphony in G minor, and thus to complete a composition from every point of view remarkable. Beethoven's Choral Symphony is to be given at the fourth concert. At the second (on Monday), among other things, the same master's fourth symphony was performed; and Mlle. Mehlig, the young pianist who was last year so successful at one of Benedict's [illegible] concerts, played the concerto in D of Mendelssohn.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. The first concert of the season offered Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, Haydn's Symphony in E flat (one of the "Twelve"), Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, Schumann's "Gipsy Life" Chorus, and Wallace's Maritana overture. There was a chorus of 60 professional singers with a splendid orchestra, conducted by Alfred Mellon (whose death is reported only a few days later.) The critic there quoted, says:

In the concerto and fantasia the pianist was Mme. Schumann, whose preference in the former of Mozart's exclusive version is the [illegible] cadenza of Cramer and Hummel [illegible] equal [illegible]. The effect is not always be infinitely better; but [illegible] it is impossible for us to know how Mozart may have embellished his own [illegible] in certain passages, and [illegible] we could [illegible] in the same manner in any other manner as well. Mme. Schumann introduced two cadenzas of her own, the first of moderate length, the second reasonably brief, played with her accustomed energy, and was received with the accustomed favor. In the Choral Fantasia neither the solo nor the orchestral accompaniment were all that could be wished.

MR. J. A. CHAPPELL'S Grand Orchestral Concert on Thursday night, at St. James's Hall, was a brilliant success. A fine performance was that of Schubert's great symphony in C, by the Crystal Palace Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Manns, who never directed it better. The Triple concerto of Beethoven, with MM. Hallé, Joachim, and Piatti at the solo instruments, was also a great treat; and perhaps Herr Joachim played Spohr's "Concerto Cantante" better than when he last performed it. The singing—by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Cummings—was excellent, and the concert ended brilliantly with the brilliant overture to Oberon.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR. Mr. Henry Leslie's second performance of Antigone (St. James's Hall) was much better than the first. On this occasion only so much of the dialogue was recited as seemed absolutely indispensable in connection with the music of Mendelssohn, by which a great deal of time was gained, and the effect of the music in no way impaired. A few sentences of recital explained the leading incidents of the scenes, and these, like the connecting dialogue, were delivered by Mr. Walworth in a thoroughly unexceptionable manner. The audience seemed to like the Antigone even better than before. Not only was the magnificent "Hymn to Bacchus" encored, but also the beautiful "Ode to Eros" (sung by Messrs. Cummings, F. Walker, Chaplin Henry and Smythson). After this success, for which Mr. Henry Leslie has labored so zealously, the Œdipus must surely follow. The concert was otherwise highly interesting, including among other things, Cherubini's overture to Les deux Journées and Weber's to Oberon, Beethoven's fourth piano forte concerto (in G), played with wonderful fineness and accuracy by Mr. Charles Hallé, though somewhat carelessly accompanied by the orchestra; and songs by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Cummings.

THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS ended in a benefit to Mr. Arthur Chappell, the director, with a very remarkable programme, the leading piece being Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianos, played by Mme. Clara Schumann, Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé. (Moscheles, Thalberg and Mendelssohn played it in London in 18[illegible]; here in Boston it was played in 18[illegible] by Jaell, Scharfenberg and Dresel.) The Morning Star says:

Steadily and simultaneously, as if the three keyboards had been worked by one pair of hands, the piano proceeded into [illegible] instruments which formed the orchestra of the occasion (played by Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Piatti, and Reynolds) accompany the piano in one with the same unremitting precision, and the audience remained spell-bound until the last bar came to an end with one of those ringing effects peculiar to the [illegible] of which John Sebastian Bach was so [illegible] example. Then rapturous cheers broke forth, together with various tokens of earnest appreciation and a summons for the performers to appear again, a through the hall which was responded to first by Mme. Schumann and Mr. Hallé, and then by our English pianist Arabella Goddard. It is impossible that any event more thoroughly splendid and perfect of its kind can have taken place at any public entertainment in the world.

The other performances which constituted a bill of fare prodigious in length as in quality have [illegible] which will be recognized by the [illegible] attention. There was Beethoven's [illegible] in E major (Op. 1[illegible]) played by Messrs. Joachim, [illegible] Ries and Piatti in the finest style of these well-matched [illegible]; there were several of these [illegible] from Bach's [illegible] which Mr. Charles Hallé executes in so [illegible] and accurate [illegible]; Spohr's graceful barcarolle and scherzo for violin, given with Herr Joachim's own [illegible] tone and expression; a nocturne by Chopin, and the scherzo from Weber's pianoforte sonata in A flat, performed by Mme. Schumann; and Beethoven's [illegible] in A major played [illegible] by Joachim, and [illegible] by the [illegible] close of [illegible] Miss Edith Wynne fulfilled the not too grateful task of singing four songs, alternating with the instrumental pieces of the more engrossing kind [illegible] a manner which won unanimous approbation. Lastly there was Haydn's string quartet in D major, Op. 1[illegible] No. [illegible], with the favorite vocal variations, of all things best calculated to bring a concert to a jubilant termination.

DEATH OF ALFRED MELLON. After a brief but severe illness Mr. Alfred Mellon died on Wednesday night, at a quarter to twelve, at his residence in The Vale, King's Road, Chelsea. The indisposition that proved fatal was a relapse from a previous illness which had lasted through a great part of the autumn and early winter of 1866, and from which he was hoped he had entirely recovered. By the death of Mr. Mellon the musical profession has lost the most genuinely and justly esteemed of our English orchestral conductors. From his first arrival in London, some three or four and twenty years ago, his aptitude for the [illegible] of the conductor's office was manifested, and much of his experience was gained by his forming the small orchestra of the Adelphi Theatre. His first independent undertaking was the Orchestral Union, under which name a society was established whose concerts, with a small but well-balanced orchestra, conducted by himself, speedily attracted a wide and legitimate reputation—a reputation more than confirmed when the numerical strength of the orchestra being materially increased, he was enabled to give some of the finest performances of classical music that had ever been heard in England. Indeed although Mr. Mellon held a high position at the Royal Italian Opera from the first, it was in the Orchestral Union that he chiefly achieved his deserved fame as a conductor. This led to his being engaged as musical director at the Royal English Opera, originally set on foot by Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison at the Lyceum Theatre in 1857, and afterwards removed to Covent Garden,—a speculation which, though it did not ultimately prove entirely successful, served English operatic music, and, with more liberal support from the public, might have laid the solid foundation of a national lyric theatre. As a conductor of opera Mr. Mellon was as good as anybody; first class as a conductor of orchestral music; and this was shown to a later period when, at the head of the musical department of the English Opera Company, it was his duty to prepare the representation, not only several English works of importance, but also the English version of Meyerbeer's Africaine. Mr. Mellon's great ability was, perhaps, never more emphatically proclaimed than at the concerts of the Musical Society of London, which he directed from the beginning, and at which he had perhaps the grandest orchestra ever assembled that is, in that time had ever been assembled in a London concert room. Even now the magnificent performances, under his direction, of Spohr's great symphony, the Consecration of Sound, is remembered; and many are the triumphs in a similar direction which he subsequently achieved. His ability as a caterer for the public is scarcely less favorably exemplified by his Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, where the judicious intermixture of "classical" with "popular" music, as well as the admirable performance of his orchestra, met with unanimous recognition. In addition, moreover, to other various duties, Mr. Mellon had recently accepted the conductorship of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, celebrated among the first musical institutions in the country. Here his silent and active [illegible] attention to business produced the most good results as elsewhere, and his loss will be severely felt.

As a musician Mr. Alfred Mellon held a distinguished and well-earned position. Under Herr Molique as his master, he made himself master of all the technical resources of his art, and many compositions from his pen, in the shape of quartets, &c., showed his ability to use them to excellent purpose. As a man he was universally esteemed, and as a friend his loss will be long and earnestly regretted. He died at the age of 46. It is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Mellon was the husband of one of the most popular and admirable actresses of our time.—Times.

MUSIC AT THE FRENCH EXHIBITION. We learn by the statement recently published by the Imperial Commission that the musical art will be represented at the Exhibition in the threefold view of its composition, execution and history. French and foreign composers are invited to send in two works intended to celebrate the great event of the year, the first to be a cantata for orchestra and chorus, and the second a Hymn of Peace. A special "commission of musical composition" will be appointed with the duty of selecting from the works contributed those which are most worthy of performance during the Exhibition. Two gold medals, two of silver, and two of bronze, with the certificates of merit, will be presented to the most worthy of the compositions. Besides, the cantata is [illegible] prize of 10,000 francs will be awarded to the composer of the hymn selected for performance at the inaugural ceremony. A second commission of three members will make arrangements for orchestral and choral concerts. Festivals of the Orphéonistes, those we should call them, choral societies, and for performances by military and other bands. These concerts, in which all nations are invited to take part, will be held in the nave of the Palace of Industry in the month of July next. Six gold medals, twelve of silver, twelve bronze, and six certificates, will be awarded to those who take part in these performances. The third special commission is to organize a series of Historical Concerts, in which a small number of the most eminent will perform, to make remarkable musical works of different ages and different countries, and they also will receive medals and certificates. The distribution of these will take place on the 1st of August. The following are the chief members of the three commissions mentioned above:—1st. "Musical Composition"—M. Rossini, president; MM. Berlioz, Carafa, Félicien David, George Kastner, Reber, Ambroise Thomas, and C. Gounod as secretary. 2nd, For arranging the Orchestral and Choral Concerts—M. Félicien David, president; MM. Victor Massé, E. Rodrigues, and George Hainl as secretary. For the Orphéonistes Concerts—M. Ambroise Thomas, president; MM. Bazin, Jules Cohen, Léon Vivet, [illegible] and Laurent de Rillé as secretary. For the military and brass bands performances—General Mellinet, president; M. Émile Jonas, secretary. For the Historical Concerts—M. Fétis, president; MM. Chasseau, Delsarte, Gevaert, Roger, Wekerlin, Vervoitte, and Gautier as secretary.

[The Inaugural Ceremony failed and there was no Hymn of Peace on the first of April.]

GERMANY.

VIENNA. Camilla Urso(?), after twenty-two years absence, has been drawing crowds.—The Abbé Liszt has composed a grand Mass for the coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary.—Two movements of an unfinished Symphony, in B minor, by Schubert—a posthumous work—have been published by Spina (and in London by Ewer & Co.), which, the Athenæum says, are "original, if over Symphony was; distinct and captivating in idea; peculiar in treatment; here and there diffuse, but instinct with that lovely melody, and spirit, which it given to only the favored few."

On the 14th March a Historical Concert was given by Johannes Brahms, consisting of works by Schubert and Mendelssohn, Bach, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, besides songs by Franz, Brahms and [illegible].—On the same evening the 3d Academic Soirée of Carl [illegible] with [illegible] singers and pianist; programme insignificant.—On the 20th, Mollenda(?) at the "Academic Singing Society" with Fel. Carina from Pesth and the court orchestra; "Roman Song of Triumph" by Bruch; part of the 28th Psalm by Müllner, two [illegible] Odes, by Teichert(?), Scotch song by Kyrich, "Die Hoffnung" by Volk. Chorus by Rogelsberg, and Volkmann's Scena in Sappho; solo, "Sappho."

The number of concerts has been frightful. Zellner, too, has given a few historical concerts, aiming to show the progress of dramatic music from its beginnings down to a certain epoch. He had "the flower of the aristocracy" for audience, who "listened with religious silence" to interesting fragments, German, French and Italian, excellently sung by Messrs. Bernsdorf, Kraus, de Marchi, Ann Schmidt, &c.; Mlle. Wy and Mayerhofer. Zellner himself played some of Bach's organ pieces on the harmonium. A brilliant opening, it appears, in all respects. —Mlle. Carina (from Pesth) has had fine success in the Opera in Faust and the Huguenots.

BERLIN. Two new works by Kiel, Missa Solemnis and Te Deum, lately brought out, are pronounced by the local critics the most important music of the kind that has appeared since Mendelssohn; for more so than Kiel's Requiem.—The Symphony Soirée of the royal orchestra (10th) offered a Suite by Bach, Schumann's Genoveva Overture, Beethoven's 5th Symphony, &c.—March 12. Fourth Concert (?) Robert Schumann's D minor Symphony and Abendlied (with strong orchestra). Romanza by Wurtze(?) &c. Adio and [illegible] Trauttmann overture, &c. —3d Second Orchestral Evening of H. Schulz with Joan Becker and Chiostri (viola), the Vienna Club of Kullak's music school and Liebig's Orchestra. Sing. Society Concert; Irish choral song by Schulz; Mozart's Double Concerto for violin and viola; Chorus by Cherubini; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; a motet of Eyseni.—24th. "Monster Concert" of Bilse's orchestra. Beethoven's C minor Symphony; Weber's Invitation &c. (Berlioz); and performed pieces from L'Africaine, &c.—25th. New [illegible] Quartet Soirée of Holländer. Tausig's Concert and second Soirée of Kotzolt, with Vocal Schmidt-Pöhl, Zürn and Nühlader; songs by Kalbmann, Franz, Schumann, Schubert, &c.—26th. De Ahna's last Quartet evening.—27th. Vehsen and Fuchs sang Schubert's Cycle, "Die schöne Müllerin." —28th. Second Soirée of Rimbold's society: Madrigals and choruses by Handel, Drew and Esser(?), Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hauptmann, Schlottmann; Viotti and Ebert; Variations for two pianos by Schumann &c.—29th. Concert of the Court pianist Marie Johnson-Grf(?), with orchestra; and of Carl Banse with Handel (the London version) and Rubbich(?).—31st. Burkhilt's third Soirée with Becker's Florentine Quartet; Schumann's E-flat Quartet; Violin Sonata by Raff; E-flat minor Trio by Volkmann; songs by Franz, Schumann and Schubert.

At the Royal Opera the performances during the last week of March were: Fidelio, with Mme. Harriers-Wippern; Titus, with Mlle. Artôt; Spontini's Cortez, in which the tenor Niemann is said to be incomparable; Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's music; Fra Diavolo, with Mme. Lucca. Wachtel has been re-engaged for five years.

LEIPZIG. The programme of the 19th Gewandhaus Concert (March 28) was composed of Cherubini's Wasserträger Overture; Aria from Mozart's Figaro; scenes from Schumann's Genoveva, and Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Among the new things produced lately at these concerts was a Te Deum by Julius Rietz. Wilhelmi, the young violinist, has appeared with the utmost success.—Langert's opera, "Des Sängers Fluch" has encountered expectation.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1867.

End of the Concert Season.

Our season has come to an end. A very remarkable season, rich beyond precedent with Oratorios, Symphonies, Chamber music—especially piano music (Schubert and Schumann as well as Beethoven, Chopin and Bach)—and at the end, grandly. We have had two remarkable musical seasons in Boston. One was in the time of the old "Germania" orchestra, some fifteen years ago, when nearly every week in the winter gave us an orchestral concert with "all the nine symphonies" and many more, concert halls continually crowded, and corresponding activity in Oratorios and rehearsals. Then was a great spring forward in classical and high-toned taste; but the Germanians dispersed, the means grew less and the enthusiasm cooled away and tastes became distracted. And now again we have had a season even more remarkable not only for the great number and variety of fine works and composers represented, and for the uniformly large support of every kind of concert and of opera, but for the wider and more real appreciation in the end cause of what was good, and the sincere zeal with which so many have to some extent studied and sought to understand what they heard in thrown themselves heart and soul into the choral works as Oratorio, Ninth Symphony &c.

To close the season grandly, we have had within a couple of weeks Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" renewed, and two grand Oratorio nights, besides other things of interest.

SYMPHONY CONCERT EXTRA. The Harvard Musical Association to crown their most successful season of nine concerts (including that for the Couture), gave a tenth on Friday afternoon, April 12, both for the sake of bringing out the Ninth Symphony and by way of thanks and benefit to the orchestra who have served them so faithfully and well. The audience was large and of the most inspiring character, alive to all best things; and the concert was artistically and in the matter of pure, high sympathetic pleasure, a great success. Perhaps naturally it was as good a success as could be expected for an extra concert at the end of such a fatiguing round of musical excitements, and with the double-bar of two great Oratorios full in view. The Music Hall should have been crowded, as on the Couture occasion, to realize the full benefit designed for the musicians; as it was, it was to that scene a moderate benefit, while in a moral sense, as an inspiring, memorable occasion, it must have done them good, as it did their audience, and raised them in their feeling of the dignity of their profession.—This was the programme:

Overture: "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt." (Becalmed at Sea; a Tranquil, Happy Voyage; Coming into Port) ... Mendelssohn
Aria, "[illegible]" ... Mozart
Mr. J. Rudolphsen.
Polonaise, for Piano-Forte, in E major ... Weber.
Transcribed with Orchestra, by Liszt
Mr. B. J. Lang.

Beethoven's Ninth (or "Choral") Symphony, in D minor.
1. For Orchestra alone: Allegro, Scherzo, Adagio molto.
2. Choral Finale, alternating with Andante Moderato.
3. Finale, for Orchestra. With Chorus and Solo.

The short and brilliant First Part kept the concert within the usual two hours. Mendelssohn's picturesque Overture, capitally rendered, charmed even more than before; and of course was heard with keener appetite at the beginning of the feast. We need not describe it again. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN sang Non più andrai (in German) with telling and artistic style and a great deal of spirit; it seemed a deal too short. Mr. LANG even surpassed his last year's rendering of Liszt's highly colored transcription of the brilliant Weber Polonaise, with its introductory slow movement which Liszt has borrowed from the other Polonaise (in E flat). In fine masterfulness, brightness, clearness, conveying the whole spirit of the thing with utmost ease and grace, we hardly know how such a performance could be excelled. The ingenious, at times fantastical orchestration too, was on the whole well done, though the pretty jingle of the triangle which brightens up one passage lost its effect by not coming sharp upon the beat.

The bright little First Part, coming as a sort of attention made a good relish for the great Symphony—Beethoven's last word in this his fullest form of utterance. Meanwhile the stage, on both sides of the orchestra, was heaped up with chorus singers, nearly 300 of them, all aglow with expectation of their work; and the four solo singers (Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. CARY, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN) took their places in the front. Mr. ZERRAHN raised his baton, and the great Symphony began, summing up and recalling here and there in brief vivid hints, all that we had heard in all the other Symphonies—that is to say, all of essential spirit, character and tendency,—not of course literal reproductions. In the first movement, with its stern Bass voice ringing through the cold and chaos of those rushing fifths, its sweet pleading strains of needs and fates, whisperings of hope, heroic and resolute resolution, endless pursuit and denial and distraction of the ideal glimpse of true Joy, have we not the tone of the Concert and the "Eroica" again? But this time more complex, with a greater multitude of themes brought into service, and worked out together with such a wonderful unity and beauty and grandeur. But we have said enough before now—too much perhaps—in description of this Symphony, and will forbear. No doubt the first movement sounded somewhat duller than the rest, and was less closely apprehended by the most; partly because it was so crowded with themes and so complex in structure; partly because it needs to be looked back upon after reaching the height of the whole work in the "Joy" Chorus, to make its sense and bearing quite intelligible; and partly because the orchestra, full as it was and doing its best with a good will after very patient and laborious rehearsal, still needed greater mass, while (by the absence of the Quintette Club) we were reduced to two violoncelli against six double basses. Still it made with some a deep impression, yielding wonderful [illegible].

In the Scherzo we have again still springing up afresh, the human [illegible] other Scherzos (the 4th and 8th Symphonies especially), and in the Trio, with its characteristic bassoon and oboe and horn passages, the Pastorale. This movement went quite well, especially the repeat.

The heavenly Adagio, with its alternation and variations of two rhythms and two lovely melodies, went best of all and was most truly felt. Here the soul is poised in pure upper air above earthly cares and groveling [illegible] with serene ecstasy, a foretaste of celestial bliss. But here too thought of sadness of the unattained comes; then trumpet notes of high resolve and grandeur march, and the energy seems to threaten for the solution is reserved for the Finale, when human voices [illegible] the Instruments (double basses) at last show finding the gift of utterance in speech and the "Joy" tune (Schiller's Hymn) first intoned by double-basses, then when apply the best tenor gradually possesses the whole band and choir the genius of all leading illustration in new phases of the thought in different verses until the climax of the whole is reached, the real notes of true Joy in the sublime thought of human Brotherhood and the embrace of all Mankind, to which is felt the one presence (we have so fear) of "the Father who dwelleth above the stars!"—At this point, the erywal harmony of voices in long religious tones was indeed finely rendered, and the effect was thrilling. Generally, too, the choral parts were more successful than in any previous performance we have had; perfect they can never be without long familiarity with the work, keeping the tenor voices in practice; and even then the voices must be picked ones, some of them except small to cope with a tone [illegible] up (by [illegible] table three of its continuance) in so high a pitch and demanding so much. But the singers had grown enthusiastic about the Symphony, by the rehearsals, and many of them had conquered the first by listening to the rehearsals of the instrumental portions and thus getting filled with the spirit and meaning of the work; so here they sang with the heart and the understanding. [illegible] the four solo voices the task was the most trying; but they acquitted themselves most creditably, winning the sincere thanks of all by the zeal and loyalty with which they merged themselves in a common effort to do justice to Beethoven's greatest work.

The Orchestra never proved themselves more worthy of the many honors recently this concert. There was sincere thanks. The solo artists, all, must have worked for the love of it all their services. But thanks all Mr Carl Zerrahn, who had given all his zeal and energy to make the music of the masses, vocal and instrumental, in bringing out the Ninth Symphony (about a place he has always been an ardent lover) in the worthiest pass his success and to make the performance memorable, so that the Symphony may haunt our minds and call hereafter for more frequent repetition. He was there were the hearts of all the chorus at those Music rehearsals; and they enjoyed the work, the [illegible] their three great splendors so well, that we may surely count on them not coming, one to do the same thing once better. It ought to be done at least once a year.

We are sure the Ninth Symphony was felt as it never was before in Boston. And among the signs of progress we have hailed with pleasure the appreciative tone of the newspaper notices—very unlike that which prevailed in former years. We wish we had room to copy one or two; they value the spirit of the Symphony so truly; the substituting Philistine, who are wont to scoff at such a work, now find themselves the better part of valor and keep silent.

EASTER ORATORIOS. The Handel and Haydn Society, armed with the powerful Foreign Band support, besides other good soloists, the full Orchestra of the [illegible] Concerts, and the Great Organ, drew vast crowds to the Music Hall on Saturday and Sunday evenings, 20th and 21st inst. On Saturday, Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise; on Sunday Elijah.

The Stabat Mater was attractive and novel to certain any hold (except some passages) on the religious sentiment, and the work is certainly of the only "sacred" sources of Italian Opera. Singers who once such have them make lazy Sundays as well as of the work was fraught with anticipations of [illegible] where else. But the performance was so much better as a whole than ever before that we enjoyed it all the more. To be sure, we are not much edified by Cujus animam, especially when sung by a tenor voice like Mr Wheeler's, which though sweetly quick and artistically used, lacks weight and power for it. Nor can any voice supply what is [illegible] that when comes back the Pro Peccatis. Mr Rudolphsen (who came in the stead of Mr M. W. Whitney, the latter being hoarse) could have done it anybody can do; he certainly sang, at ably. But the popular chorus, the unaccompanied Quartet Quando corpus, and the Inflammatus, in which both Mme. Rosa and chorus were sublime, came upon us as good as new. It was well enough to [illegible] here of Rossini's work and by Fugue Finale, but that involved putting the Quando corpus and the Parepa's glories before the Inflammatus, and that again into about a transposition (of key) to the latter. Meanwhile, this though the effect was not so bad as one might have supposed. Mr Wheeler's bass was fine as a rock in the Quartet (and wherever he took part); and it was sung so nicely that it had to be repeated. It is the gem of the work and a [illegible] of these pieces which will [illegible] to survive, going best the second time like the Trio in Don Juan. We have never heard the soprano parts more splendidly sung than by Parepa; with Mrs. Cary's powerful [illegible], which she always used with such chaste style and feeling, told uncommonly well; we have no more truly vital and soulful singer. The Chorus was fuller than usual and in this easy work, compared to the oratorios so which they have been studying, the voices came out round and clear and unanimous, so that the ensemble was inspiring.

The "Hymn of Praise" was far greater work and never fails of its effect when it is well performed. The Orchestra (symphony character) more than ever. One or two of the choruses which have been taken (should be simply so, thorough) there is still some scrambling and confusion in such places as the "at so part of 'The Night is departing.'" But surely all were striking effective. Mme. Rosa's bright voice was electric, as in the glad announcement that leads to that chorus; and everywhere both she and Mrs. Cary lent their best power to the music. Mr Whitney, for the more certain [illegible] dramatic force and weight of voice, but behind all with feeling and good expression.—We have rarely known a more enthusiastic audience than that was.

Elijah has come to be one of the best known and appreciated of all great compositions among our music-loving people. The performance was occasionally spoiled as when the great chorus, backed by the thousand throats of the great organ, overwhelms effects. Mme. Rosa of course had full field for her glorious voice and superb part throughout; in the fine melodrama of the boy looking for rain, in the sublime "Holy, holy," sparing the Quartet in "Lift thine eyes," and in the opening pieces we have heard her sing nearly as satisfactory since Jenny Lind in London. The Angel Trio, with three such voices as Parepa, Miss Houston and Mrs. Cary, were every way delightful. The cataracts [illegible] of the last named lady seem to have reached their perfect ripeness, richer and larger than ever; and the rendering of her solos was so admirable that we could wish her always at hand for such noble service. Yet we must be allowed one qualification of this praise, was not expression somewhat overwrought and too intense for the classic, calm fervor of such music? In Italian Opera the voice are on the stage have the things which but weight, but the voice and the way we feel it all. In other words, such music, without trying to interpret, performs what it is intended. But we know of no one here or in this country at all equal to Miss Phillipps, and we thought her Opera that is her last for too infrequent Oratorio efforts do not wholly fit in every sense.

Miss Houston did excellent service in some of the smaller soprano parts—always like a true artist, ready to take a new place for the good of the whole. Mr Janet Whitney seemed to grow into better support with the Music Hall, for his more voice came out with more power than his previous efforts, while he truly caught the spirit of the music. For the great central figure of the whole the Prophet, Mr Rudolphsen's telling voice, clear, careful enunciation and just and finely drawn expression were [illegible] satisfactory. His lower tones seem, to be sure, are [illegible] the upper half of his voice rich and musical.

And so ended greatly, at least in so far as great music is concerned, a richer musical season than which Boston ever knew—if we except Opera. The Handel and Haydn have done well the year; they have given only the Messiah and the Creation, the Jephtha, Judas Maccabaeus, St Paul, Elijah, Hymn of Praise, the Forty-second Psalm and Stabat Mater. Shall we at last screw up our courage to begin on Bach?

OTHER CONCERTS of the season's close have been a pleasing [illegible] one of the Boston Conservatory; the Orchestral [illegible] Concert given and best with Mendelssohn's overture, Weber's Concertstück capitally played by Miss Alice Dutton, Chopin's Symphony, the [illegible] and [illegible] Sonata, aided by the fine solo singer Miss Washburn;—to all of which we must refer another, and we wish our amends for the following, which was crowded out last time:—

ITALIAN OPERA. Boston has had a week of it, under the management of Mr Max Strakosch. The people thronged at Traviata and nearly [illegible] for the sake of hearing Miss [illegible] Rosa, and very triumphantly such night. Trovatore, Norma, Il Barbiere (her opportunity), Der Freischütz and Lucia passed before an attentive ear begin. We took Don Giovanni, and it was a rare [illegible] was the worst performance and while we were warned of all that was the worst orchestra, chorus, [illegible] of the ensemble, had, even the final Ghost scene feebler than we thought it possible to make it. But there were great redeeming things: Mme. Rosa's Donna Anna was superb, especially her singing of the Letter aria "Non mi dir," and the dramatic scenes. Or see the [illegible] one Miss Phillipps was fully [illegible] heard the vocal honors by heavy gifted Zerlina, a fine humorous and one of the pearls of the season. It was pleasant too, to see Signor Ferranti, the bearer (character of [illegible]) most happily the second and unworthy as he has been here and the overture in his own masterwork years ago and has style though a rude voice was always graceful and artistic. It is a "public" worth of his power and his Leporello was [illegible] near [illegible] but, his voice, wonderfully kind, he [illegible] the stage was by but a good [illegible] by his [illegible] one of "Ah non ti era." Which was encored. Mr. Fossi the Commendatore, [illegible] and thanks for enforcing the great part of the Don, which he never did before, at two days notice, and with his light baritone. In singing he is always a most tasteful artist, and his acting genteel and unobtrusive. Lo ci darem was beautifully sung.

Norma (repeated on Saturday) is one of the best of roles for Mme. Rosa. In singing, and in the play of tenderness and of action, it was admirable and worthy of the noblest Divas.

Music in London and Paris.

PARIS, MARCH 27. At the "Monday Popular Concert" in London on Monday, March 11, we had [illegible] by played by Charles Hallé; Sonata for violoncello by Rubinstein (played by Piatti); and Beethoven's Trio in D major Op. 70 No. 1. Joachim, Ries, Blagrove and Piatti were the quartet party.

On Wednesday evening, March 13, Mr. Henry Leslie gave an Orchestral Concert at St. James' Hall. The programme included among other things, Mendelssohn's Antigone (with orchestra of 71 and male chorus of 250). Von Weber's Overture to Oberon, Cherubini's Overture to "Les Deux Journées" and lastly Beethoven's superb pianoforte Concerto in G played from memory by Charles Hallé. This was the feature of the evening and I need scarcely say that Mr. Hallé's playing was perfection itself. As an instance of his perfect self possession and knowledge of the concerto in the orchestral score, I may mention that in the last movement the first violins did not come in on [illegible] after a long and intricate solo passage by Mr. Hallé. Mr. H. perceived the dilemma and very dexterously repeated the passage whereupon the orchestra took the "cue" and came in correctly. There were but few who noticed this little episode.

On Saturday evening (the extra Monday Popular Concerts are given on Saturday) we had Beethoven's Septet, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor, the latter played by Mme. Schumann, Strauss and Piatti. The Rubinstein Sonata for violoncello was again given, and Mme. Schumann played (as a solo) Chopin's Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1 and Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53. She received an [illegible] encore and, in response, played Chopin's Impromptu in A flat, Op. 29.

On Monday Evening, March 18th, the programme was: Sonata in A major Op. 47, (commonly called the "Kreutzer") played by Joachim and Arabella Goddard; the Rubinstein violoncello Sonata; Beethoven's [illegible] pianoforte Sonata in B flat major 106 (Mme. Goddard) and Mozart's heavenly Quartet in D minor No. 2; the Mozart Quartet was played with a most marvellous precision and clearness, and the Allegretto was delicious in its radiance.

In my next letter I will give you a synopsis of the Paris Concerts of which there are very many just now. It may interest your readers to know that Charles De Bériot (son of the eminent violinist) who is living here in Paris, is making some little sensation with his pianoforte playing. Mr. De B. has much talent but his execution, has a certain [illegible] which further practice will undoubtedly tone down.

Harry Sanderson left London is very poor health. Will arrived at Liverpool last week, per steamer China. Messrs. Chickering and Steinway are both in this city, as well as soon as the Exposition opens we must, I suppose, look out for a war of the Roses.

PARIS, APRIL 2. The past week has been crowded with concerts, and most of them of a classical character. On Sunday March 24 there was a Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel with the following programme: Trio (Piano) in A major, Haydn; 2d Quartet, C minor (strings), Beethoven; Sonata, G major, Piano and Violin, Mozart; and Quartet, E flat major (strings) Op. 4, Beethoven. The performances were very good; but there was a "tempo" [illegible] and some of tones which grated terribly upon my ears.

On Tuesday afternoon, March 26, M. Pasdeloup gave one of his popular classical concerts at the Cirque Napoléon. The programme included: Chorus and Cantata by Wagner; Chorus "Le Départ," Mendelssohn; Air du Freischütz (solo) Beethoven; Largo et Finale, Haydn; Aria from Sonnambula (very well sung by Laura Harris); Weber's Overture to Der Freischütz, and a Chorus and Overture, by Meyerbeer.

By the way they have produced Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Théâtre Lyrique with a gorgeousness and splendor that defy description. The costumes are superb and the scenery and all the appointments are really superb. Verdi's new opera, "Don Carlos," has also just been brought out at the Italian Opera.

On Wednesday evening there was another séance of chamber music at the Salle Pleyel and the following works were given: Trio, E flat major Op. 1 (Piano), Beethoven; Quartet, D minor (strings) Mozart; Sonata (for Pianoforte alone) C sharp minor Op. 27 Beethoven (played very finely by Herr Ernst Lubeck); and Quartet, E minor, Op. 44 (strings) Mendelssohn. Again the stringed instruments were wretchedly out of tune; this seems a common fault in the Quartet playing here. The Mozart Quartet (the one played at the London Monday Popular Concerts by Joachim, Ries, Blagrove and Piatti on March 11) was rendered with scant approach to precision and delicacy of tone that the other works were handled.

On Friday evening I attended still another séance at the same salon, (different performers upon each occasion). The programme embraced: Quartet, E minor No. 8, (strings) Beethoven; Trio, (Piano) F major, St. Saëns (the pianist of the evening); Adagio (Piano solo) Beethoven; and Quintet, G minor (strings) Mozart. The Beethoven Quartet was murdered outright. The Trio is a much and feeble composition. The Adagio was most admirably played by M. St. Saëns, and the Quintet was quite well rendered.

On Sunday afternoon March 31 M. Pasdeloup gave the last of the popular classical concerts at the Cirque Napoléon. The programme was superb: "Jupiter" Symphony, Mozart; Andante Religioso, Mendelssohn, (this was delicious, and was encored) [illegible]; Struensee music, Meyerbeer; Concerto, Violin (with M. Maurin) Rode; and lastly Beethoven's glorious 5th Symphony in C minor.

This gives you a pretty complete record of musical events up to date.

We heartily share the opinion and hope expressed in the following article from the Transcript:

MRS. AMES'S BUST OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN. A copy of the bust of President Lincoln, by Mrs. Joseph Ames of this city, has, within a few days been placed in the State Library for the inspection of the Legislature. This bust is regarded by all who have seen it, who were familiar with the beautiful character of Mr. Lincoln, as the best of the many attempts that have been made to perpetuate, on canvas or in marble, the features of the late President. It certainly recalls him to the memory of those who have seen and conversed with him more vividly than any other.

The best feature is the dignity of expression which he had, the eye, and the solemn sadness which his eyes had, the [illegible] in character of the countenance, expression and one which no photographs present, and shows the greatness and at the same time the [illegible] of the enthusiasm that were said ear [illegible] in his line of character. While this bust [illegible] the more engaging one of his features that are seen in many of the pictures neither on the one or hand [illegible] remembered and [illegible] that can be observed [illegible].

In brief it is such a portrait as might be expected from an artist of genius who had abundant opportunities of seeing and intimately knowing the subject of her art. Mrs. Ames (the wife of the distinguished painter, Mr. Joseph Ames of this city, who also painted Mr. Lincoln) had rare opportunities for seeing the late President in the last of [illegible], and, at the time of her assassination, had arranged with him to give her several sittings for the bust.

Though the present of the marble is a noble one, that her work was not so great as not already complete, so that it was the image conceived in her mind, to be work before so many to-day.

A copy of this noble bust it should too been procured by the Senate of the United States and the copies so soon as orders from which had the [illegible] in marble for [illegible] he [illegible] in our state [illegible] Italy where alone such works may be done satisfactorily and so expensively to the order. It is hoped that the Legislature of Massachusetts will avail itself of the opportunity to perpetuate in marble, the memory of the martyr President.

LIBRETTO OF STABAT MATER.

Invaluable as one of a series to Oratorio Libretos, and has a large proportion of the beautiful melodies, which rank among the sweetest of sacred songs, as the old Latin poem is one in the sweetest combinations of a noble tune.

A good Libretto with the leading tunes and airs. It aids materially in the understanding and enjoyment of an Oratorio as well as an Opera. Libretos to Messiah, Creation, Elijah, and other Oratorios are in preparation.

Robert Franz.

Franz was born on the 28th of June, 1815, at Halle, on the Saal. The state of things in the paternal home afforded him but little poetic stimulus; on the contrary, all that did not belong to the practical affairs of life in the sense of the last century was regarded as superfluous and [illegible]. His youth passed uneventfully, and he was indebted only to mere chance opportunities for the awakening of his musical capacities. Being already fourteen years of age he was obliged, and that without any support upon the part of his relations, to acquire the elements of music, as well as he could, in his own way and upon his own responsibility. Later, when his inclination to music became more decided, it was no longer possible to [illegible] from him a teacher; but [illegible] in a consequence of the [illegible] prevailing [illegible] musical pedagogue was engaged for the first beginning, and it might have been foreseen the gifted pupil soon outstripped the teacher.

A change had now to be made in instruction and in method. And this necessity repeated itself so often that in the space of four years the young Franz had studied with all the music-teachers in Halle, and learned all he could from each of them, without being able to call his own any great capital of knowledge and ability. How it [illegible] could he draw any solid profit, any lasting guidance from this scattered [illegible] at the same [illegible]? The [illegible] sound youthful insight saw so truly that he considered himself, in spite of his numerous lessons, as left entirely to himself; in his first attempts he followed only the bent of his own inspiration, and so, out of the disadvantages of his position he secured the inestimable advantage of accustoming himself to let the fundamental tone be decided by the choice of his matter and the form of his thought, instead of accommodating his mind, as so many talents, to mere imitation, and hence resembling a manumitted slave, who needs years of apprenticeship to learn not only how to enjoy but how to actually possess and use the freedom that has been given him. How many all their lives remain with freedom and never attain to the natural noble movement of the freeborn and unfettered! His firm, clear understanding guarded Franz from arrogance and even in the independence left him by the incapacity of his teachers. He indulged in no other complaint nor ridicule about or manifest a want of outward aid. Instead he found himself a true freedom, as in his natural element, and used it cleverly to give self possession to his powers, accustoming himself to fix his eyes upon a goal and slowly, quietly, consciously to seize the means for reaching it.

Such a state of things in the earliest years of his artistic strivings, more than all later influences perhaps, determined the autodidactic character of his talent. The chosen son of the Muse, the predestined artist knows like the busy bee in each sweet [illegible] nourishment out of the flower cups which contain deadly poison for others. But dry study did not satisfy him; the rigid thought remained but imperfectly to his yearning, as a dumb beauty would have left his heart untouched. Written music was to him but a body without soul; he needed hearing that he might see its vital resolved. However much the so-called serious musicians may affect to despise curiosity, yet it is none the less true that every really called musician cherishes a sort of sensuous curiosity. So is the impulse in himself to hear, to bathe, as it were, in waves of tones, to cradle himself upon them. The tablets of sound, to sail through their pure ether, to let their fragrant breath search his unfolded wings, to consign himself to the ideal shapes of their fairy land, to listen to their tragedy or touching dialogues, to transport himself into their world of supersensuous, glowing and sparkling like the magic formulas of a celestial speech. Franz wanted to hear more music, as he made music himself; he gave himself passionately up to organ playing, and on Sundays ran from one church to another, to relieve the respective organists on single choral verses.

In those days he was attending the Halle Orphan House Gymnasium, and his studies there formed his principal occupation, the so-called serious side of life, upon which his parents laid the greatest stress, while they always considered his attachment to music as only a harmless amusement, from which they would gladly have seen him delivered, since such idiosyncrasies always hinder a young man from the attainment of that well-rounded, well-measured, comfortable Philistine, that coveted goal of all good fathers of a family, in whose train they can with tolerable certainty anticipate a fixed position, a respectable marriage, a decent [illegible], a decent living and finally a decent burial for their son and heir. The professors of the gymnasium treated the Art-dallying of their pupil with still greater severity than he had experienced under the paternal roof. In a secret musical amateur he became the butt of many witticisms, and there were plenty who would call him "Fool." The Cantor of the institution had appointed an hour for music lessons for the more gifted pupils. Franz felt himself drawn toward him; he was so cramped and narrowed by the boggy water of mental nativity that whenever for him passed without crabbing his artistic pursuits became welcome to him, as a short time for musical protection invited him to be his accompanist. The compositions of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, [illegible] now flowed where and met the first gleams with the first confidence of his ideas, which no one helped him to draw up, and in which he had to [illegible] himself. The [illegible] of those forms which [illegible] to them under its protection, remaining for them in the most urgent moment, through even in the drying instances of these [illegible].

Trembling with enthusiasm possessed by the sounds which had entranced him, Franz now ventured, without having mastered even the rudiments of harmony, counterpoint or any sort of thorough theoretic knowledge, any method, even without recognition of them necessarily upon his first attempts at composition. Now, as before, he remained left to himself, and without any plan, without advice from others, wanted along at random. The impulse to produce so far predominated in him that at this time the order of importance in his different labors was reversed. The [illegible] in spite of his more and more overweening [illegible] toward music, in spite of the tendency of his mind to busy itself in musical problems and [illegible] to them his [illegible] hours, and even a portion of the time allotted to more serious studies, still these latter had appeared to him the natural purpose of his being; he found his parents too well so a low as to [illegible] directly opposed to [illegible] to take routs in him and not to accept patiently the [illegible] which had been one [illegible] into him from childhood, that it was his duty to acquit himself obediently of his Gymnasium studies. But now the spirit of resistance began to get possession of him; he felt, with all his [illegible] that these studies could not be useful to his personal development and he had more and more the power of giving himself up to them with interest and success. Soon there arose hard conflict in his soul between his natural modesty and yieldingness, between his habitual obedience to his parents and the thought that he was squandering his time, was losing the best years at the Gymnasium. For this end he knew no better remedy than to abandon the course thus far pursued, and under the eyes of a master of music begin a new period of study in which he at once naturally fell upon a composer who at that time enjoyed a great celebrity, and who lived at Dessau, Herr Frederic Schneider. What artist who has become so in spite of the narrow views of a too low and prejudiced family, cannot at a glance behold all the phases of the combat which Franz had to fight through before his wish was gratified without an open rupture with his friends? He finally left the Gymnasium, which he had already quitted by a step forward into the higher classes, and betook himself to Dessau, with the purpose here by persevering study to regulate, clear up and bring into order his unfinished and fragmentary musical ideas, although even then neither he nor any of his family dreamed of the possibility that he could choose music for his calling for the great end of his life. In such an idea they thought there was nothing to be feared, for they did not once suppose it practicable. He was not very clear in his own mind as to how his resolution would carry him. His first thought was, to quit the hated school, to give himself up to music and started in this perhaps a tendency to opposition, which had guaranteed to him, was not without effect.

In Dessau as first repeated, although with a change of form, nearly the same phenomena which characterized his earlier relations to Art. The rules and theories, which were taught him and unfolded to him, still repelled him; he did not thrive with them, and he began, after the regular lessons, other labors, which, like his first musical efforts had a resemblance to the spider in the weaving of its web, in that he drew the material out of himself. It were superfluous to say that Schneider found but little pleasure in this singular method, and found fault with the dangerous example of such independent strivings. It was not long ere Franz came into the position of a persona ingrata. For compensation he won other sympathies.

If there are masters whose unfolding youthful partisans refuse to follow with almost blind devotion and inflamed with a noble courage, and their doctrines with their own names, with the whole heart's blood marching with reckless enthusiasm beneath their banner, such masters stand upon the most dangerous outposts of Art, and fight with a courage which is called desperation by their adversaries, but which as successful cases justifies the maxim of Virgil: Audentes fortuna juvat. About such masters, who rather found schools than keep up schools, there are always an overflow of the fresh powers of young life, the surrounding air laden with electricity, there the up-blooming of all faculties and mutual blossoms of sparkling de gré, which awaken and strengthen a consciousness of his own worth in every participant, and therefore remains so dear and not to be forgotten. For Schneider such a feeling would have been rather strange and distant. He did not feel the need of living in an atmosphere in which the mind follows independently its own direction, and thus he missed behind one of the most indispensable requisites of Art. In a heavy stagnant close social atmosphere free development is impossible to the pupil. Thus there formed themselves, under the very eye of the master, but without his knowledge groups of dilettants, who find themselves together without any clear idea of the revolutionary character of their strivings, without more than a mere suspicion that out of their union will arise revolutions and tendencies, constantly diverging from those of the master. So it was with the pupils under Schneider. It could not fail to happen that Franz firmly attached himself to such a group, and he himself confesses, that the atmosphere he breathed among these young people (making a great deal of music behind the back of their teacher, who would have been more annoyed by the kind of their music, than by the secrecy of the production) was the only fostering element to his true progress. His studies in harmony and counterpoint were for him only a heaping together of materials, which he was one day to use in the production of quite different pictures than those set him for a pattern. During his two years' residence in Dessau, (1830–1,) he composed really a great deal, and in his attempts of that period it is interesting to trace the painful struggling of a young imagination under the school fetters and the necessity to shake them off.

Bach's Works.

(From "Johann Sebastian Bach: his Life and Writings. Adapted from the German of C. L. Hilgenfeldt, with additions from other sources." As published in the London Choir.)

The existing works of this great man are unusually numerous, and contain specimens of all periods of his artistic career. We are thus enabled to take a retrospective view of the progress of his ideas from their dawn to their full growth and development. An examination of the various styles adopted by Bach gives us also a safe means for the classification of his works according to the greater or lesser degree of artistic merit, and this comparison shows us clearly three distinct periods in the art-career of Bach's life.

The first period embraces all those compositions which, in spite of a certain excellence, yet want a sufficient finish to give them elevation. They cling too much to certain forms and contain useless and trivial matter showing a regard for the common taste and fashion of the time.

The period of Bach's life in which these pieces were composed was between the years 1704 and 1714, when he was at Arnstadt and Weimar. He himself thought nothing of his works during this period, and whatever compositions may [illegible] can only command such interest as is naturally taken in the first works of a great musician. At Weimar, however, Bach made good use of his time, and study and practice did much to bring him forward. This is proved by the works of the second period.

At Köthen he had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the works of the best modern masters. The compositions he wrote here bear the stamp of higher cultivation and increased maturity. The spirit of artistic self now began to assert itself, and [illegible] all things—such as arise from the fashionable taste—are no longer found in his works. Some of them may be called perfect as they have not been surpassed by his later writings. As this period comprises the whole duration of his official stay at Köthen—i. e., from the year 1717 to 1723, it has been called the "Köthen-period," as the former one is known as the "Weimar-period."

The third and last period comprehends the most perfect creations of art, and extends from his appointment at Leipzig to his death—viz., from 1723 to 1750, and is called the "Leipzig-period."

A critical comparison of the works of Bach, on the basis which we have just pointed out, alone gives us sufficient knowledge of the period to which each particular work is to be placed. More special dates are to be found in the manuscript copies of his pupils and the works of his contemporaries—Walther, Mattheson, Mizler, Em. Bach, and others—give us many notes in this respect.

It would, of course, be impossible to fix the precise dates to all Bach's various works, but an approximate one may always be given. In many of the copies of his works we find a variety of readings and variations. Some of these, no doubt, were occasioned by the errors of copyists, or by the fancied corrections of incompetent persons. A close acquaintance with Bach's writings, however, will easily enable us to restore the original text.

Bach himself, as we have said, frequently altered and corrected his own works. Even those that were printed he subjected to frequent alterations and revision. We have an instance of this in his "Wohltemperirte Clavier" (The Well-tempered Clavichord) of which a variety of readings are extant.

Of his larger works, very few were published by Bach himself, but all these bear the stamp of mastership. These consist of the four volumes of "Clavierübung" (Exercises for the Clavichord); the "Sechs Chorälen" (six Choral Melodies of different kinds, for organ with two manuals and pedal); "Einige Kanonische Veränderungen" (Some Canonic Variations on the Christmas Hymn, "Vom Himmel hoch da komm ich her," for organ with two manuals and pedal); and the Musikalisches Opfer (Musical Offering) dedicated to Frederick II., King of Prussia.

Of the smaller things printed by Bach himself we have only the [illegible] printed in 1727 and dedicated to Professor Hudemann. "The Art of the Fugue" ("Die Kunst der Fuge") did not appear till after the author's death, but was, for the most part, engraved by one of his sons during Bach's lifetime.

The compositions of Bach remaining unpublished at his death, as well as the original manuscripts of those already printed, passed with some few exceptions, into the hands of his two sons, Friedemann and Emanuel. Some few were given to his pupils, Kirnberger and Kittel. Those which Friedemann Bach possessed were soon dispersed in the world, as we have already related. Emanuel on the contrary carefully treasured up his father's bequests, had them classified and bound and a complete catalogue placed with them. At his death in 1788 they passed into other hands, fortunately of those who were able to appreciate their value. The catalogue which Emanuel had made was published by his widow in 1790.

Emanuel Bach's collection of his father's works for the greatest part became the property of Nägeli of Zurich, who gave the world the benefit of many of them by publication. Counsellor [illegible] of Altona, a great admirer of S. Bach, also purchased many manuscripts, and [illegible] took the opportunity of increasing his collection. Two later collectors of Bach's manuscripts were Pölchau, a music amateur of Hamburg, and Gerber of Sondershausen, the well-known editor of the "Musical Lexicon." Pölchau's part, about the middle of the present century passed into the library of the "Joachimsthal school" at Berlin, where already were the collections of Kirnberger and his noble pupil the Princess Amelie of Prussia. At Berlin there is preserved the greatest collection of Bach's manuscripts. Another fine collection is still preserved in the Nägeli family, and the St. Thomas' School at Leipzig contains some of the vocal works written for that establishment. Some few manuscripts are in private hands; [illegible] of them hereafter.

Immediately after Bach's death his sons published "The Art of the Fugue," and in 1765 and 1769 Emanuel published his "Collection of Four-part Choral Songs" in two volumes.

Thirty years later, or thereabouts, A. F. C. Kollman, organist of the German chapel, St. James's, London (a native of Hanover and formerly connected by friendship with Emanuel Bach), published the first edition of the "Well-tempered Clavier." Another edition appeared about the same time from the house of Simrock of Bonn; and in 1800 George Nägeli advertised a collection in which the works of the most celebrated composers were to appear, and amongst them many of those of J. S. Bach. This great work was never accomplished, but the house of Nägeli published a number of his single pieces, and for the first time the "Six Clavier Sonatas with violin accompaniment." The fourth volume of the "Clavier Practice" appeared in 1802, at Weimar, without any publisher's name, as did also the "Six Sonatas for Violin alone."

The publishing firm of Kühnel (now Peters), at Leipzig, gave particular attention to Bach's organ and clavier works. Since the beginning of the present century they have occupied themselves with this laudable purpose. They have given to the world a complete collection of his glorious organ compositions, under the supervision of Griepenkerl and Roitzsch, and at the same time a collection of his clavier works, under the care of Czerny and Griepenkerl. These editions are deservedly esteemed for the beauty of the printing, and the care and diligence bestowed upon them by the learned editors.

The firm of Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipzig has also issued many of Bach's works; whilst André of Offenbach and Haslinger of Vienna have each done homage to the genius of the great master by the publication of correct editions of his compositions. But, perhaps the most glorious monument to the memory of the great composer yet achieved is the noble edition of his works now in course of publication by the German Bach Society.

Haunts of Harmony in the City of London.

(From Once a Week.)

II.

We were compelled by want of space, to bring our last paper to a somewhat abrupt conclusion on the course of a treatise on the "Sun" and "Tower" Music-halls, Knightsbridge. We shall now [illegible] observations by remarking that when the performances at these establishments have been brought to a close, which as a rule happens at about quarter to twelve, the audience [illegible] the [illegible] bar of a [illegible] with the [illegible] and in the hall a [illegible] crowd of soldiers, mechanics, low "honey [illegible]," [illegible] women and [illegible] you may observe an elderly gentleman [illegible] a [illegible] resembling that of a [illegible] whom [illegible] spirituous liquors are [illegible] handed [illegible] and [illegible] of Mercury during the performance is regarded with [illegible] of admiration which the British public is always ready to extend to any one even remotely connected with the stage.

The ladies and gentlemen who have [illegible] the performances at the "Tower" usually drop in towards the close of the evening, and compare notes with their friends at the "Sun." The entertainments at the last named establishment are of a more varied [illegible] than those at the rival house, and included on the occasion of our visit a sparkling [illegible] performance by [illegible] and a Newfoundland dog, the [illegible] being [illegible] and thrown behind the scenes about every two minutes, and coming to life again towards the conclusion of the piece, [illegible] with [illegible] in an accompaniment of barks and plunges on the part of the dog.

A large proportion of the audience both at the "Sun" and the "Tower" are of the military class. You may observe there [illegible] fine young fellows seated [illegible] and [illegible] for gallant and [illegible] officers, if you had not [illegible] that they were merely [illegible] in their [illegible] apparel. They [illegible] their pipes [illegible] their beer, and [illegible] the performance in the most majestic manner, and if any one of them [illegible] he [illegible] on the [illegible] of the [illegible] he [illegible] to the barracks, and presently returns to dazzle and [illegible] in [illegible] uniform.

Thus far [illegible] general aspect of a few of the leading music halls [illegible] therein provided and the [illegible] by whom they are patronised. We shall now [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] our readers with [illegible] and [illegible] songs [illegible] of those [illegible] of public performers and popular favorites. We shall begin by [illegible] the experiences of a couple of young men [illegible] to win [illegible] capacity of [illegible] but [illegible] we shall make [illegible] and [illegible] friends [illegible] Messrs. Jones and Smith. Both and journeying towards London, and, that for some time past they had been performing at one of the principal theatres in the northern counties. The [illegible] were glorious and affairs were as [illegible] so long as the representations were confined to [illegible] but on [illegible] attempt [illegible] Mr. Charles Pitt, who had lately [illegible] in the neighborhood, [illegible] critical [illegible] "[illegible] I don't know 'bout [illegible] Charley Pitt," so the unfortunates were [illegible] and again found themselves [illegible] the high road.

[illegible] by some [illegible] and means they managed to reach [illegible] and procured an engagement at [illegible] Oxford street, where they [illegible] a couple of [illegible] eight each performance lasting about half an hour [illegible] at the commencement [illegible] the [illegible] they received the [illegible] salary of [illegible] shillings [illegible] week. It was at [illegible] that we made the acquaintance of these indefatigable aspirants to fame, and it was at the same popular place [illegible] that we had an opportunity of witnessing their [illegible] efforts [illegible] It was of a [illegible] thrilling and melodramatic. It had reference to the adventures of a [illegible] who, having emigrated to Australia, seized on [illegible] in the [illegible] "bush." Whilst there, he was attacked [illegible] of a [illegible] bushranger [illegible] Fortune [illegible] and [illegible] he was [illegible] by a [illegible] who in the [illegible] of his [illegible] to become possessed of [illegible] property. As a matter of course, [illegible] and [illegible] Cork [illegible] the robber was preparing [illegible] his claims on him. [illegible] demanded [illegible] On hearing it, he [illegible] "[illegible]" and proceeded to inquire, [illegible] "And had you not a father?" "I had." "Know you his [illegible]?" "[illegible] Australia [illegible]" [Tremendous [illegible] on the part of the ruffian.] "[illegible] my long lost boy!!!" [illegible]

The dialogue [illegible] that we should purchase the copyright of the entertainment for half a crown! We declined the offer, but gave a little spare cash to the performers [illegible] finding that [illegible] they [illegible] a satisfactory footing in London. Considering the [illegible] talent [illegible] a dream of great [illegible]. The [illegible] of the two "heavy" gentlemen [illegible] his wardrobe [illegible] would prove [illegible] and we [illegible] his [illegible] friend's misfortunes were [illegible] to the fact of his having "gone mad" [illegible] down all the [illegible] he felt convinced that with a [illegible] he would [illegible] and [illegible] was looking forward [illegible] engagement [illegible] from [illegible] and [illegible] to earn [illegible] a week, and to [illegible].

[illegible] we have [illegible] able to [illegible] ever [illegible] a [illegible] week [illegible] of the [illegible] regarding their prospects, and from time to time [illegible] towards the stage [illegible] the purpose of taking [illegible] performances on [illegible].

Young girls [illegible] in the provinces [illegible] acquaintance [illegible] the [illegible] through [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] again. They [illegible] a couple of "[illegible]" [illegible] the first [illegible] "the [illegible]" [illegible] and [illegible] that [illegible] be [illegible]. [illegible] "[illegible] the good of the house." The second "turn" [illegible] and [illegible] the obvious reason. But [illegible] keep her engagement. Poor girl [illegible] a year or two [illegible] sometimes [illegible] rushed, and they have no resource but the work [illegible] in the streets. It is not one girl in ten that can stand the ordeal of life in the country. It is necessary to select the leading establishments such as the Oxford and [illegible], proceedings of the kind we have referred to would be quite without precedent.

With regard to the origin of the various performers, they have as a rule sprung from the stage or the [illegible] their fathers have been [illegible] actors, [illegible] acrobats, etc. We could name [illegible] now in the [illegible] of good salaries who formerly earned a livelihood by wandering from town to town or from village to village and performing in the London streets. Some of the best acrobats are foreigners, and the highest-sounding Italian names in the programmes are not always foreign.

In halls where there are musical selections the leading tenors and sopranos are generally chosen from members of English and Italian opera companies. The [illegible] of a singing in a selection is comparatively [illegible] the same [illegible] are not more than [illegible] though the position is hard [illegible] salary, [illegible] more than [illegible] pounds a week. A lady once [illegible] at the Italian Opera, [illegible] an engagement at Day's [illegible] Birmingham. A leading tenor at one of the principal London music-halls held a post of honor at Covent Garden Theatre.

At leading establishments it is usual to employ one or two comic [illegible] made [illegible] of the house, and a gentleman or lady in such a position is able to earn from fifteen to twenty pounds a week. The great advantage of a situation of this kind is that the performer [illegible] at any [illegible], whereas if he aimed to a more dignified position, say as a member of a touring opera company or to [illegible] concerts, his earnings, though they [illegible] larger would, as a rule, be [illegible].

The chairman at a music-hall is generally a [illegible] He may have been [illegible] on the [illegible] the [illegible] of the different [illegible] and [illegible] he is supposed to [illegible] himself in endeavoring to [illegible] be a man who can [illegible] audience, and if [illegible] in the [illegible] of any performer he is sometimes required to take a turn. His salary may vary from a couple of pounds to fifty shillings a week.

At good halls it is usual to hold a lady or gentleman in reserve, to [illegible] unlooked-for hiatus in the performance, and the [illegible] of such a post earn a weekly salary of from [illegible] to a couple of pounds. The [illegible] to a music-hall [illegible] have been tempted from the "[illegible]" by the prospect of higher wages. They are [illegible] and respectable [illegible] looked down [illegible] members of the theatrical profession.

Music Among the Chinese.

To the Editor of the Evening Post.

[illegible] "[illegible]" by T. Taylor Meadows that they are the [illegible] people in the world [illegible] Tennyson of Asia [illegible] an illustration of this, [illegible] the following comments on "[illegible] from a gentleman [illegible] Hong Kong" concerning the musical powers of the Chinese.

The writer "believes his to be the first attempt to teach the singing of music to this wonderful people." [illegible] of the Episcopal [illegible] at Shanghai [illegible] taught many years ago, both to [illegible] girls, and with complete success. [illegible] was [illegible] by the [illegible] European [illegible] practised, but Chinese [illegible] performed [illegible] both the school and [illegible].

Our Presbyterian friends at Ningpo did much the same thing, and as long as [illegible] they [illegible] so far as to publish a psalm-book of some two hundred and fifty tunes, with specimens in the same "[illegible]-method." How long before this the Roman Catholic missionaries had taught their students I am [illegible], but I can recall the fact that most [illegible] sung by Chinese choristers in the cathedral at Shanghai, accompanied by an organ [illegible].

Another [illegible] statement of "the gentleman in Hong Kong" is that "the Chinese [illegible] no [illegible]." Almost any book on China [illegible] Du Halde [illegible] and [illegible] as an account of the [illegible] of [illegible] musical [illegible] practiced among Chinese people.

The fact is that music as a [illegible] has existed and been held in very high esteem among them for at least twenty-two hundred years. Confucius [illegible] and found analogies between the [illegible] of the five principal notes of the [illegible] and those of the [illegible] of the people of a country [illegible] these [illegible] the strength [illegible] and the [illegible] could rule over the empire. So much for the Chinese having no music!

As to the assertion that they "hear no tunes" [illegible] is one of the strangest of the many strange statements made concerning that much misrepresented people. Why, the empire is full of tunes and very useful they are, after their fashion—which fashion is not ours, however, but more nearly that of the older Scotch [illegible]. Let any one listen to the old tune of "Farewell to Lochaber," performed [illegible] and he will get a very good idea of the general style of Chinese music. Indeed, the common fife—without keys—gives the Chinese musical scale very nearly. The difference between it and our [illegible] scale being that the semitones are [illegible] with [illegible] nor do the intervals [illegible] correspond with ours. [illegible] and [illegible] correspond with ours, [illegible]. But they have, in [illegible] though the fourth and seventh [illegible] Scotch tunes, for instance "[illegible]" [illegible].

A [illegible] "gentleman in Hong Kong who is engaged in [illegible] such [illegible]" [illegible] can produce but two or three tones. Now [illegible] take the trouble of [illegible] and [illegible] Twenty-third street [illegible] instruments [illegible] from E flat [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] the accompanying specimen [illegible] the Chinese [illegible] show that they write the two notes [illegible].

In short, they have an exceedingly elaborate system of musical notation, and a great fondness for what is called [illegible] the "[illegible]"—except the [illegible] of decorous food [illegible] dinner.

At a polite entertainment the guests have [illegible] to three or [illegible] tables, with the [illegible] of some of their [illegible] "operas"—so [illegible] and a selection is made for the orchestra, which proceeds at once to go through some composition that may occupy an hour or two in the performing [illegible] sometimes playing, sometimes singing, according to the exigencies of the occasion.

It was the [illegible] of [illegible] what [illegible] to [illegible] among [illegible] in [illegible] purpose of [illegible] [illegible] to study [illegible] Shanghai [illegible] a few [illegible] from the Buddhist [illegible] which have a strong [illegible] of the older forms of the Gregorian [illegible].

I have [illegible] too long on your [illegible] but my [illegible] of [illegible] that [illegible] in the [illegible] "the Musical Powers of the Chinese." They would naturally have the effect of adding to the already extreme and very foolish disparagement of a people the most numerous on the face of the globe, and one whose civilization is altogether the best the world has ever seen apart from Christianity.

A [illegible] both [illegible] and [illegible]. While [illegible] the beautiful temple-grounds near Hang Chow—the Chinese terrestrial paradise—we formed the [illegible] of a [illegible] who had the [illegible] which would [illegible] as [illegible] and who [illegible] was [illegible] fond of music.

I had my melodeon with me (small [illegible]), and as a natural consequence [illegible] and myself became quite [illegible]. Subsequently [illegible] Shanghai and [illegible] very [illegible] together with some beautifully [illegible] music.

I returned the [illegible] afterward, taking my melodeon [illegible] and while [illegible] at the [illegible] he begged me to [illegible] in the house, that the ladies of the family [illegible] behind their screen [illegible] the [illegible]."

I [illegible] and [illegible] in accompanying [illegible] of course—while [illegible] his [illegible] "Ah!" exclaimed he, [illegible] the success of our performance [illegible] two nations could [illegible] happiness."

I have heard [illegible] and benevolent wishes expressed on this subject than that of my [illegible]

sical wanderer friend, especially among the Christian ladies and gentlemen of California.

I remain, yours respectfully,

EDWARD W. STILES.

Fräulein Bettelheim, Contralto, from Vienna, sang an aria from Gluck's Alceste, Schubert's "At the grave of Anselmo," "Aufenthalt," &c. The second part consisted of Gade's last large work, his Cantata "The Crusaders."

In the 20 concerts (besides two for charity) the following works have been performed:

Symphonies: 5 by Beethoven (Nos. 3, 4, 5, 8, 9,—precisely the same as in our Boston Symphony Concerts); 3 by Mendelssohn ("Scotch" and "Italian"); 1 by Gade (B flat and C minor); 2 by Schumann (B flat and D minor); one each by Mozart (D major without Minuet), Haydn (G major), Raff [illegible] ("Roma"), Naumann, Rheinberger ("Wallenstein").

Overtures: 4 by Cherubini (Anacreon, Medea, Wasserträger,—five again Boston); 3 by Mendelssohn (Athalie, Hebrides, Meeresstille); 3 by Beethoven (Leonora, No 3, Fidelio and Op. 124); 1 by Schumann (Genoveva, and Ouverture on the Rheinweinlied); 1 by Weber (Euryanthe, Oberon); one each by Rossini ("Tell"), Gluck (Iphigenia), Volkmann (Fest-overture), Jadassohn, Kalliwoda (Fest-overture), Wagner (Faust), Taubert.

Other orchestral pieces: Concerto for string instruments, two obligato Violins and 'Cello, by Handel; Passacaglia and Toccata by Bach (instrumented by Esser); Entr'acts from Cherubini's Medea; Suite No. 4 (E minor) by F. Lachner; March from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth;" fragments of a Symphony by Schubert; Symphonic Fantasia by Ferd. Hiller; Adagio from Liszt's Faust Symphony; Rakoczy March from "La Damnation de Faust" by Berlioz; two Entr'acts from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; Dances of blessed spirits and of Furies, from Gluck's Orpheus.

Choral Works: Mendelssohn's Hymn, "Hear my prayer;" Ensemble and chorus from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth;" Scenes from "Frithjof's Saga" by Max Bruch; Bridal Hymn by Hermann Zopff; Aus Morea by Carl Reinecke; Handel's cantata "Kaiser" [illegible]; Te Deum by Rietz; "Waldfraulein" by Fritz Gernsheim; Scenes from Schumann's "Genoveva;" Gade's "Crusaders."

Arias: 7 by Mozart; 4 by Handel; 1 by Rossini; one each by Bach, Gluck, Haydn, Spohr, Stradella, Hasler [illegible], Marcello, Wagner, Meyerbeer, Rode (Variations), Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Boieldieu.

Songs (Lieder): 9 by Schumann; 5 by Schubert; 1 by Beethoven (Liederkreis); 2 by Kjerulf; one each by Handel, Pergolese, Haydn, Kirchner, Alabieff, Rubinstein, Brüll.—Not one by Robert Franz!

Instrumental Solos, with and without accompaniment: Pianoforte: 4 by Bach, 3 by Beethoven, 1 by Schumann, 4 by Liszt, 1 by Mendelssohn, 2 by Hiller, 1 by Hummel, 1 by David, and one apiece by Mozart, Reinecke, Rheinberger, Couperin, Handel, Scarlatti, Chopin, Hirschbach, Weber.—Violin: 3 by Spohr and 1 each by Mendelssohn, Lipinski, Viotti, Vieuxtemps, Ernst, Rietz, Paganini.—Violoncello: one by Davidoff.—Oboe: 1 by Schumann.—Harp: Parish Alvars, &c.

The solo pianists were: Mmes. Clara Schumann, Johanna [illegible], Messrs. Hiller and Hans von Bülow, Reinecke, Ehrlich, Hiller, Tausig, Lenbert; the violinists were: Mlles. Charlotte Deckner and Francisca Friese, Messrs. Rappoldi, David, Joachim, Wilhelmj, Hirschfeld.

Of the above named compositions, 21 were produced in the Gewandhaus for the first time.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. Mendelssohn's Lobgesang closed the series on the 20th ult. A writer in the Musical World sums up thus:

There have been twenty-four concerts since the 6th October last, and a host of showers, one to seven works of importance have been presented. Handel's Alexander's Feast (twice), Haydn's Tempest, Macfarren's Christmas, Schumann's Paradise and the Peri and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," were the principal large vocal works performed; while of symphonies all those of Beethoven, with the exception of the 9th, have been played as well as the following:—Haydn—C minor (No. 1); D (No. 2); Mozart—C major (Jupiter); Schubert—B minor (unfinished); Mendelssohn—Italian and Scotch (two each); Spohr—Power of Sound (Consecration of Sound); Schumann—No. 1, B flat; 2, C major; 3, D minor; Gade—No. 1, C minor. Overtures and concerted of all the great masters have been given; and the following eminent instrumental soloists have at different times appeared: Mme. Arabella Goddard (twice); Mme. Schumann (twice); Mlle. Anna Mehlig; Miss Madeline Schiller; Herr Joachim; Herr Ludwig Straus (twice); M. Sainton; Signor Piatti; M. Dannreuther; Herr Wilhelmj (twice); Herr Barrington; M. Oscar Beringer, and Mr. Franklin Taylor. The late Mr. [illegible], at whose instance—during the previous season—a different system of [illegible] instruments—having been caused since the commencement of the series [illegible] M. Manns was able to satisfy the requirements of the most exacting and, thanks to his untiring energy and the constant opportunity for united practice, he has now made his concert a band that may not only fairly challenge comparison with any in England but may take honourable rank with any of the great continental orchestras; and I believe that I cannot express my own individual opinion, but also that of any connoisseur who has attended these concerts regularly, that such performances of great orchestral works have never before been heard in this country, and that it is not hyperbolical praise to say that they have been at times perfection as it is possible to attain. What, for instance, could be finer than the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven on Saturday last? From the first note of the bright, cheerful allegro until the thanksgiving to the end of the finale, every note of it was well rendered, while the exquisite [illegible] and the wonderfully rendered storm held their hearers spell-bound. I think in truth there were few in the room who would not have been delighted to hear the whole symphony again from beginning to end. It was hardly fair to Mr. Sullivan to place the overture from his MS opera, The Sapphire Necklace, immediately after Beethoven's gigantic work; nevertheless, this clever young composer's music went well and the audience seemed pleased so thoroughly that one felt inclined to say, "Has there any one more?"—and failing the "encore" the audience asked for [illegible] repetition of the song, "Love will be master," sung by Miss Edith Wynne, whose thoroughly sympathetic and unusual voice is always sure to win.

Herr Straus was warmly and deservedly applauded for his violin solo, adagio and rondo from Vieuxtemps' concerto in E sharp minor (No. 2); and that Mlle. Enequist and M. De Fontanier [illegible] contributed to the vocal portion of the programme, which opened with Spohr's overture to Jessonda, and closed with Schumann's overture to Manfred.

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. Discouraged, by want of patronage, as well as by the untimely death of its conductor, Alfred Mellon, has dissolved.

ORATORIOS. During the last weeks of April the National Choral Society performed Elijah (with Sunday, Mme. Sherrington, Miss Lucy Franklein and Mr. Leigh Wilson, Mr. Martin conducting); and The Messiah (Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Palmer, Mr. Kedge and Mr. L. Thomas). On the 1st of May Mr. Martin was to conduct a Choral Festival of 5,000 voices at the Crystal Palace.—The Sacred Harmonic Society has given a thirty-fifth annual Passion-week performance of the Messiah (Mme. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Reeves and Santley), and a second performance of Benedict's Legend of St. Cecilia, followed by Rossini's Stabat Mater.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The third concert attracted a larger audience to the Hanover Square Rooms. The two symphonies were Schumann in D minor (No. 4) and Mendelssohn in A major (the "Italian"). The last was so familiar to the members of the orchestra as at present that, it may diffidently be the case would arise; but it is was a very different matter and Mr. Cusins may be congratulated on the talent and readiness with which he acquitted himself of the task of directing its performance. Both symphonies were played with remarkable spirit, and those who had amusement in listening and comparing the respective merits of Schumann and Mendelssohn had a full opportunity of indulging their peculiar taste. The great majority of the Philharmonic audience, if applause may be accepted as criterion, were for Mendelssohn. The overtures were Beethoven's magnificent Egmont and the Ruler of the Spirits (Beherrscher)—perhaps, after Der Freischütz, and not forgetting Oberon or Euryanthe, Weber's very best overture prelude. The concerto was Beethoven's No. 4 (in G) for pianoforte, played with splendid energy by Mme. Schumann, and though not accompanied by the orchestra throughout with such uniform carefulness as might have been desirable, received with unanimous marks of satisfaction at the end. The singers were Mlles. Enequist and Drasdil, soprano and contralto. Mlle. Enequist selected for solo the grand and trying recitative and air of Donna Anna, from the last act of Don Giovanni, and sang it with sufficient success as to justify her choice. Mlle. Drasdil, who has a voice the quality of which stands in no need of effort to reveal, chose the number "Spirit song" of Haydn; and the two ladies together gave the long and showy duet, "Sebben ognor" from Rossini's Semiramide.

MADAME SCHUMANN has given two "Piano-forte Recitals" at St. James's Hall (consisting, if we may account of the specimens of her late husband's music which were included in the programme, and which she played as perfectly as any mortal could be played, and with no less delight than intense satisfaction). These comprise the Arabesque (Op. 18), which had already been applauded at the Monday Popular Concerts; the "Carnaval," or Scènes Mignonnes (Op. 9), an attempt on the part of Schumann at the humoresque in which Mr. Charles Hallé was among the first to make English amateurs familiar (at his "Recitals"); the Etudes en forme de Variations (Op. 13—dedicated to William Sterndale Bennett); Mme. Schumann's own admirable performance of which at the Monday Popular Concerts, in 1865, is still remembered; two pieces from the Album für die Jugend (Op. 68), and several vocal pieces, confided at the first "Recital" to Mlle. Enequist, and at the second to Mme. Sainton-Dolby. All these afforded deep gratification to the admirers of Schumann's compositions—among the instrumental specimens more particularly the two sonatas, and among the songs "Frühlingsnacht" (Mlle. Enequist) and "Mondnacht" (Mme. Sainton), each of which was asked for again. Mme. Schumann also played the Sonata Appassionata and the Moonlight Sonata of Beethoven; solo pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Hensel; and, with Signor Piatti, Mendelssohn's great sonata in D major for pianoforte and violoncello. The vocal music was accompanied by M. Zerbini. Though not crowded, both "Recitals" were well attended. Mme. Schumann soon leaves London, after her third, and by no means least successful, visit. She must be aware by this time, that those who told her she would meet only enemies might have more honestly told her she would meet only friends.—Mus. World.

MR. HALLÉ'S RECITALS. During his forthcoming series of "Piano-forte Recitals" Mr. Hallé is to play at each recital a solo sonata by Schubert, and one of the duets for piano and violoncello of Beethoven or Mendelssohn.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, APR. 19. Since the date of my last letter there has been very little to record. Don Carlos is still running at the Italian Opera, and Romeo and Juliet (Gounod's latest) is still unproduced; the regular musical season here is now drawing rapidly to a close, and there would soon be a complete dearth of musical news, were it not that a sort of supplementary season commences at Easter this year by reason of the crowds of people who are here to attend the Exposition.

The said Exposition is as yet very incomplete, and will not be in absolute working order before May 1st, however there is even now much to interest the old tar and the crusades which our American Grand Pianos are producing here is something positively amusing. Those manufactured upon the European plan of construction are vastly superior to any which are made here, while those gotten up upon the New American system have excited the wonder and admiration of the jury, the pianoforte makers and of the general public. The three leading manufacturers, Erard, Pleyel, and Herz, have expressed their delight and surprise at these new products of American industry and although M. Erard has requested permission to adopt the so lately patented the new system, America has truly inaugurated a new era in piano-forte making. The Erard and Pleyel pianos are without doubt fine instruments but there is lacking a that that volume and richness of tone which one finds in the American grands.

The Cabinet Organs also, of Mason & Hamlin, are well spoken of and are regarded as surprising proofs of the superiority of American machinery; it being a well known fact that the European Cabinet Organs are still made by hand.

At the Athenée was given, on Friday evening last, an orchestral concert under the direction of the composer Pasdeloup. For programme we had 1st Symphony, C major, Beethoven; Suite d'Orchestre, Massenet; Concerto for piano, [illegible], (played by the composer); and the "Ruy Blas" Overture by Mendelssohn. The Suite by Massenet was in the modern French style, all trombone, kettle-drum and triangle; the Concerto was well intended but was quite weak and lacked unity, the Rondo (Finale) was mediocre, and resembled greatly a common polka with fiddle obligato; the Symphony and Overture need no comment, they were most admirably played.

On Wednesday evening, April 10, a Quartet Concert occurred at the Salle Pleyel. For programme we had: Quartet, E flat major (piano), Weber; Quintet, C major, Op. 29 (strings), Beethoven; Sonata, (piano and violoncello) D major, op. 58, Mendelssohn; and Trio, E flat major (strings), Mozart. The Mendelssohn Sonata was the feature of the evening and was really well played by Mme. Massart and M. Jacquard; the Allegretto Scherzando (2d movement) produced a marked effect.

Patti is still singing here. Laura Harris and Jenny Kempton are also here. Harry Sanderson will be here in August. Joachim appears at a concert here on Friday evening, April 19th. The Congressional agitation on the subject of wearing or not wearing court robes at court presentations is creating much difficulty here. Americans generally hail the recent regulations as a step in the right direction, and as soon as formal instructions shall have been received by our ministers here and at other courts, there will be a large delegation of black coated and white necktied gentlemen at future diplomatic receptions, dinners, balls and the like.

The weather here is really abominable. Since the 3rd of March there has absolutely been but one day when it was possible to be in the street for an hour without carrying an umbrella. This is April weather and reminds one forcibly and unpleasantly of the same in America. [illegible]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1867.

Robert Franz.

The most unique, perhaps the most beautiful concert of our year occurred in the time and place, at the Chickering Hall, on Friday afternoon, May 3. Nearly four hundred admirers of the most original song composer of our time, feeling a debt of gratitude to him for many of the sweetest inspirations and much of the finest culture of their lives and touched by the report of his increasing deafness and his consequent means, eagerly took these tickets and cheerfully shared in this testimonial of respect and sympathy for ROBERT FRANZ. Franz means simply as a gift, the gift of friends from such songs make their author many friends in a sure sense, though there may never see Mr. Franz's face hear his voice—the sampling of a Concert with the one was only to give it more life as it were tended in expression to the common feeling. The offering was further swelled by several contributions of a hundred dollars each (one of them from the Orpheus Club), and as the expenses were [illegible], the sum of about $[illegible] net was the gratifying net result. Not a few held tickets who renounced the pleasure of attendance, knowing too well that the concert room could not hold all.

It was an act worthy of a city so loving city. The prime movers were first that intimate friend of Franz and kindred spirit who introduced the songs here fifteen years ago, and who by the earnestness of his convictions about them and his rare power of playing their peculiar accompaniments has done so much to make them more known and appreciated here than in any city—even of Germany till very lately—OTTO DRESEL,—wherever he goes the songs of Franz are sure to take root; then Mr. KREISSMANN, who for years has so identified himself with those songs by his own noble singing of them; these, and those other classical pianists, LANG and LEONHARD and PARKER, always ready at the call of Franz or Bach (two names which have here grown to be almost inseparable). These were the managers and the programme was as choice as they could make it:

Choice selections, and in very able hands. Four excellent singers (Mrs. HARWOOD, soprano; Mrs. J. S. CARY, contralto; Mr. [illegible], tenor; Mr. [illegible], bass), the four pianists above mentioned, with four fine Chickering Grands—these were the interpreters. And all went in a charm at least such was the sense of the delighted audience. The piece from the Bach Cantata,—a sort of harmonized Choral, sections and verses, matches of song between long phrases filled by instrumental symphony, was sung by the four voices, and the accompaniments were played on the four pianos from the full score, one taking here and there parts, another the violins, &c. Bach's thought was reproduced thus in its integrity and the effect was extremely beautiful and novel. The accompanying of the characteristic figure kept up by the several instruments, light and delicate and cheerful, was like a green field of May, especially in the long preludes, and seemed to tell how cheerful is the prelude in a Christian's thought to the great change.

The triple Concerto in C was played as it was some three years ago by the same artists in one or two of Mr. Dresel's Concerts, he representing the string accompaniment on a fourth piano. It was like hearing a fresh inexhaustible flood of melody, converging currents sending in from all directions. The four keyboards seemed to be all one instrument, and the eight hands moved with one will; it was healthy case, serene old Bach that played to us! The Alto Aria is one from the next of nine for each kind of voice which Franz arranged from the score of various Bach Cantatas, Masses &c. and is the first of the series rendered into by Franz in English words: "Well done ye good and faithful servants." The broad, sustained melody, rich and tender and fervent, was admirably sung by Mrs. Cary who gave herself up simply to the spirit of the heartfelt, noble music. This too was accompanied on four pianos, and this ended the Bach portion—the musical foundation (so to say) of Robert Franz.

The happiest possible transition to his own endless, almost Shakespearian variety of fresh new Songs in every mood and that very style, perfect one as rich and intimate in poetry which reflects the images of Heine's ardent love song as clearly as "the Rhine, the holy stream," itself its rich stores glow undecays the old cathedral that contains the picture of Madonna, surrounded by "flowers and angels" and in which the poet sees "the eyes, the lips, the cheeks" of his beloved. This too Mrs. Cary sang with chaste and exquisite expression.

And now the Franz songs were poured out in profusion and variety. The contrary of them and the four before the end were sung with genuine fervor in his best voice, [illegible] by Mr. Kreissmann: "Weil auf mir du dunkles Auge" and the sparkling and little May Song of Goethe were sung by Mrs. Harwood, completely carrying her audience away and she was obliged to raise the enthusiasm to a yet higher pitch by giving the breezy, sounding rapture: "Im Wald, im Wald."

The pieces from other composers, thrown in for relief were all greatly relished. The two-part songs given with fine life and delicacy by the two ladies were delicious, and the Fidelio Quartet, "Mir ist so wunderbar," accompanied by Dresel and Leonhard hardly compelled an encore. The Overtures were played on two pianos by eight hands,—both singularly clear reproductions, in all save color, of the orchestral score. The "Melusina" was familiar; this by Gade proved a delightful new acquaintance.

We fancy this report from Boston will pleasantly startle the quaint old German town of Halle (Handel's birthplace) where Franz works and sings, unworldly and retired in the old Leipzig Gewandhaus not courting personal fame or wealth, quietly abiding his time rich in his loyalty to Mozart and Bach,—of whom he is since Mendelssohn, the deepest, surest and most uplifting interpreter; his own fresh rills of Song pure streams are of original genius more modern of the modern, do not denote him more truly than that sympathy of his whole soul with Bach. Alas that he should be growing deaf! Ever since that fatal locomotive screamed in his ear (some six or seven years ago) all loud sounds, as of the full organ, have been unbearable to him and, becoming insensible first to the highest tones of the scale he has grown losing tone by tone downward. This is important to us for the various Orchestrations which have been his main stay rather than the slender remuneration for his songs and Bach arrangements. May this our greeting, of Boston artists and art-lovers, cheer the noble Singer as his songs have many a time cheered us!

Mr. C. [illegible] is the name of a young amateur pianist, organist also at Dr. [illegible]'s Church in Roxbury, to whom a very pleasant little complimentary Concert was given on Monday evening at Chickering's. It was meant as a Godspeed on his departure for San Francisco, where he proposes to make music his profession principally as teacher. The part which the young man took in the concert (his last public effort, we believe) was modest, simply the piano part in Beethoven's Trio of Haydn (in C) which was a clear and faithful though not ripe performance, and his whole appearance was simple, gentlemanly and winning. At any rate he comed to have the sympathy of a large and refined audience. All the rest was done by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who played the first Allegro and Adagio from Beethoven's B-flat Quartet (op. 130) and Schubert's Quartet (posthumous) in D minor; and by Miss Addie Ryan [illegible], who sang, in admirable style, two capital selections. The first, however, "Saml ah [illegible]," from Handel's Ezechia, was hardly suited to her [illegible] voice, still the song of the page, "Voi che sapete" in Mozart's Figaro, which we associate with voices of a lighter calibre. The Handel piece had to be repeated.

We must go back merely to record the names—no room for the manner—of several concerts which we had to pass over before last. And first:

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S Vocal Club of amateurs sang on two successive Monday evenings to an invited company the following choice programme:—Part I. Salve Regina, by Hauptmann. Number Song from Schumann's "Paradise and Peri" (Soprano Solo Miss [illegible] and chorus). Songs, [illegible]. Part-Songs: "Good Night," Schumann; and "Hunting Song," Mendelssohn. Spring-Fantasia (piano solo and quartet), by Gade. Part II. The Walpurgis Night, first of the Four of [illegible], by Mendelssohn—the solos by the Messrs. W[illegible].

MR. PERABO'S Piano-forte Soirée of April 11 (his last concert for the season) offered a Prelude and Fugue in D minor by Mendelssohn; Schubert's great Sonata in B flat major (four movements), and the sixth Partita of Bach in E minor (consisting of Toccata, Allemande, Courante, Air, Sarabande, Gavotte and Gigue)—all greatly relished, especially the last. Mr. [illegible], the sweet singer of the German Opera, at Mr. Perabo's concert, sang "Dalla sua pace" from Don Giovanni, Schubert's "Die [illegible]" and "Spring Night," and for an encore "The Wanderer," all in a manner that proved him well skilled, though some of his high notes [illegible] the pleasure of the most correct ones.

Both of the new "Conservatories" have had Chamber Concerts, the first, quite chiefly. The "Boston Conservatory," at Chickering's, April 18, gave Beethoven's E-flat Trio, op. 70, played by Messrs. EICHBERG, LISTEMANN and [illegible]; a couple of Part Songs and Schubert's [illegible], sung by Mr. [illegible]; Variations, from the 5th Beethoven Quartet (Messrs. [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible]); a Scherzo and Andante Spianato of Chopin (Mr. Leonhard), the adagio Trio in D, and a harp piece by Miss [illegible]. [illegible] the lady are pupils in the Conservatory.

The second programme of the first Soirée of the "New England" [illegible] was this:

Cabinet Organ and Piano: [illegible]. [illegible] Schumann. Song [illegible]. Symphony [illegible] Bach. "On Mighty [illegible]" (Transcribed for [illegible]) [illegible]. [illegible] Haydn. Piano. [illegible] Mendelssohn. [illegible] Harp and Piano. [illegible] with [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] Piano. [illegible] Trio, Schubert. [illegible] Cabinet Organ, Piano and Violin. [illegible] in the "Fledermaus" and "Faneuse."

New Works on Music.

FROM OUR A. W. THAYER.

TRIEST, March, 1867.

DEAR DWIGHT,—I wish to call your attention to two volumes which are probably as yet unknown in the United States, as they have but recently appeared from the press of Breitkopf & Härtel, in Leipzig.

The first, of about 300 pages, is by DR. EDWARD KRÜGER, "System der Tonkunst." I have often thought of the necessity of some text-book of musical science—which would be a good basis for instruction in our colleges, when the Arts of music shall come and [illegible] there—and have made myself pretty familiarly acquainted with the productions of ten years in that direction, from the antiquarian [illegible] volumes of [illegible], yours [illegible], [illegible] to the present time. Now at length I think such a book has come, and I can only hope that it will soon find a competent translator. Such a translator is one who not only is fully able to give the German sense in English, but one who has knowledge sufficient to give examples from English and other composers well known with us, corresponding to those from German authors. Not that he shall change the author's text, but that he should add in some places, by the margin or at the end of the chapters, that which would adapt the book especially to the use of American students.

It should be entirely a translation. The instructor should be a man of wide-reaching knowledge in the literary sense as well as a thorough composer, so that the text-book might be but the skeleton of the body of science, which his classes should be enabled by him to master.

Of course the reading of common music at sight, some previous knowledge of harmony and the simple rules of musical composition, should be required of the student before taking up the study of the system, just as a certain degree of knowledge upon other topics is required before the pupil is admitted into college.

It may be said that such a professor and such pupils are of "the things that are not." Perhaps so; but suppose such a professor should be sought,—How long before the demand would create supply? And as to pupils, in my time we could have got up such a professorship very respectably in old Harvard. I will leave you to reflect upon and carry out these ideas, and turn for a moment to Dr. Krüger's book. The best idea I can give you of it will be by a glance at the table of contents:

A short philosophical introduction, then

Book I. Nature and Speciality of Music.

1. Some remarks upon Art in general, and upon various Arts and then specially of music.

2. Rhythm and Harmony,—what is Music.

3. Natural tones.—Consonance.—Dissonance.—Vibrations, peculiar phenomena, &c. &c.; and thus we reach

4. The Scale.

Book II. Music as an Art. Here we have

1. Melody,—its genesis—analysis—Rhythm—Metre.—Quantity.—Accent, &c. &c.

2. Musical System—thirty pages of very rich and suggestive matter, but it will take too much space to condense to particularize.

Sixty pages upon Harmony follow, and twenty-two upon Rhythm.

Then comes the Doctrine of Forms:—

Variable forms,—as the Prelude, the Fantasia, Bagatelle, &c., &c.

Determinate forms,—the Song-form (Simple Song, Air, Rondo, Variations &c., and Accompaniment.

And so we come to Counterpoint, Imitation, Canon, Fugue, and finally to the Motet Cantata, Sonata, Symphony, Concerto, Opera, with analytical remarks upon some of Handel's Oratorios and Mozart's Operas.

I need hardly speak of the abundant proofs of vast research which this work exhibits on every page, and of the rising general progress of the author from simple roots to the grandeur of Handel's Israel in Egypt and the magnificence of Don Juan.

That this is not an A. B. C. book for beginners you have already seen; that it is "meat for men of full age,—not milk for babes"—is perhaps self-evident. I shall be glad to have hereafter the opinion of some of our educated German musicians upon it, for it is not to be doubted that a work like this will find some purchasers in the United States.

The other volume is "Gesammelte Aufsätze über Musik" (Collected Articles upon Music) by Otto Jahn. Of course every body who has studied at all that kind of knowledge, knows who Jahn is:—Professor at Bonn, the great archaeologist and philologist, the author of the great biography of Mozart, one of those men whose powers of learning fill us with wonder and whose capacity for labor, with astonishment. In addition to his philological studies in his youth and early manhood, he made a special study of music, both at Leipzig and in Berlin under Dehn, and he now [illegible] profound contrapuntal studies for his future use in the field of musical literature and criticism, as few if any of his contemporaries have done.

This volume contains the following articles:

1. Biographical Sketch of C. C. Apel, a great organist and composer for the German Protestant church.

2. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

3. " "Elijah."

4. Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

5. Berlioz's "Condemnation of Faust."

6. "Lohengrin" (Wagner).

7. 23d Music Festival of the Lower Rhine.

8. 24th " " " "

9. Mozart—paraliponema.

10. "Leonore" or "Fidelio."

11. Beethoven in Malfatti's.

12. Beethoven and the new Editions of his works.

The three Articles on the 5th, 7th and 12th are of a very great interest. The two upon Wagner's operas, together the best that I have been over, as. They judge of the works in the light afforded by a fully competent knowledge of German literature (as evidence the texts) and of musical science, combined with common sense, an article which is generally found in full-sized [illegible] what Wagner's compositions have been the subject of discussion.

If "St. Paul" and "Elijah" were not so well known with us, and had not already been here the subjects of excellent articles, I should quote those by Jahn as also the discussions cited.

The volume is not large, only 337 pages; but it is "full of meat." I recommend it heartily to those who read German and care for this branch of literature.

NEW YORK. Parepa and Persiani—the musical chiefs of the two names will be worth assembling in Maretzek's warbler scene ... but now his season is done. "Angela Persiani" (says the New York Musik-Zeitung) "is the name of a new prima donna who has appeared at the Academy of Music and brings the season to a close with a certain éclat. She comes from Mexico and Havana. Her voice, to be sure, is no longer young, but it has a certain 'timbre,' in which one gladly yields himself, whereas she sings with much understanding and correctness. She knows what she wants, and she never wants more than she can accomplish. She is a well-fitted singer. We would gladly have availed ourselves of her earlier. With the exception of Parepa the lady singers of the Italian Opera have not been very successful. Miss Kellogg is better in a clever actor, but there is a certain routine monotony in her performances. She has not made progress, and I would wish to be absent, so that she should appear before a foreign public, free from a restless 'après poet' thereafter, as an artist in the end and [illegible] conversance in Art.

"Miss Persiani has appeared three times: in the Sonnambula, the Puritani, and Lucia. She seems fond of singing the Bellini operas, and as she has ... with success [illegible] ... Morphine [illegible] the singers of the day, she is ... suppose ... to make Bellini's parts effect ... has to give Verdi's."

The [illegible] SOCIETY celebrated its 20th Anniversary on [illegible] day evening by a concert at Steinway Hall. The noble orchestra of [illegible], under Bergmann, it takes here done [illegible], especially in Beethoven's C minor Symphony (a revival by ... of ... Society, a first concert ... years ago), and in Liszt's Les Préludes." Of the rest the Tribune says:

The cantata of Frithjof's Saga, a fine work by Max Bruch—the beauty of the Ballads and the harmony of the Sagas coming through its choruses—was sung at length by the Liederkranz. Herr ... of ... [illegible] Frithjof's ... and a tasteful tone ... appeared at the hall, ... The Liederkranz has never been ... and I am sure that ... performances are so happy and delivering and ... so largely and clearly placed. The work must be heard many times before final judgment ... of course, it is the intention of the Society to repeat it often. The programme will further included a Concerto for two pianos, by Mozart, delightfully played by Mr. William Mason and Mr. Emile Guyon; and Weber's beautiful and inspiring Jubilee Overture. There was, beside, an almost irrelevant but respectable section by the Rev. Franklin Johnson, sandwiched between Beethoven and Mozart, and indicating to the extent of the contrast.

Mr. Harrison's "Grand Musical Festival" of a week, beginning June 3, is announced in full. Monday, the Messiah; Tuesday, Hymn of Praise, and a new Festpsalm Psalm, written for the occasion by F. L. Ritter; Wednesday, Creation; Friday, Elijah. All the Oratorios to be conducted by Mr. Ritter. On Thursday an Orchestral Concert: Beethoven's "Seventh" Symphony (Bergmann conductor) and Liszt's "Les Preludes" (Carl Bergmann conductor). Saturday, Miscellaneous: Orchestra under Anschütz, Grafulla's Seventh Regiment Band and Drum Corps [illegible]. There is a long list of solo singers, including Mme [illegible], Mme [illegible], Mme. Rosa, Mme [illegible] Simpson Thomas, Campbell, &c. For piano: Mme [illegible] Mr. [illegible] and Colby; violin [illegible]; Wenzel Kopta and [illegible]; organists Morgan and Connolly. Chorus (Harmonic Society) of 300 voices. Orchestra: 150.

BANGOR, ME. We are pleased to learn that

"A Choral Festival was held at Norumbega Hall, commencing Tuesday April 9th and continuing four days. The "Messiah" was given on Thursday evening and Rossini's Stabat Mater closed the Festival on Friday evening. The soloists were Miss J. F. Houston, Mrs J. S. Cary, Mr James Whitney and M. W. Whitney of this city. The instrumental assistance was The Mendelssohn Quintette Club and Mr A. Suck, contra basso. The Chorus numbered two hundred voices. The Conductor was Mr. [illegible] Davenport of Bangor. The chorus rehearsals were entirely devoted to Oratorio music, no Church music or glee music being introduced. It was a great success and has done much for the cause of musical art in Maine."

This lifting of the old fashioned psalm-singing and psalm-book editing "Convention" into an Oratorio Festival was, we understand, purely the conception of Mr. Davenport, and indicates a movement in a right direction. It is high time that the great musical gatherings in the large towns should use their powers and opportunities in studying and bringing out real masterworks of Art, instead of longer making themselves [illegible] old machines for grinding, so yearly, psalm-tunes by the thousand every year. Where they [illegible] and [illegible] with imperfect instrumental means they can, do much to bring the acquaintance of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn home to the people.

NEW LONDON, CONN. Mr. Ralph Beecher Turner, organist of St. James Church had a benefit concert on the 20th ult. at Lawrence Hall, which seems to have been a considerable event for that region. Two hundred persons went to it from Norwich on a special train. The Norwich Bulletin says:

The great feature of the concert was Mr. Petersilea's playing. In the first part of the programme he performed Thalberg's variations on a favorite air from [illegible] Amore" and subsequently, a[illegible] elaborate and brilliant composition by Chopin. These selections afforded a fine opportunity for the display of the strength, firmness and delicacy which are so happily combined in his style. He plays with great ease of manner and with little apparent effort, and we feel a reserve of force not all brought to the display of the scores. Mr. Petersilea gave a "[illegible]" and "Tarantelle" [illegible] Vieuxtemps's [illegible] —an extreme [illegible] and graceful rendering, being well [illegible] in the accompaniment by Mr. [illegible]. He afterward played the popular "[illegible]" [illegible] and received an encore. Miss Loring appeared in an aria from "Wm Tell," and a "Spring Time" a song by Franz. She has a pure soprano voice and rendered her selections in good style. Miss Addie M. Ryan sang a cavatina from "Tancredi," and a song composed for her entitled "Many a Time and Oft." She is a contralto, has a highly cultivated voice, and a finished style. She was warmly received.

Mr. Dunn sustained, with the exception above mentioned, the thankless and often unappreciated duty of accompanist. He however performed a solo, and took the second part in a duo with Mr. Petersilea. The fact that the concert was undertaken for his benefit, and the intense enthusiasm with which he attended to and arranged all the preliminary details, enlisted the interest of the audience in his behalf. He certainly labored most assiduously to gain the public approval and he deserved it. His solo was an Andante and a Presto movement from Mendelssohn. His music is not so [illegible] and vigorous as that of Mr. Petersilea, neither has his style that character, and the singing "pose" [illegible] with [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] have been [illegible] by any [illegible] [illegible] cases and [illegible] [illegible] himself. He [illegible] guided rather by delicacy and [illegible] than by [illegible] and energy. By tenderness and expression than by brilliancy—on least those were the impressions we [illegible] from the [illegible] he [illegible] [illegible] a list of last evening. He is an artist of great promise and we hope he will give us another hearing. It may be a friendly [illegible]. We understand concerts are to be given by the [illegible] company in this city [illegible] [illegible] etc.

MORE WORKS OF MENDELSSOHN. The long controversy between Mendelssohn's musical executors and his wholesale London admirers who claim that all he ever wrote should see the light (even in spite of his own wishes while he lived), seems to be at last settled in favor of the latter. The London Daily News has the following:

"Our musical readers will learn with pleasure that the house of Messrs. Ewer will shortly publish some important works of Mendelssohn's which his executors have only just decided on allowing to appear. The first composition to be brought out will be the concert overture in C, known as the Trumpet overture, from the frequent recurrence of a characteristic passage for that instrument. This work was written in 1825 and was performed at the Düsseldorf musical festival in 833 and two or three times by our Philharmonic Society, but was withheld from publication by Mendelssohn himself. The most important, however, is that of the production of Mendelssohn's great 'Reformation' Symphony in D minor, a work composed in 1830. It was written as a German Reformation Festival. Mendelssohn wrote the Reformation Symphony during his stay in Rome, probably in [illegible], as Mr. [illegible] [illegible] it [illegible] composer [illegible] the [illegible] artist to [illegible] his [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] work, had been [illegible]. It is [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] of one so [illegible] in musical genius, the prospect of the appearance of such a treasure is most welcome and gratifying, and it is to be hoped that [illegible] will lead the way to that of others of the many works of their composer which [illegible] remain in manuscript."

Of Mlle. C. Louisa Hauck's appearance at the Italian Opera in place of Mlle. Patti, M. Music in Vienna in the Year 1793.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

We begin with the musical Drama. The enthusiasm of Joseph II. for a German national Opera (to which we are indebted for Mozart's Seraglio) did not prove of long duration, and the Italian opera buffa regained its place in his affections. The newly engaged company were in a condition however to perform Mozart's Figaro and Don Juan, as well as Salieri's Axur.

On the morning of the 13th of March 1790 Leopold II. arrived in Vienna to ascend the throne of his deceased brother, but for a while no changes occurred in the court theatres. Before the 9th of July he had not entered any theatre, and the first opera which he attended was Salieri's Axur (Dec 11) in the company of his guest, King Ferdinand of Naples. But when he had become sufficiently well settled on the Imperial throne, had succeeded in setting aside Joseph's unsuccessful reforms, had brought the Turkish war to a close and happily got through with his various conventions, he turned his thoughts also to the theatre. "The Emperor had it in his mind," writes the actor Lange (Biography, p. 16), "to raise the stage to the highest pitch both in regard to the variety of plays and the splendor of each individually, and he then said he spared no expense. Singers of both sexes were enrolled for serious Italian Opera, and a company of dancers for a Ballet under the ballet master Muzzarelli, was engaged." Salieri, although then but 41 years old and enriched by the observation and experience of 25 years in the conduct of the opera, received gracious leave, according to Mosel, but according to other and better authorities, directions, to withdraw from the Opera altogether and confine himself to his duties as director of the sacred music in the court Chapel, besides the composition of one opera yearly, should it be required. The Vienna Zeitung of Jan 29th 1792, mentions the appointment of Joseph Weigl, his early pupil and assistant, then 25 years old, as "Kapellmeister and Kompositeur of the Royal Imperial National Court Theatre, with 600 florins salary." The title "Kompositeur" was an empty one; although already favorably known to the public, he was forbidden to write new operas for the court stage, for this end "famous masters" were to be drawn to Vienna. A first fruit of this new order of things was the performance of Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto (Feb. 7 1792) with which, and with good reason, Leopold was so enraptured that he gave the performers a supper and ordered them back to the theatre to do the opera over again. It was one of the Emperor's last theatrical enjoyments; on the 1st of March he died and his wife followed him on the 15th of May following. Accordingly the court theatres were closed for the greater part of the time from March 1 to May 24; and yet during the theatrical season, which ended with the 15th of December, Italian Opera had been given 150 times (124 times in the palace and 26 times in the Kärnthnerthor-theatre); the Ballet 153 times, so that [illegible] for the time being there was no abundant room for a young composer like Beethoven to hear and see in these branches of Art. All accounts agree, that the opera company at that time was of uncommon excellence, and their performances, with that of the hitherto unrivalled orchestra, proved the value of the Emperor's preference, the refined taste, the indefatigable zeal and the profound knowledge of their old leader Salieri. As Beethoven found the opera in the first week of November 1792 so it remained during the next two years, exclusively Italian, but of the first rank.

Just at that time by a special stroke of uncommonly good fortune, a smaller private theatrical enterprise had been so successful that after ten years it was able to build and occupy the best playhouse in Vienna, and for some time to surpass the royal theatre in the excellence and splendor of its operatic performances; we mean Schikaneder's Theater auf der Wieden. In the year 1792, however, the company was weak, its house small, its performances bad enough.

* * * * *

Of Schikaneder and his company a writer of that time says: "The two theatres of any note (beside the court theatres) are that of Schikaneder on the Wieden and that of Marinelli in the so-called Casperl, in the Leopoldstadt. In both are given German plays and German operas. As regards decency of costume and execution of the orchestra, there is plenty to say against both theatres, so too with the worse the singing and the acting there. As the Italian operas are performed so excellently in the court theatre, neither of the German theatres perhaps dares to translate and serve them up; on the contrary almost everything in these theatres is enchanted, full of magic: thus for example we have the Magic Flute, the Magic Ring, the Enchanted Arrow, the Magic Mirror, the Magic Crown, and more such wretched stuff, the sight and hearing of which is enough to turn one's mind out. Trash and mummery dance through the whole, side by side—except the Zauberflöte—so that one does not know whether the poet sought to surpass the composer or the composer the poet, in more miserable scribbling. To which add that these miserable productions are still more miserably represented. Mozart's excellent music to the Zauberflöte is so murderously spoiled behind such a stage that you would run away for pity. Not a single singer, male or female, is to be heard there, who is above mediocrity in singing or in action. The same is the case with the German Opera in Marinelli's theatre; only he has two or three more persons who are tolerable."

Schikaneder's Capellmeister and composer was J. B. Henneberg; Marinelli's was Wenzel Müller, who had already opened the long series of his 233 light and popular compositions to texts of magic and broad farce.

Some two weeks after Beethoven's arrival in Vienna (Nov. 30) Schikaneder (falsely) announced the one hundredth performance of the "Magic Flute" an opera, whose success a few years later put him in a theatre upon an entirely new footing, and brought Beethoven into a different relation to him than that of an ordinary visitor indulging his fondness for the comic, and (according to Seyfried) heartily enjoying the bad music that went with it.

The best dramatic composers of Vienna, not already named, must here have passing mention. Besides Cimarosa, who left Vienna a few months later, Beethoven found there Peter Dutillieu, a Frenchman by birth, but an Italian musician in culture and position; he was engaged as composer for the court theatre. His opera, Il Trionfo [illegible] had been performed there on the 14th of November 1791, and his Nannerina e Pandolfino had come upon the stage quite recently. Ignaz Umlauf, composer of Die schöne Schusterin and other once not unpopular operas, had the title of a Capellmeister and composer of the German court opera, and was Salieri's substitute as capellmeister in the church music of the court chapel. Franz Xaver Süssmayr, well known by his connection with Mozart, was just then writing for Schikaneder's stage, [illegible] for Marinelli's theatre, or for the private theatres of the nobility; and Paul Wranitzky, the first violinist and so-called musical director in the German court theatre, composer of the then famous Oberon, composed for the Theater auf der Wieden, and seemed to be a very respectable talent, both for Marinelli and for Schikaneder.

The Church Music of Vienna seems to have held a very low stand in the years 1793–5. Yet there were then in Vienna two composers, whose names are still important in the history of music, and who devoted themselves almost exclusively to this branch of the art: the court organist Albrechtsberger, who some months later through the death of Leopold Hofmann (March 17 1793) became musical director at St. Stephen's church, and Joseph Eybler, some five years older than Beethoven, who had just become Regens chori in the Carmelite church, from which he was called two years later to a similar but better situation at the Scottish church.

Public concerts, in the present sense of the word, can scarcely be said to have existed at that time, and regular subscription concerts were rare. Mozart gave a series of them; but after his death there seems to have been no one in the musical world of great name enough to engage successfully in such a speculation. Single subscription concerts, given by virtuosos, and musical ones arranged by some of the best resident musicians in Vienna, of course occurred then, as they have done before and since. The only actual public concerts properly so called, were the four annual performances in the Burg theatre, two at Christmas time and two at Easter, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of musicians. These concerts, principally arranged by Gassmann and Salieri, were rather exclusive in their programmes. Overtures, Symphonies, Cantatas, Concertos, everything that could increase their attraction, found acceptance. The stage was filled with the best musicians and singers of the capital, and the excellent orchestra was equally ready to accompany the playing of a Mozart or that of any infant phenomenon of the moment. Riesbeck heard, ten years before, that the number of participants in orchestra and chorus upon some occasions reached 400; a statement which looks rather like exaggeration.

A very unusual, half private concert, also, was arranged in the year 1782. The reader of the biography of Mozart will remember, that he connected himself in 1782 with a certain Martin, to give a series of concerts during the morning hours in the hall of the Augarten. In which most of the performers were dilettanti, and for which the music was furnished from the library of the Vice-president van Swieten. These concerts found such response that they were renewed for several years; there were commonly twelve of them. "Even ladies of the highest nobility let themselves be heard. The undertaking was very brilliant, and all went on with such order and decorum, that every one according to his powers gladly contributed to the support of the institution. The entire proceeds of the small subscription went to defray expenses. Afterwards Mr. Rudolph undertook the direction." The man then still young and a good violin player, was director when Beethoven came to Vienna; and one could still see the unusual spectacle of princes and nobles putting themselves under his lead in the performance of orchestral music before an audience of their own rank at the unusual hours of from 6 to 8 o'clock in the morning.

From the above it is clear that Vienna provided no particular advantages to the young musician either in opera and church music or in public concerts. Other cities unequalled Vienna in the first two regards, and London was at that time ahead in all, in the number, the variety and the magnificence of its concerts, as it is to-day. It was rather field in which Vienna surpassed all competitors. As Gluck twenty years before, following the impulse given by the French Rameau and the English Dr. Arne, had begun the great revolution in Opera music, which Mozart completed; so Haydn, building on the foundation of the Bachs and supported by Mozart, effected a new development of pure instrumental music, which was destined to reach its highest point through the genius and the boldness of the young man who was now his scholar. And as before with Gluck so now again Vienna was the arena of the contest and the victory; for a contest preceded, ere the victory was complete.

Bach's Works.

From "Johann Sebastian Bach: His Life and Writings. Adapted from the German of [illegible], with additions from other sources. [illegible] the London Choir.]

Before proceeding to the specification of Bach's extant works, we shall take a survey of the various species of composition in use in his time, of which some are obsolete or have received new appellations in more recent times.

We commence with the "Prelude," also called Praeambulum, which in the time of Bach meant the introduction to a chorale or fugue, played on the organ or clavier, its chief aim being to enable the singers to pitch their note, and the instrumentalists to tune without creating disturbance. According to old Erhard Niedt, in his "Musical Guide," "the organist may regulate its length at his pleasure." "But," adds Mattheson, in his edition of the work, "I would rather have it as short as possible, especially when the master is not at home."

By the name of "Ouverture," was understood a somewhat longer composition for instruments. It was used as an introduction to a secular work, of a certain prescribed form, invented by the French. It usually commenced with a short, slow movement, which led into a quicker one. The latter was often treated like a fugue.

The "Sinfonia" commenced with an introductory movement of short and powerful phrases of some twelve or twenty-four bars. This was followed by a movement of quicker tempo of some fifty or sixty bars, which, however, contained "Repeats." The conclusion was a still quicker movement.

The "Sonata," according to Niedt, was a sort of prelude played before the voices commenced. It consisted of an adagio, followed by an allegro, to which, at the beginning of the last century, some other movements were added ad libitum. It continued an independent piece until it was displaced by "Suites," and "Concerts," but remained on the organ and clavier.

The "Toccata," always for the organ or clavier, was of a freer form than the "Prelude," and intended to display brilliant execution. It was played chiefly provided with shakes and passage figures occupying the attention of both hands. It belongs to the now so-called "Concert Pieces."

We have next the "Fantasia," which was, in the first place, undoubtedly an extempore performance. The player was neither bound to the tempo nor the key, but seemed only, according to his genius or whim, giving his ideas free course.

The "Capriccio," or, as it was called in the time of Bach, the "Caprice," was nearly akin to the fantasia. It chiefly required a finite more ornamental of figured or fugued passages.

The Fugue, at first was only a sort of prelude. It served chiefly as an introduction to a choral song, where it had to work out the first "strophes" of the cantus firmus. In Bach's time the fugue was a test of the ability of an artist to use his skill in counterpoint. To do this required technical knowledge. But little else. Bach however besides rendering his fugues with perfect technical skill treated aesthetically. A characteristic theme, a melody at uninterrupted and growing out of the theme, freedom, ease, and fluency, combined with inexhaustible richness of modulation, unity and yet variety of style, and such life spread over the whole, that in the performance and hearer the tones appear to be those of spirits;—these are only a few of the qualities of Bach's art in this style.

The term "Invention," given to some of Bach's works, was almost one of a title which runs thus—"A Sincere Guide, by which, to the amateurs of the Piano, is shown a clear way to perform in a pure style in two parts, and to the same time to receive good Inventions, &c. The contents of this work consist of short cantabile phrases, that by imitation or transposition may be worked out into whole pieces, so that the young composer is shown how to treat a musical idea, and is guided by the study of these phrases to musical invention.

We now arrive at the "Suite," an invention of the French for the clavier and other instruments. It consists of a succession of pieces in the style of the then usual dance melodies, namely the Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and in some cases a Gigue. This is the most useful grouping of the "Suite." Sometimes it is preceded by a prelude, &c., and often it contained minuets, passepieds, bourrées, &c.

The "Allemande" is a kind of air in which the tone is heavier or loud and slowly. It is said to have originated in Germany, but this is not certain.

The "Courante" is an antiquated French dance written in three-two, or three-four time, and consisting of many running passages.

The "Sarabande," as the name indicates, originated in Spain. Its melody is in three-four time, of a slow and serious expression. It consists of sixteen bars, divided into two parts.

The "Gigue," at one time a favorite dance with the English and Spanish, is of a cheerful character, in six-eight, twelve-eight, and sometimes in three-eight time. It was used in the suite in the place of our modern scherzo.

The "Minuet," with us, was originally a slow dance of two parts, each of eight or sixteen bars. It was so much liked during the last century that it made its way into the modern sonata and symphony. Haydn has left us the best specimens of the modern minuet.

The "Passe-pied" is an antiquated French dance. It has been replaced by the more modern minuet, which is based upon the same rhythmical principles.

Of the peculiar dance movements of this period we must still mention two others—the "Ciacona or Chaconne" and the "Passacaille," or "Passagaglia."

The first is a moderately quick movement in three-four time, of a pleasing and highly rhythmical character. It was a great favorite in Spain and Italy. Handel wrote a Ciaccona in G major with sixty-two variations.

The Passacaille is like the former, but slower, and with a longing, tender melody. It is usually in the minor mode.

Towards the period of Bach's death the "Suites," in addition to the above-mentioned characteristic melodies, contained an allegro, an andante, and sometimes a presto movement. With this arrangement the "Suites" were called "Parthien." Afterwards these characteristic pieces were lost sight of and from the "Parthien" arose compositions of a series of melodious movements loosely combined, called "Divertissements." Next arose a new and important composition of a grander style and more strict character—the modern "Clavier Sonata."*

Apart from the "Parthien" are the "Partitas," which arose about the middle of the seventeenth century. At first a short cantabile melody was chosen and the "variations" were called "doubles." The harmony of the air remained unchanged and the variation was limited to the melody, which was worked out and ornamented with all sorts of graces and bravura passages.

From the "Choral Partita" came the figured choral compositions of which we have so many specimens from the mighty hand of Bach.

After his return to his father's house, Franz was in a great dilemma. He had not as yet acquired any of those faculties which make a man prosperous in the world. He could not and he would not any longer seem a music position, which would have made him a respectable freedom within a few in the social circle of his country. He was determined rather than consent to renounce music; he was already looked upon himself as such and valued as rarely only such. Moreover he has been heard amongst the singing schools and worked on the doctrine of clearness and elegance which in public requires. He also writing anxious was not fitted to such satisfaction in the successes of salons and concerts, in affairs of time as has seen. Therefore in the cold ridiculous and the education to which such engagement are opposed in this way they could not be independent of living without, and his feelings against renounced, and fell occasions in any very moment after here is he must greatly desire of for making thereby money. THE LIEDERKRANZ.

The Deutsche Liederkranz, one of the most prosperous German clubs of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ball at the Academy of Music is one of the important events of the season to be [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] place on [illegible] street [illegible] [illegible] dwellings [illegible] [illegible] been turned into one building for its [illegible]. At the front of the room is a banner about ten by fifteen feet, emblematic of the society.

The name Liederkranz signifies "a wreath of song," and the device painted on the banner is a large crown of laurels with [illegible] [illegible] and a Grecian lyre in the centre. A band [illegible] round the wreath [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] inscribed the names of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Weber, Handel and other [illegible] composers. On the [illegible] side is a banner on which is painted the figure of a woman, [illegible] [illegible], represented as the [illegible] of [illegible] and on the left another representing the Spirit of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Each banner is ornamented with appropriate [illegible] [illegible].

The Liederkranz has about [illegible] [illegible] members, many [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Only a small part [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] are active members. The chorus consists of sixty members, who rehearse in the large hall mentioned, and a chorus of forty ladies rehearse in a room on the second floor, and often take part in the musical exercises of the Liederkranz. The rehearsals in the large rooms are varied by dancing. The society has also an orchestra of amateur players numbering forty pieces. Tuesday and Thursday evenings are the regular occasions for rehearsal. The club is the soul of hospitality. No [illegible] is [illegible] to take an [illegible] from a guest. With its masquerade, its midsummer night festivals, which are held once or twice a year [illegible] one of the large gardens [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] concerts and private hops, it manages to furnish its members a considerable amount of entertainment during the year. Its officers are President William Steinway; Secretary F. Koch; Treasurer George Naumann.

THE ARION.

The Arion is younger than the Liederkranz, and is therefore [illegible] [illegible] more of the energy of youth. There is between the [illegible] a generous rivalry, which has the effect of rendering each [illegible] [illegible] a generous and attractive. The Arion was organized in 1854 by [illegible] gentlemen who [illegible] from the Liederkranz, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to establish a singing society on the [illegible] [illegible].

They have prospered greatly, and have now a fine chorus of forty-five voices and [illegible] [illegible] hundred [illegible] members. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Germania Assembly Rooms, using the large [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] special [illegible].

The Arion gave its first [illegible] masquerade in [illegible] at the [illegible] Assembly Rooms. The ball was given yearly at the same [illegible] until [illegible] Hall was built, when in 1861 and 1862 it was given in that place. In 1863 it was given at Niblo's [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] balls [illegible] [illegible] given at the Academy of Music, and from the first [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] success. From the first of January [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in carnival [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Germania Assembly Rooms, which are exceedingly unique and entertaining. There are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] concerts in the fall. The regular rehearsal evenings are on Tuesday and Friday. At the Sängerfest in Buffalo in 1860 [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Arion received the first prize. The [illegible] are the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The following are the officers: President [illegible]; first vice-president [illegible]; second vice-president [illegible]; treasurer [illegible]; [illegible] secretary [illegible]; corresponding secretary [illegible]; recording secretary [illegible]; musical director Carl Anschütz.

THE HARMONIA.

The finest house owned by any German club is not [illegible] by any [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible], is that recently built and furnished by the Harmonia Club on [illegible] [illegible] street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, fronting the Reservoir Park.

The Harmonia Club was organized in 1852, and had formerly a house in [illegible] street, opposite the Mercantile Library building. The new building was begun in September, 1863, and was finished at the end of January, 1865. Its cost, not including the [illegible], has been a quarter of a million of dollars. The architect was Mr. Henry Fernbach. The [illegible] is one hundred and four feet front and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] deep; the building eighty feet front and [illegible] [illegible] deep. Twenty feet are reserved in the [illegible] for a summer garden and [illegible], to be planted with vines and flowers, with [illegible], tables [illegible] the [illegible] and a fountain [illegible] [illegible].

On the basement floor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] kitchen and a [illegible] and the board of management. The library contains about [illegible] [illegible] volumes in German, French and English, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] floor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], parlor, [illegible] rooms, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] persons. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] room, which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] width of the house, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

On the second floor is the large ball and concert room, about [illegible] feet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] gallery. It is the most splendidly finished room of the kind in America and the members [illegible] [illegible] is not surpassed in Europe. No expense has been spared in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] mirrors, in chandeliers, and in every sort of decoration to add to its [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] cost $[illegible]. There are [illegible] chandeliers, with [illegible] hundred lights, one in the centre and one over each corner of the room. Connecting with the ball room are ladies' parlors and dressing rooms. On the same floor also is the [illegible] dining room or [illegible]. [illegible] pair of stairs [illegible] [illegible] the floors which communicate with the gallery of the [illegible] hall is a large dining room [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the whole front of the house, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] hundred persons. [illegible] on the floor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] size. These are [illegible] [illegible] on the occasion of grand balls or concerts. Many of the floors of the rooms are of beautiful [illegible] work and have no carpets. All the rooms are elegantly furnished.

The club [illegible] [illegible] three hundred and twenty [illegible] members and is limited to four hundred. The German language is principally spoken. The [illegible] of the [illegible] are under the control of a board of management. During the [illegible] [illegible] there is nearly [illegible] a reception, ball or concert about once every fortnight. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] day [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] to the members. During the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] generally [illegible] [illegible] grand balls, attended by perhaps five hundred or more persons. The [illegible] are given [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. At the [illegible] [illegible] was given, Thomas, Wollenhaupt and other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] concert. There is a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] among the members. The officers are: President M. [illegible]; Vice-President, L. [illegible]; Treasurer, Jacob [illegible]; Secretaries, L. Cohn and M. [illegible].

THE ALLEMANIA.

The Allemania is a very thriving German club which has been in existence about ten years. Its [illegible] [illegible] place was in Lafayette Place, whence it removed to the fine building now occupied [illegible] [illegible] the south side of [illegible] street near Union Square. It has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] feet front and is [illegible] [illegible] one hundred and [illegible] [illegible] feet deep.

The building [illegible] by the club and has been bought and fitted up at an expense of over [illegible] [illegible] thousand dollars, subscribed by the members. The [illegible] [illegible] room of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] handsome and convenient hall, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] performances [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Saturday evening, April 15th, two very [illegible] pieces [illegible] played by members. [illegible] operas are also performed occasionally.

The Allemania is the only large club which has a stage for theatrical entertainments. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the hall was given [illegible]. Regular receptions are given every Saturday [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] all the German clubs, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] enjoyments of the club [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] friends. There [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] room, a bowling alley and a [illegible] room. The [illegible] is open every day. The officers are: President, L. [illegible]; vice-president Wm. [illegible]; secretary [illegible] [illegible]; treasurer L. [illegible].

THE GERMANIA.

The Germania Club is composed of a large number of our German citizens, and is conducted in a manner somewhat similar to the American social clubs. It has a large house at No. 184 [illegible], at which it has a reading room, [illegible] room, &c. The officers are: President, [illegible]; secretary, W. Vogel; treasurer, [illegible].

THE PROGRESS.

The Progress is a pleasant club of [illegible] members, having the house [illegible] Twenty-third street, between the Sixth and [illegible] avenues. It is social, and gives [illegible] concerts and [illegible]. The club has its own [illegible]. It is composed of young men [illegible]. President, Otto [illegible]; Vice President, [illegible]; Secretaries, Philip Frank and [illegible]; Treasurer [illegible].

THE AECHENBROEDEL.

The Aschenbroedel is a club composed [illegible] of musicians, many of them belonging to the orchestras of the theatres. Whenever [illegible] are wanted for any large orchestra they can [illegible] at the club. The club has [illegible] a pleasant house, No. [illegible] Fourth street and Second avenue. There [illegible] library, &c., and the [illegible] about three hundred. Most of [illegible] German artists of the city belong to [illegible]. The president is Francis X. Diller, [illegible] Gebhardt.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

From the London Review.

MM. Barbier and Carré, the composer's [illegible], have followed Shakespeare's version of Romeo and Juliet [illegible] very closely. [illegible]

[illegible]

M. Gounod prefaces his opera with a [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] which is [illegible] after all, in the one great condition of Romeo and Juliet. In the [illegible] M. Gounod has surpassed his "Faust" [illegible]. That the work as a whole will greatly enhance its composer's reputation, we do not for a moment doubt, and we have [illegible] little hesitation in predicting for it an honourable abiding place in the lyrical theatre of this country.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Correspondent of the London Orchestra (April 13) begins his letter thus:—

"I am thoroughly sick of the Exhibition and the Pianos-Chickering—especially the latter. You have nothing now but [illegible] Chickering pianos; you can [illegible] Chickering pianos, and I believe [illegible] Chickering pianos [illegible]. You know how [illegible] an American is, when he gets [illegible]." Well, the Chickering piano is an American institution, and Paris is full of Americans, as you can [illegible]

London.

The Choral [illegible] gives us the following brief summary of [illegible] fortnight [illegible]:

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Fra Diavolo, L'Africaine, Un Ballo in Maschera and Masaniello have been the operas of the past fortnight. In the first two M'lle Lucca sustained the chief role. In the Ballo M'lle. [illegible] made her début as Oscar. Her figure is very small—almost childish [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of singing [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] Signor Graziani was the [illegible].

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE was opened for the season [illegible] with Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, one of the most powerful [illegible] in last year's programme. The cast is nearly the same as before, with Mlle. Tietjens as the Countess, Mlle. Sinico as Susanna, and Mr. Santley as the Count. [illegible] Tietjens sang "Dove sono" we need hardly say. Her voice is as fine as ever and her remarkable powers of vocalisation still magnificent. The same [illegible] be said of Mlle. Sinico and M. Santley who were loudly encored in the duet "Crudel perchè," and in other places. Mr. Charles Lyall whose agreeable though light tenor voice we have frequently mentioned in our concert notices, made his first appearance as Basilio, one of the smallest parts of the opera. He sang and acted well though he hardly had [illegible] opportunity of showing his powers. The Bartolo [illegible] Signor Ardiel, were as excellent as ever.

CRYSTAL PALACE. On the 20th ult. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was performed on the day of the [illegible] concerts [illegible] the Handel [illegible] being [illegible] played under M. BERLIN. The Symphony Soirée of the Royal Orchestra, on the [illegible] celebrated the 25th year of these concerts. Besides [illegible] classical works there was a Prologue spoken by [illegible] Wagner and 25 new Variations composed [illegible] by [illegible] Taubert. Of the 321 Symphony Soirées thus far given, Capellmeister Taubert alone has conducted 307.— In the preceding Soirée were given Cherubini's Abencerages Overture, Beethoven's Egmont music, and his Septet with all the strings of the orchestra [illegible] and wind instruments. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—The second Cecilia concert, under Radecke, gave Beethoven's "No. 96 of [illegible]," [illegible] piano Concerto, played by [illegible]; the Loreley finale and the [illegible] Psalm of Mendelssohn.

BOSTON, MAY 25, 1867.

Music in Boston.—Review of the Season, 1866–7.

That the past season has been richer than we have before experienced, both in the number of concerts, in quality of programmes, and the general excellence of performance, our columns have continually shown. Equally remarkable is the short, decided manner in which this rich season has come to a close, earlier than usual, for very [illegible] there was a simultaneous [illegible] of appetite after such continuous high living. The end was noble, worthy of the whole—the Ninth Symphony and the Oratorios—we could not be content to leave it there, with the best last. And so the musical season, as we look back upon it, has a certain wholeness: we see it round and ripe; it did like a ripe fruit drop at once. With more than usual satisfaction we may count up the works of master composers, in all forms, which these months have given us. The list of fine works which have been heard in Boston will compare not unfairly this time with that of any European city.

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

From Nov. 30 to April 19, the Harvard Musical Association have given ten "Symphony Concerts," eight in the regular subscription series (only six last year) besides the benefits for the Orchestra and for the Orchestra. The orchestra numbered 52 instruments. The popular Wednesday Afternoon concerts of the Orchestral Union (about 30 instruments) began later than usual, last week of February and were eight in number; they might have gone on a month longer to advantage, had not other engagements of the Music Hall prevented. Every one of these 18 concerts has given us a good Symphony, as well as other good things. Here is the list.

a) SYMPHONIES. (Symphony Concerts): Beethoven Nos. 3 (Eroica) 5, 8 [illegible] 9 (Choral).—Mozart, in E flat and the smaller of the two without Minuet, in D.—Schumann, No. 2 (C major) and 4 (D minor).—Gade, No. 1 (C minor).—Orchestral Union: Beethoven Nos. 1, 2 and 8;—Mozart, in E flat, and in D major;— Mendelssohn, in A minor;—Gade, in C minor (new).—Beethoven's No. 7 was heard again in Mrs. Cary's benefit concert.

b). CONCERTOS. Symphony Concerts: Beethoven, for Piano, No. 3 in E flat (B. J. Lang), No. [illegible] (H. Leonhard), for Violin in D 1st movement (Carl Rosa).—Mendelssohn, Violin (twice, C. Rosa and Camilla Urso).—Schumann in A minor (O. Dresel);—Hummel, in F minor op. [illegible] (C. Petersilea).—Norbert Burgmüller in F-sharp minor (E. Perabo).—Hummel, in A minor (J. C. D. Parker).—Orchestral Union: Mendelssohn, for Piano in D minor (Petersilea);— Weber, in E flat (F. Dane) and Concertstück (Alice Dutton).—The Mendelssohn Violin Concerto was also played once more by Mme. Urso, in a miscellaneous concert given for her benefit. The second Concerto of Beethoven, and those by Schumann (in the complete form), Hummel and Burgmüller were new in Boston.

Besides these the Parepa concerts (very miscellaneous in their programmes) brought out Spohr's Violin Concerto in G (Rosa), single movements of Schumann's piano Concerto (played by Mills) do. of Chopin's in E minor; Military Concerto by Leonard (Rosa) part of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto (Rosa) &c. And a concert of the "N. E. Conservatory" had for a novelty Mr. Goldbeck's Concerto in D (piano) played by himself.

c) OVERTURES. The Symphony Concerts have given Gluck Iphigenia; Mozart Zauberflöte, Idomeneo; Weber Euryanthe; Beethoven Leonore (No. 1) Egmont; Mendelssohn Hebrides, Melusina, Ruy Blas, Meeresstille (twice); Schubert Fierabras; Schumann Genoveva; Cherubini Anacreon, Les Abencerages; Wasserträger.—The Orchestral Union: Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream," Hebrides, Meeres- ville; Cherubini; Abencerages, Anacreon; Boieldieu; Egmont; Weber; Preciosa, Oberon.—The Rakoczy, Glinka, and other miscellaneous concerts swell the list by the Overtures to Heimkehr aus der Fremde (Mendelssohn), Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni, Semiramide, "Merry Wives" (Nicolai), and more not readily recalled. Of course there are always a plenty of the lighter sort.

d). Miscellaneous. Piano with Orchestra: Schubert's Fantasie, op. 15, as arranged by Liszt (B. J. Lang); Mendelssohn, Rondo, op. 29 (Perabo); Andante spianato and Polonaise, op. 22 Chopin (H. Leonhard); Weber's Polonaise in E, transcribed by Liszt, (Lang). These were in the Symphony Concerts. In the Orchestral Union Perabo played Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor and Miss Joy (pupil of Lang) the Andante Spianato, &c., of Chopin.—Under this head too, we may name one the Toccata in F by Bach, orchestrated by Esser; Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant piano with orch.

II. Chamber Music.

Concerts of this character, mostly in Chickering's hall, have been very numerous. We have missed to have the hoped for series by Mr. Dresel and by Messrs. Leonhard and Kreissmann. But we have had four concerts by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club—a smaller allowance than we have been used to, to be sure, of string Quartets, &c.—but never more classic eight piano concerts by Ernst Perabo, some of which were called "Schubert Matinées four "Schumann Soirées" by Carlyle Petersilea; three "Beethoven Matinées" by Hermann Daum; a Chamber concert, by Mme. Parepa-Rosa and her husband, with Otto Dresel and other occasional ones,—that in honor of Robert Franz, for instance. Among them all as well as in the larger concerts, we have heard for the first time many solo or concerted pieces by great composers, particularly by Schubert and Schumann. Thus of

J. S. Bach: The Chaconne, for Violin. Violin Fugue in G minor; Air and Gavotte, violin and piano; Preludium in A minor, piano; Gavotte, [illegible] Concerto in C, for three pianos (accompaniment on a fourth piano). Prelude and Fugue in E major and in A minor, from Well-tempered Clavichord; Partita, No. 6, in E minor (7 movements).

Handel: Suite in G minor piano.

Haydn: String Quartet in G flat, op. 64; Trio in G, piano, violin and 'cello (3 times).

Mozart: Quintet (strings) in G minor.

Beethoven: Quartet in E flat op. 4; Quartet, No. 11 in E flat, op. 74 (twice); Sonata in C minor violin and piano; Sonata, op. 47 ("Kreutzer"); 2 Sonatas for 'cello and piano; Romance in F, horn and piano; 32 Variations, with Fugue, piano, op. 35, E flat (twice); Grand Sonata, op. 106, in B flat; Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 102, No. 1; Sonata, piano and 'cello in F, op. 5, No. 1; Sonata for piano, op. 31, No. 2, D minor; Trio, op. 70, No. 2, E flat; Sonata piano and cello, op. 5, No. 2, G minor; Sonata piano, op. 10, No. 3, D; Trio in B flat, op. 97 (twice); Sonata, piano and violin, op. 24, in F; Sonata, piano, op. 26, A flat; Quartet in E flat, op. 127; Sonata, piano and violin, op. 30, No. 1.

Hummel: Grand Septuor D minor, piano, viola, horn &c. (twice).

Mendelssohn: Piano Trio, D minor, op. 49; String Quartet in D, op. 44; Piano Trio, C minor op. 66; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, piano, from "Notre Temps"; Prelude and Fugue, in D major; Melusina Overture, arr. for 4 hands.

Moscheles: "Les Contrastes," for two pianos, with 8 hands.

Schubert: Piano Trio in E flat, op. 100 (twice); Do. in B flat, op. 99 (twice); Rondo for piano and violin, in B minor; Fantasie, op. 15, piano; Sonata, op. 122, E flat; Sonata, B major, op. 147; Sonata, op. 120, A major; Sonata in G minor (dedicated to Schumann); Rondo in E minor, op. 84, No. 2 (four hands); Fantasia in F minor, op. 103 (4 hands); Fantasia in Sonata form, in G, op. 78; Variations (4 hands) on an original theme, in A flat, op. 35; Sonata, F minor, op. 143 ("Tout ensemble"); twice; Sonata in B flat (posthumous); String Quartet (posthumous), D minor.

Schumann: Toccata for piano in C, op. 7; String Quartet, in A, op. 41, No. 3; Fantasie, piano, op. 17 (in three movements); Sonata, F sharp minor op. 11; Sonata in G minor, op. 22; Concerto in A minor op. 54 (with piano accompaniment); Variations for two pianos; Fantasie-Stücke, op. 12 (3 pieces); Quartet in E flat, op. 47 (piano and strings); three Romances for oboe and piano; Adagio and Allegro, op. 70, for horn and piano; Canon, in B minor; Etudes Symphoniques, in form of Variations, op. 13; Abendlied, arr. for violin and piano by Joachim.

Chopin: Rondo; Fantasie-Impromptu, C sharp minor op. 66; Concerto in E minor, with piano accomp.; Concerto in F minor with piano accomp.; Prelude No. 15, op. 28; Etude, No. 3, op. 10; Scherzo in B minor (twice); Polonaise C sharp minor; Andante spianato and Polonaise; Berceuse, Waltz, &c. &c.

Rubinstein: Piano Trio in A minor, op. 34.

Wieniawski: "Legend" for violin.

Gouvy: Sonata for piano and violin, in G flat.

Goldmark: Suite, Quartet in B, op. 25.

Reinecke (of Leipzig): Sonata, piano, op. 27.

Brahms: Sonata, op. 1.

Norbert Burgmüller: Duet for piano and clarinet, in E flat, op. 15.

This was the instrumental music; though we are not able to make the list entirely complete. We have yet to enumerate the Oratorios, &c.

Organ Concerts in the Boston Music Hall are still kept up every Wednesday and Saturday noon. The crowd of other musical engagements has prevented our giving much attention to them for some months past, and the slight edition of the Health's repertoire have rendered it unnecessary. The performers for the most part, have been Mr. Prevost, Mr. Lang, Mr. Thayer, Mr. Willcox or Mr. Whiting. The programmes show frequently a single piece of Bach; frequently one of the six Mendelssohn Sonatas; now and then an organ Concerto of Handel (Mr. Thayer); but oftener extracts from the Oratorios and those of other masters, French Offertoires, variations, transcriptions of Overtures, Symphony movements, choruses, songs, &c. &c. Naturally in so many concerts (it has gone on now for three years and a half) and with so many organists, the greater part of what is fairly available for such use has been used over and over. To the real lovers of organ music it is a comfort to feel that he can drop in once in a while and hear a good Fugue or Toccata of Bach, or something else that is fairly so.

Last Wednesday the rent at was to a rather varied by the return to the Organ, after long absence (mostly in Germany), of Mr. John K. Paine, who played with all his fine mastery the great Passacaglia with its wonderful variations, in C minor, and a lovely Choral Variation (Choral Vorspiel) of his master Bach, a Theme with Variations by Thiele, in a difficult and very effective Fantasia and Fugue and a most elaborate Larghetto of his own composition, besides more being so great an abundance of the latter and more who had come out on one of the movement of day to hear him.

Mr. A. P. Peck has his Annual Benefit Concert this evening at the Music Hall. All our concert goers know who Mr. Peck is, and have reason to feel obliged to him. The duties of Superintendent of that Hall are not light, demanding a clear head and unruffled temper, and Mr. P. has done his part in the manifold catering for our musical enjoyments to the satisfaction of all parties. He should be remembered; the more especially now, because he was a loser to a considerable amount, by robbery, during the recent fire in the ticket office. He announces a very attractive list of artists: Miss Kellogg, Miss Adelaide Phillipps, Miss Nettie Sterling, the new New York Contralto, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. J. S. Cary, Mrs. C. T. Joy, the young pianist, pupil of Mr. Lang; Mr. Geo. Hartell, the fine tenor lately returned from Europe; Messrs. M. W. Whitney (bass) and James Whitney (tenor); Mr. E. M. Heubner, Mr. Willcox for the Organ, and Mr. Howard M. Dow, accompanist.

Salem, Mass. Last Monday evening the old town rejoiced in its first "Symphony Concert" given by Mr. M. S. Downs, with the aid of Miss Annie [illegible] Philharmonic Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. D. J. Lang. The object was to raise funds towards the erection of a new music hall, which Salem sorely needs in fact, for this ever wealthy city has some very musical people sending quite a delegation always to our Oratorios and Symphony Concerts in Boston. The occasion is said to have been in every sense most successful. This was the programme:

Symphony No. 5, Op. 67	Beethoven.
"Oh mio Fernando," from Favorita	Donizetti.
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Cradle Song	Lindner.
Concert Waltz, "The Village Swallows"	J. Strauss.
Schubert Serenade	Stolz.
Wedding March	Mendelssohn.

The Chickering Pianos are evidently attracting the chief attention in the musical instrument department at the French Exposition. Witness the subsequent confession of an Englishman—an English-made Music Abroad. Our own correspondent [illegible] though he gives no name to [illegible] the Chickerings for by "the American system" in pianos, we are to understand the complete iron frame first invented and patented by Jonas Chickering forty years ago, and used by other makers since the patent ran out.

The Transcript publishes the following:

The Great Organ in the Plymouth Church (Brooklyn, N. Y.) is the largest instrument ever built in the United States. In consequence its very gratifying to its builders, who have received the following letter from Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, pastor of the church.

Brooklyn, N. Y. May 7, 1867.

Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, Boston, Mass.

Gentlemen:—In reply to your request, it gives me great pleasure to express my satisfaction for the noble organ which you built for Plymouth Church. It has given the utmost satisfaction, and even the anxieties that may have been felt were entirely unnecessary; for it is ranked as belonging among the very first of remarkable organs, and is now matched by but light pieces of the line. I have yet to hear one voice as to its effect on the congregation, or of its being a defect and unfortunate.

For myself, though I was early pleased, from the first, yet every week my pleasure is renewed and my appreciation of the instrument more heightened. I can see no improvable defect or fault, and it ought to afford you great satisfaction to know that you have built an instrument so admirable and grand that hereafter it must be mentioned in every history of the organ and esteemed, for generations, to be quoted as among the triumphs of skill.

Some of its best effects, particularly in the bass, are much curtailed by the position in which it stands. If there were more room for its full range, we know there to be instruments of the place where it is constructed to stand.

I shall always be grateful to you for this labor of love as I am now to me, as well as of gratitude and with connections through happy that secures your instruments. I am, truly, yours,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, APRIL 25.—We are just now deluged with concerts; concerts in the open air, concerts within doors, in all houses and in all sorts of places. Last Sunday M. Alard gave his 5th Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel. The programme included Mendelssohn's Piano Trio in C minor, Beethoven's Quartet in B major, op. 18, No. 6; a Theme from the "Magic Flute" arranged for piano and cello by Beethoven; and, lastly, Mozart's Quintet in G minor, with the lovely Finale. M. Diémer was the pianist.

On Thursday evening Joachim gave his last Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel. The programme was very fine, and I give it to you here:—

Quartet, E flat, op. 127, strings	Beethoven.
Trio, B flat, op. 97, Piano	"
Diémer, Joachim, Jacquard
Lieder { "Wonne der Wehmuth" [illegible] }	"
Mme. Joachim
Romance, Violin solo, G maj	"
Quartet, C min. op. 18, strings	"

All Beethoven, as you see, with a rare breath certainly was. The Trio—in particular—was very admirably done and the lovely Adagio is a masterpiece of a sincere treatment. Mme. Joachim has a superb contralto voice, full and rich in quality and sang the Mignon with a passion and abandon which are—happily—rare.

On Friday afternoon the reign of out-door musical entertainments was fairly inaugurated by a concert in the Champs Elysées, at which were given the following selections:

1st movement, 5th Symphony	Beethoven.
2nd movement, 5th Symphony	"
2nd movement 8th Symphony	Beethoven.
3d movement 2nd Symphony	"

Certainly the choice was very fine, which was the admission fee.

In the evening Pasdeloup gave an orchestral concert at the Cirque Napoléon, and here are the attractions:

Prelude of Lohengrin, with Chorus [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Adagio Quintet, op. 108	Mozart.
(Clarinet and string orchestra)
Violin Concerto, E minor	Mendelssohn.
M. Joachim.
1st Part of The Creation	Haydn.
Suite for Violin	Bach.
B minor.—Sarabande—Presto.
Schiller March (Overture)	Rossini.

The immense building was crammed and packed with people an hour before the commencement of the Concert, and hundreds were unable to gain admittance. The sensations of the evening were the solos of Joachim. Never have I heard such a marvellous thing as his rendering of the Mendelssohn Concerto. Though a silence of more than 4000 persons was breathlessly still, each every note was perfectly distinct even in the more remote portions of the auditorium.

When he had finished, I was fairly appalled by the earthquake of applause which greeted him. The violinist bowed three or four times. These enthusiastic crowds cheered, waved their hats, their handkerchiefs and acted like a parcel of madmen. The Bach Suite was wonderfully quaint and lovely and it was an interesting study to see how lovingly the artist played, as if in tender reverence for the dead master.

Music in the Moravian Villages.

NAZARETH, PA. MAY 5.—You will probably be pleased to learn that a musical and solemn currents and the existence of ones in this ancient village of Nazareth a Moravian settlement that began in 1740, and that the love for the fine art of tone is cultivated by both young and old.

The musical history of our place dates back as far as 1785 when the Principal of Nazareth Hall instituted a "Collegium Musicum," which had its weekly reunions, and soon gathered around it all those who had a fondness for hymns of joy and gladness, the bassoon, flute, clarinet and all stringed instruments. Since those early and simple days many changes have taken place in these homes of the Moravian people. The appreciation of the beautiful in the forms of a purely ecclesiastic religious culture has, in some degree, wanted into more secular shapes, and the most fascinating sound, the most sacred duties, yet persist in it as mingling with the drone of a goodly and commonplace worship.

But amidst all this decline music yet lives. Although it has passed through numerous periods of neglect and indifference—when the works of the great masters were laid on the shelf with the violin, violoncello, etc. and were discarded and forgotten,—ever and anon some new genius springs up, and inspires all around him with the love of tone.

At this time we are fortunate in having an excellent Sextet of brass wind instruments under Mr. [illegible] who is the sum and self enjoyment of a practical musician, adds the most admirable skill and precision. In addition to the wind instruments of this Sextet and ordinary band the Männerchor of Nazareth Hall, consisting chiefly of the tenors of the aged residents, carries in point of classical selections with perfect training with most of the German clubs of the adopted Vaterland.

Then we have some reputable pianists, violinists, flautists, who delight our little musical public. When a concert of both vocal and instrumental music is given, the young fellow graciously lend a helping hand, and then the tout-ensemble becomes attractive and frequently challenges the attention of a veteran critic who may chance to see his way by wandering into these retired precincts.

Last, but not least, is the youthful Männerchor consisting of the boys of the Hall under the guidance of their teachers, who act their part in the general satisfaction of the audiences attending the Entertainments, as they are called, which are invariably given at the close of a session.

A few evenings ago we had a pleasant soirée of fond on behalf of the Southern Relief Fund, the programme of which was as follows:

Chorus, "Schöner [illegible]"	Möhler.
Orchestra, "[illegible] Ocean"	Adam.
Trio, Le Chalet	A. Wood.
Song, [illegible] "[illegible]"	Schubert.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "Norma"	Bellini.
Violin, Flute and Piano, Quartet
[illegible] "Gute und Zeit"
Chorus, Motett	Rolle.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "[illegible]"	Verdi.
Quartet, "Der [illegible] Feier"	Abt.
Trio, Piano, La Fille de Regiment	Donizetti.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "Il Trovatore"	Verdi.

In a neighboring village, Bethlehem, music constitutes a large portion of recreative thought, and in addition to the respectable body of dilettanti to be found there, schools of musical instruction are numerous, and great facilities offered to those who seek proficiency in the art. Many celebrities repair to Bethlehem to hear and to be heard, and the whole intellectual atmosphere is redolent of harmony.

During the past winter the Philharmonic produced, and afterwards repeated twice, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," which they claim to have introduced to the notice of an American public. How true the claim may be, however, any having no data on the subject.

Here as well as at Nazareth the struggle is with the onward moving spirit of the age, with the "as the world goes," and in consequence, the "Star Spangled Banner" draws a larger audience than Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal with Piano Accompaniment.

If I were a voice. Song. E. Knapp. 30

A beautiful poem, happily suited to words.

Liebhart Polka. "Come, come." E. Mohler. 40

A fine polka, in the first place, and the words which are set to it are elegant.

Douglas, tender and true. Song. Lady John Scott. 30

A ballad of words and music. The song likely to be widely popular. One of the best of its kind.

Withered flowers. Song. Schubert. 25

Shower of tears. " " 35

Both belong to the series of "The Maid of the Mill," and are fine specimens of delicate expression.

Sicily. Bright are thy plains. Song. Mendelssohn. 30

The Husband's song. " " 30

The Honeysuckle. " " 30

The first gives vent to the young composer's enthusiasm on the visit to Italy. The second and third are good "home songs." The happily [illegible] mental [illegible] character.

Breathe forth through the night. Song. "Irene." 30

O handmaids of Irene. Song and Chorus. 30

The first one of these ladies, and the second very lively. May be sung as a "Madrigal chorus" in which form it is used in the "[illegible] of Irene" or "Irene."

Passing my door. Song. H. Abade. 30

Come and meet me darling. Song. F. Berger. 30

G. L. S.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

He has done the work of a true man,—
 Crown him, honor him, love him.
Weep over him, tears of woman,
 Stoop manliest brows above him!

O dusky mothers and daughters,
 Vigils of mourning keep for him!
Up in the mountains, and down by the waters,
 Lift up your voices and weep for him!

Take up the burden, O [illegible],
 Mourn for thy free provider!
As thy feet by the war-storm beaten,
 Drop thy tears of [illegible] O [illegible]!

For the warmest of hearts is frozen,
 The freest of hands is still;
And the gap in our picked and chosen
 The long years may not fill.

No duty could overtask him,
 No need his will outrun;
Or ever our lips could ask him,
 His hands the work had done.

He forgot his own soul for others,
 Himself to his neighbor lending;
He found the Lord in his suffering brothers,
 And not in the clouds descending.

So the bed was sweet to die on,
 Whence he saw the doors wide swung
Against whose bolted iron
 The strength of his life was flung.

And he saw ere his eye was darkened
 The sheaves of the harvest-bringing,
And knew while his ear yet hearkened
 The voice of the reapers singing.

Ah, well!—The world is discreet;
 There are plenty to pause and wait;
But here was a man who set his feet
 Sometimes in advance of fate,—

Plucked off the old bark when the inner
 Was slow to renew it,
And put to the Lord's work the sinner
 When saints failed to do it.

Never rode to the wrong's redressing
 A worthier paladin.
Shall he not hear the blessing,
 "Good and faithful, enter in!"

Music in Vienna in the Year 1796.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

The example given by the Imperial family of Austria through so many years had produced its natural effect, and musical knowledge and taste were generally diffused amongst the princes and nobles of the empire. Some of the wealthier princes, like Esterhazy, maintained complete musical establishments even to an Italian Opera; others were content if they could have in their family chapel a musical Mass with orchestral accompaniment; where that was impossible, there was at least a small orchestra organized, frequently composed of household officers and servants, who were selected with regard to their musical abilities and so on down to a band of wind instruments, a string Quartet, and even to a single organist, piano-player or violinist. What was said in an earlier chapter about music as a necessity for the courts of the ecclesiastical princes, applies in a great measure likewise to the secular nobility. At their palaces and country seats in summer some entertainment had to be provided for many otherwise tedious hours; and in their city residences during the winter they and their guests could not act, dance and play cards all the time: hence music got to be a universal and a favorite resource; at any rate it was the fashion. Besides persons of high birth, those also who occupied a high social position by their talent, culture or wealth, followed that example, and opened their saloons to musicians and music-lovers, mostly moved thereto by a real, sometimes by an affected taste for the art, at all events supporting it and furthering its progress. Hence arose an enormously great demand for chamber music, vocal and instrumental, but especially the latter. The demand brought with it the supply by encouraging genius and talent to work in this direction; and so the Austrian school of instrumental music soon attained the first rank in the world.

During some months of the year Vienna was filled with the high nobility and gentry of Austria, but those other parts of the German empire. Those who spent the most of their time at their own little courts came for a short time to the capital; others reversed the habit, making the capital their usual residence and leaving their estates only in the summer. Many a noted composer who stood in the service of the former class, was in this way brought occasionally for a short time to the metropolis; as Mozart by the archbishop of Salzburg, Haydn by prince Esterhazy; by the latter class distinguished composers or virtuosos, who lived in the city, were frequently taken into the country for the summer, and then they were treated as equals and lived like high gentlemen. Thus Salieri was the guest of prince Schwarzenberg, Schenk of Auersperg; Mozart travelled with Lichnowsky to Berlin, Dittersdorf with Count Lamberg to Troppau; Gyrowetz visited Count Fünfkirchen, and many others in a similar manner.

A further means of furthering the Art was the ordering and purchasing of compositions, and not merely from composers of established fame, like Haydn, Mozart, C. P. E. Bach, but also from young men yet unknown, who thus received the double benefit of pecuniary support and the opportunity to show their ability. Thus prince Krassalkovits and Count Batthyani bought of the young Gyrowetz his new Symphonies; Esterhazy ordered of him three Masses, a Vesper and a Te Deum; Auersperg employed Schenk's talent for his private theatre; and as for chamber music, the catalogues of private collections of those days contain long lists of manuscript works, which had been ordered or purchased of composers now entirely forgotten.

Instrumental virtuosos, who were not permanently engaged in the service of a prince or a theatre, sought as a rule the reward for their studies and exertions in the private concerts of the nobility. If they were composers at the same time, they brought their compositions to a hearing at such concerts. The reader of the life of Mozart will remember how directly he depended upon this resource, to earn a living for himself and family. One may say that, except in London, a musical public as we now understand the expression, did not exist in the year 1791; in Vienna at least, with its 200,000 inhabitants, a virtuoso seldom ventured to announce a concert, for which he had not already obtained a subscription sufficient to secure him against loss, on the part of those in whose residences he had already produced his talent with success. Thus Mozart, in a letter to his father (1784) announcing his three subscription concerts, mentions 4 engagements to play at prince Gallitzin's between Feb. 26 and March 25, and 1 at Count Johann Esterhazy's for March; and in the following year Leopold Mozart writes to his daughter that her brother's piano between the 10th of February and the 12th of March had been carried at least 11 times to the theatre or to prince Kaunitz's, or to Count Zichy's. Beethoven "remaining without salary in Vienna until he be recalled" found in these opportunities and in his lessons a rich income.

But this circumstance requires some further observations.

About 11 years before Beethoven came to Vienna, Riesbeck, where he speaks of Art in that capital, had written: "Music is the only thing in which the nobility show taste. Many houses have a special band of musicians to themselves, and all public musical occasions show that this department of Art stands in distinguished estimation here. Here four or five great orchestras can be brought together, all of them incomparable. The number of virtuosos proper is small, but as regards orchestral performances, one can scarcely hear anything finer in the world. I have already heard from 30 to 40 instruments play together, and they all gave such a correct, pure and distinct tone, that you would think you heard a single supernaturally powerful instrument. One stroke animates all violins and one breath all wind instruments. . . . There are about 400 musicians here, who are divided into various companies and often work together many years unseparated." (I. 173.)

How many such orchestras were still kept up in 1792–93 it is now perhaps impossible to determine: those of prince Lobkowitz, Schwarzenberg and Auersperg may be named with certainty: Count Heinrich von Haugwitz and no doubt also Count Batthyani brought their musicians with them when they came to the city for the season. The Esterhazy Kapelle, which had been dismissed after the death of Haydn's former master some to] have been not yet renewed. Prince Grassalkovits (or Krassalkovits) had limited him to a "Harmonie-Musik," a band of eight wind instruments (oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns), as was then very customary. Baron Braun had such a band, which had to play during dinner time, as during supper in Don Juan; this accessory to the scene Mozart had added from frequent personal experience. Prince Carl Lichnowsky and others had also their own string Quartets.

The grandees of the Bohemian and Moravian capitals, Kinsky, Clamm, Nostiz, Thun, Dietrichstein, Salm-Reifferscheid, Sporck, Fürstenberg, Trautmansdorf, vied with the Austrian and Hungarian nobility. Many of them had also palaces in Vienna, and as the majority, if not all, of them passed a part of the year there, and took with them some of the more skilful members of their orchestras to render chamber music, and to form the nucleus of a company when Symphonies, Concertos or large vocal works were to be performed, they contributed their part as well to the musical as to the political and social life of the metropolis.

In one respect no change had taken place since the visit of Kapellmeister Reichardt, ten years before (1783). "The nobility (he says) was perhaps the most musical that ever was; the whole gay people took part in the joyful art, and its light easy disposition, its sensual, pleasure-loving character demanded alternations [illegible] everywhere. Owing to the generosity of the court and nobility, the general prosperity of the public, and the incredible cheapness of the means of living, a multitude of artists from abroad could seek Vienna, and support themselves for life there without any fixed engagement, a thing possible at Berlin as the most easy for some teachers and especially for teachers of the piano, all of whom at that time, and certainly with reason, were bound to the school of Bach."

In another respect a change had occurred in the character of the music performed. "Vienna was certainly at that time" he says, "next to Paris the first city in Europe for practical music, and it lacked nothing but a greater variety in the works performed. The works of foreign masters penetrated there with very great difficulty,—as it is everywhere the case, where people imagine they possess the only true Art and the best taste, and in their self-complacency limit themselves to a single kind. Even then it had been so there with Italian, on whom the composers, as in Vienna and Paris, lived by their productions."

The following ten years, after this judgment was pronounced, had produced a great change, and alternation was no longer a desideratum. Those astonishingly fruitful last eight years of Mozart fell under this period, but his compositions were uncommonly various in their character, and had set up models, which compelled other composers to follow in the way which he had opened. Haydn had just come back, enriched with the experiences which he had gathered during his first stay in London. Van Swieten had during his stay in Berlin learned to appreciate the works of Bach and Handel and those schools and exercised since his return to Vienna (about 1778) a decided and powerful influence on the musical taste there.

Thus were all the conditions preexistent for the full [illegible] of Art in Vienna fulfilled at that time; and in one field, that of instrumental music, in a degree unknown in other cities. The extraordinary results in point of quantity produced in those years may be measured from the trade catalogue (1799) of a single music-dealer, Johann Traeg, which in Symphonies, Symphony-Concertos and Overtures (the last is a necessity) contains the enormous number of 512. Whoever is disposed to regard the so-called "Programme Music" of our time as something new, need only read the announcements in the newspapers of those days, or see superscriptions of Symphonies in almost endless variety as La Tempesta, La Bataille, Siege of [illegible], Portrait musicale de la nature, King Lear, "Ovid's Metamorphoses" (12 Symphonies by Dittersdorf) and so on.

Perhaps it was only the growing fancy of the young man from Bonn, which had dreamed more of the possibility of carrying instrumental music still beyond the limits reached by Haydn and Mozart, perhaps these dreams had been but vague and unformed experiences of a something unknown which must yet be reached, and that by paths thus far concealed. Admitting such a possibility, then was the time and Vienna was the place for the arrival of a great man to prosecute this field, as London had been 50 years before to Oratorio for Handel.

Theatres in Germany.

Our neighbor the Saturday Evening Gazette, has great one letter from Leipzig signed "R. L. S." Here, for instance, is one, which we commend to the attention alike of our theatre-goers and [illegible] portment

Leipzig, Aug. 12th, 1857.

If a person would see the drama in its best dress and learn to what a state of perfection the drama can be brought by wise management and a correct appreciation by the people whom it should instruct and amuse, he must come to Germany. With us there is such a tendency to [illegible] one of [illegible] and such a general [illegible] of the stage and its [illegible] the theatre rarely at [illegible] the favor of the higher classes, but [illegible] with [illegible] the theatre is at [illegible] New England a [illegible] place [illegible] and [illegible] spectacles. There are a [illegible] I think I have [illegible] the greatest stars and [illegible] our American [illegible]. In England it is worse, [illegible] there are very many better players [illegible] and two theatres [illegible] the Haymarket and St. James [illegible] managers [illegible] the stage [illegible] Low [illegible] laughter. That there is a great deal of [illegible] connected with the French stage I do not deny, [illegible] of the [illegible] than American [illegible] [illegible] is in a [illegible] that [illegible] a good comedy. France [illegible] her literary men, and [illegible] while the [illegible] of Moliere, Corneille and Racine are extant, good comedy will not be [illegible] its chief [illegible]. Moreover [illegible] as much apology from [illegible] people, not from the stage. The stage is not a [illegible], but a mirror which faithfully reflects the society of the day. If it is supported by houses of set [illegible] and [illegible] which [illegible] Bull [illegible] and Wonders with "The Black Crook" and "Nord Queen." Those who [illegible] is an [illegible] as a sure path to [illegible] and a [illegible] in the way of [illegible] might employ some of their wasted breath in [illegible] the people who [illegible] the position which it now [illegible] occupies.

An artist in one winter Germany has perceived a change. He is surprised at [illegible] an opera company in every [illegible] which boasts [illegible] theatre. [illegible] [illegible] great actors very rare [illegible] the stock companies [illegible] excellent. Throughout the year the drama and opera alternate, both companies occupying the same stage, each playing three or four times a week. Let us commence with the opera. In Berlin and Vienna one can hear one hundred and thirty to forty operas a year by the finest singers in the world and unequalled orchestras; operas never sung and rarely heard of in America are found in the repertory, and the companies are so numerous that an opera is rarely repeated so often as in our little representation of two weeks or a month's duration. The two finest tenors in the world are now engaged in Berlin, Wachtel and Niemann, and, for Germany, receive tremendous salaries. Niemann is bound by contract to sing four months during each year, for which he receives six thousand dollars [illegible] in [illegible] and is obliged to pass the remaining eight months in singing on "guest-spiele," as we would it "starring."

A most admirable [illegible] in Germany of pensioning aged actors and opera singers, provided they keep to their contracts and remain at [illegible] single theatres. For example, Niemann, when no longer fit for singing will receive a pension varying with the length of service, [illegible] to support him and enable him to end his life in comfort. Nearly [illegible] throughout Germany has this provision, and it obviates in a great measure the necessity of paying enormous salaries, as a [illegible] if faithful, will never be left a beggar when the public has used with him. The condition of their members [illegible] of course necessary, but the [illegible] of such an arrangement [illegible] by the [illegible] place at [illegible] the [illegible] about to "guest-spiele." Thus some of the principal singers in London [illegible] the season there are members of German companies, who nevertheless, are very willing to pocket [illegible] three hundred English sovereigns an evening during their vacation.

It would at first seem impossible that enough first class singers could be found to supply the theatres of Germany, so exacting are they, but music is so universally cultivated and the twelve musical conservatories so rich in pupils that the demand is supplied, and in no meagre way. The orchestras, chorus and ballet are almost invariably well trained and efficient to any German opera, and this is proved by the [illegible] when a repertoire of thirty different operas is given in five months, as is the case in Leipzig. Also if you are at some [illegible] where prominent singers cannot be obtained, you will be sure of hearing some of the finest talent in the country once at least during the year by means of this [illegible]. [illegible] are always on the look out for [illegible] all promise from the conservatories, where they can keep to themselves a little while [illegible] they [illegible] and they leave for glory and a large salary.

There is the same variety in the theatrical department as in that of the opera. A great part of German play houses are [illegible] and the plays therefore must be [illegible] changed. Those actors [illegible] convenient [illegible] two or three representations a week [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] the year. For example I [illegible] which until then [illegible] many [illegible] representation whatever it may be. I have [illegible] regularly for [illegible] the [illegible] of Germany, the language quickly as well as for amusement, and [illegible] have found only two [illegible] and three [illegible] representations a second [illegible]. I admit that in [illegible] I should not have a great deal of repertoire, but if the pieces are good, which is the case [illegible] to be desired. A [illegible] believe [illegible] few actors who can compare with Booth or Wallack [illegible] in [illegible] of these actors [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and it appears [illegible] the play from falling [illegible] upon the stage. Here, when "Hamlet" is [illegible] for the first time, the [illegible] [illegible] and the second [illegible] and then [illegible] considerably [illegible] the play which more than [illegible] be [illegible] of Hamlet himself. The Germans [illegible] thinks it [illegible] correct [illegible] but [illegible] chief performers.

The plays themselves are remarkably good, most of them not so [illegible] one [illegible] a translation from the English or French. I have only seen five [illegible] one city in Dresden, and [illegible] a [illegible] upon the stage [illegible] a high part-colored light was [illegible] lamp. The prices are very low and the accommodations [illegible]. The audiences [illegible] with [illegible] more or less, and [illegible] floor, with but few private boxes. A stranger would doubtless think them very stingy of their applause, and indeed that enthusiasm which takes our theatres by storm is hardly ever seen here. No singer who encored repeats the aria as with us; but bows merely, and often when an actor receives an encore after [illegible] or killing himself, the curtain on rising discovers him in the same position in which he was lying [illegible] is relieved from seeing a dead [illegible] jump up and bow.

[illegible] observance of common sense rules, the [illegible] the plays and actors in Germany, is owing [illegible] taken in such matters by the people. The [illegible] the propriety of [illegible] or [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the Stage [illegible] that they are good [illegible] as perfect as possible. [illegible] deserve to find [illegible] and a [illegible] of the Prussian and [illegible] [illegible] Though of course [illegible] exceptions to this, [illegible] Germans go [illegible] or a musical concert, or gallery of paintings, to gratify [illegible]

Music in the Boston Public Schools.

In School Committee, Sept. 11, 1866.

The Committee on Music ask leave to submit the following as their Report:

In [illegible] of the operations of the school year which has just closed, your Committee find cause for [illegible] and satisfaction in the general progress which has taken place in this department of instruction. [illegible] real and solid [illegible] been gained [illegible] among which has been the adoption by a large and hearty vote of the School Board of the order appended to the preceding Report of the Committee, making it the duty of every teacher in the Primary Schools to devote at least ten minutes to each session to regular instruction in Music. The further introduction of the music charts into both Primary and Grammar Schools has been accomplished as rapidly as circumstances would permit. More unity, method and uniformity of teaching has prevailed; and a greater interest and appreciation of this branch of their work is beginning to be perceptible on the part of the teachers generally.

In the Primary Schools, under the faithful and intelligent supervision of Mr. Mason, the plan of a more thorough and comprehensive instruction [illegible] The [illegible] of the Committee [illegible] Annual School Report [illegible] the body of the Report [illegible] in the Boston Primary Schools, as adopted in the sixth, fifth, fourth and third classes. This programme, with some [illegible] and [illegible] is now carried out more fully in the [illegible] through the second and first classes may very properly be [illegible] here.

It is as follows:

PROGRAMME OF ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC IN THE BOSTON PRIMARY SCHOOLS.

Requirements for the First Year (Sixth and Fifth Classes).

Book, Hohmann's Practical Course, Part I.

Of course it has not been possible for the music teacher to give his personal attendance every day of every week, in each of the one hundred and fifty schools of this grade. No [illegible] been possible [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] of them more than once [illegible] during the year. [illegible] During the greater part of his time his efforts have been concentrated mainly upon certain groups of schools—[illegible] to the different districts, [illegible] as nearly as possible equally and impartially among the various portions of the city [illegible] the teachers of the schools visited became [illegible] themselves in the subject and their capacity for its teaching [illegible] leaving them to carry on [illegible] work with [illegible] for a portion [illegible] groups of schools, to set in motion [illegible]. In many [illegible] the regular teachers have caught up [illegible] remarkable aptitude and facility, the [illegible] of the master and his [illegible] teaching and [illegible] abilities—and this [illegible] among [illegible] who are what is called musical themselves,—the aptitude to teach [illegible] intelligently the first rudiments of the art, being found among those who are most conscientious and apt in communicating a knowledge of all the other branches of school instruction committed to their care. We feel greatly [illegible] to point out and [illegible] those schools where the greatest success has been achieved in this specialty, were it not [illegible] they would [illegible] all [illegible] and [illegible] which the [illegible] has been [illegible] the [illegible] of the Board in this regard; but we must defer this part of our duty to a future Report.

Among the most important of the beneficial results of such teaching in those schools where the regular teachers have steadily and faithfully given the [illegible] of [illegible] in the programme of [illegible] action,—a [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] of the Board has been called in [illegible] Reports of this Committee,—is the gradual [illegible] the prevailing [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] has been called. The [illegible] of [illegible] pupils in some of our own schools of this grade [illegible] the present day, [illegible] and [illegible] may be [illegible] by [illegible] taken at random and noted down on the spot [illegible] which shall be for the present nameless. In spelling, take for example [illegible] It is given out by the teacher [illegible] pronounce in [illegible] and proceed to spell [illegible] the following fashion: of the teacher, [illegible] is generally rather dragging, and heavy and the others being in the minor-key, the [illegible] the aid of musical training cannot long resist its influence. Of some [illegible] there is none.

The [illegible] depends upon the peculiar [illegible]

In the revision of arithmetical tables the tone is of a rather livelier cast, usually in the major-key and the rhythm is more marked, thus:

C major.

(b) Subtraction tables.
G major.

(c) Multiplication tables.
C major.

C major.

These drills are not confined to the Primary Schools, but, if [illegible] continued, will occupy [illegible] the lower grades of the Grammar Schools, adding [illegible] to the [illegible] elements that are to be dealt with as best they can be in the earlier stages of Grammar-school instruction. It is but justice to say in this connection, that whereas the co-operation of Mr. Mason—the accomplished teacher of Vocal Culture and Physical Training—has been prescribed, and his admirable exercises in the formation of the voice and the [illegible] in daily practice by the teachers, this vicious habit has proved vastly more amenable to cure.

A word in this place as to the mistaken notion, on the part of many, that it requires a good deal of practical knowledge of music in order to be able to teach it successfully. The Committee have already expressed their dissent from this dogma in the present and in former reports. Of course the possession of [illegible] musical culture on the part of the teacher is a great aid in this branch of instruction, and gives interest and zest to the work. But such accomplishment, to more than a very moderate extent, is, as we have seen, not essential to success, and the neglect to carry out the Rules of the Board as to daily attention to this subject can find no valid excuse upon such ground. The capacity to teach the elements of Vocal Music (as the Committee have often mentioned in their Reports) is now required of all new candidates for the office of teacher in our Public Schools. [illegible] very difficult matter for any one to acquire the knowledge and capacity sufficient to enable them to impart instruction to children in this interesting art intelligently and with pleasure to themselves. "Drawing," says Cousin, "[illegible] though fortunately [illegible] singing is best acquired when it has been practised from infancy upwards, so as to become a habit, [illegible] the gift, permanently from those who have not [illegible] emerging from infancy, [illegible] who have not had the habit formed by these early instructions. It is a matter of experience that children [illegible] almost without exception, and without much [illegible] in the perception of [illegible]. And an adult, the teacher for instance, who may wish to acquire it may acquire it if he [illegible] exceptions [illegible] who have more organic defects. The difficulty will be considerable more or less according to the [illegible] or length of time he has allowed it to [illegible]—just as it would be if he had to acquire the power of language at a [illegible] age. But he may acquire it, and what is more, he can judge for himself whether he may or not, if he can distinguish that one tune differs from another in pitch and length, he has musical capacity sufficient, to say the least, for all its purposes."*

In many of the school districts, the Music Teacher has, at the request of the Chairman of the District Committee, met the teachers in a body at some half-hour in each month for the purpose of normal instruction in his specialty; and some such plan, if generally adopted throughout the city would, in the hands of your Committee, prove of great service. To the same end the teachers have been encouraged to visit such schools as have shown the greatest proficiency in their musical exercises, in order to observe and acquire the method of instruction. All this is well, and it might, perhaps, be better if some still more uniform general plan of normal teaching could be devised, a conscientious attendance upon which should be required of all teachers.

If we have dwelt somewhat at length on the manner and method of musical instruction as now established in the Primary Schools of Boston, it is because we attach so much essential importance and because of our earnest desire that the masters and subordinate teachers may co-operate with us in our efforts to carry the system thoroughly and efficiently into operation in all the classes belonging to this division of our school system. It is here, as we have so often said, that instruction in music, if we can expect it to attain to anything like a satisfactory result as a part of our Common School teaching, ought to begin, and its foundations to be laid broad, deep and sure. Then, and not otherwise, can the musical such useful and practical knowledge of the art as to enable to furnish to every graduate of the Grammar and High Departments of our Schools.

In the Intermediate Schools, of which there are at present only eleven in number, the same plan of instruction is now in operation as far as possible—with, in some instances, most remarkable and gratifying results.

In the Grammar Department, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee in a previous Report, the charge and responsibility of the musical instruction now rests upon Mr. Sharland, who [illegible] all the schools of this grade, himself personally instructing the first and second classes. Under the energetic and efficient direction of this gentleman, instruction in music [illegible] to the usual length of two half-hours each week with the improvement, is being extended as rapidly as possible to all the lower classes of this department. In seventeen of the twenty-one schools comprised in this division, namely the Adams, [illegible], Bowdoin, [illegible], Boylston, Chapman, Dwight, Eliot, Everett, Hancock, Lawrence, Lincoln, Mayhew, Prescott, Quincy and Winthrop schools, some attention to music is thus given [illegible] by the regular teachers [illegible] the music teacher [illegible] the upper classes. This is certainly a gain upon what has hitherto been accomplished; for although the Rules and Regulations explicitly require [illegible] the musical instruction of their pupils on the part of the assistant teachers very little if any regard has been paid to this requirement.*

The Committee are aware that serious difficulties have hitherto existed in the proper carrying out of this rule. These difficulties they believe, will hereafter be in great measure removed since with the close of the present year [illegible] musical instruction in the Primary Schools will have reached [illegible] all the grades of those schools, and [illegible] to the Grammar Schools. But, to secure a proper and systematic attention to this branch of study it should be [illegible] the classes [illegible] a fixed and appointed time be made part of each day's programme of study, as has already been many times urged by the Committee in their previous Reports. Ten minutes to each session, for instance, [illegible] by the regular teachers in every room [illegible] under the same plan that has already been followed in the case of the Primary Schools, would be sufficient, and this would amount to [illegible] a very moderate [illegible] for a subject of such general interest and importance [illegible] will appear when compared (in connection with the [illegible]) with several of the best of the European Schools of a grade corresponding to our Grammar department as given below.

* Sect. 10, Chap. X of the Regulations [illegible]:

Two half hours each week in the Grammar Schools shall be devoted to the study and practice of vocal music. Instruction shall be given to the first and second classes by the music teachers. Musical exercises, the singing of the scale and exercises in reading simple music, [illegible] shall be practised twice a week by the [illegible] classes under the direction of the assistant teachers, and the pupils shall undergo examinations and receive credits for proficiency as in the other studies pursued in the schools.

In comparison with the above we give below the time now devoted to these studies in the various classes of three of our own schools of this grade. These schools are taken by the Committee from among the seventeen in which, as we have said, some attention is given to music in all the classes. They are up to the average standard of excellence.

To test the operation of this plan in connection with the curriculum of studies required for our own schools of this grade, the experiment has been faithfully tried in one or two instances, and the results, as affecting the general interests of the school, have been carefully regarded. The testimony of Mr. Sheldon, master of the [illegible] Grammar School, in whose [illegible] hearty co-operation such instruction has been daily carried out in every room in his school during the past year is interesting and to the point.

Supt. Mr. Sheldon, in a letter to the Committee, in reply to their inquiries on that subject, "It affords me gratification to give my testimony in favor of the practicability and value of your efforts to inaugurate and carry forward a thorough and scientific system of instruction in vocal music as an element of popular education in the public schools of Boston. I am confident that a strictly scientific course of instruction in vocal music is not only practicable, but imperatively demanded, in view of the high mission the schools of Boston ought to fulfil in the work of practical and moral culture. The advantage of such a system would be almost universal, since in a school of about one thousand girls, less than a dozen pupils were excused from all causes, for unfitness to [illegible] degree of success in this department of culture. This number would thus be reduced, provided musical instruction had been begun at the age fixed for the admission of pupils to the Primary Schools by the Rules and Regulations of the School Board. My experience and observation lead me to conclude that the time devoted to the study of vocal music tends to enlarge and further the progress of the pupils in the other branches of study, rather than retard. Especially is this true in regard to speaking and reading, which consists of essentially the same elements as singing and should be taught in conjunction with it. Vocal music is one of the most useful agencies in the discipline of a school. The result there is in my judgment a far better appearance, generally, than 'the rod,' in securing that harmony between teacher and pupils, and a happy spirit and temper of mind, which would prevent most of the petty cases of wrong-doing, for which punishment is so often inflicted in our schools. The influence of vocal music tends to be toward the formation of a cheerful and amiable character, and the development of that strength and moral power which is necessary to a life of usefulness.

"Our plan is to assign eight or ten minutes of each day of the school year to be devoted exclusively by all the teachers of the school to instruction in vocal music. We found that it only served to [illegible] and [illegible] practically developed a taste for the art, and [illegible] and called out the perceptive and constructive faculties of the mind more than any other single study taught for the same length of time.

"With a very few years, should the system so ably, so auspiciously introduced into the Boston Schools, be faithfully and persistently carried forward by the School Board members and people of the city, I feel confident in predicting that the pupils, generally of the same age and advancement, would read and express in singing vocal written music at sight as readily and more correctly than they would do with the School material in speaking words. And my earnest hope makes the work so well commenced here may be pushed forward until the children of the humblest classes of America, as they graduate from our schools, may be found trained in all respects so as to be able to compare with and rival the pupils of the best schools of the Old World."

After such practical confirmation of their views, your Committee give notice of their intention at an early day to bring before the Board an order requiring that a distinct and specified amount [illegible] of time in each session be devoted daily to instruction in music in all the schools of the Grammar department, being substantially the same order in spirit and form, as that recently passed in reference to the Primary Schools. In the nature of the case, without such specified and allotted time as well as an aged programme for musical study, would be such of not for the Grammar Schools, and done such [illegible]. At present, as it is impracticable that a special teacher as has done before said is undertaking by drawing a portion of the time thus to be made to give a proper direction to such instruction through out the lower rooms. By the present requirements of the Rules, two half-hours a week must be devoted by the music teacher to personal instruction in the specialty in the first and second classes [illegible] of the division. And where these classes are divided for the purpose of musical instruction into two parts, to each of which the music teacher devotes a half hour of such time as his engagements with these upper classes will admit, inspecting and giving direction to the teaching of the regular teachers in all their music lessons being expected to devote some portion of each day to this branch of study.

The music [illegible] proper text-book in the Grammar Schools is begining to be severely felt. In the lower classes, as in the Primary Schools, the usual charts furnished by Mr. Mason with Hohmann, and exercises from Hohmann, Mason, Wilhelm and Hullah, in some degree supply the want. Not so in the two upper classes. There, as has been previously stated in our Report, it has been a pernicious custom but for the music teacher to use such book in illustration of his method of teaching as in his judgment was thought best,—the pupils supplying themselves with the books whenever required. The textbook now so used in the upper classes is an adaptation of the excellent course of Wilhelm, by John Hullah,—which follows admirably upon the plan of Hohmann as now in use in all the Primary and the lower grades of the Grammar classes. Connected with these progressive exercises of Wilhelm and Hullah is a variety of well adapted pieces of music selected and most of them arranged by Mr. Sharland,—the whole forming a comprehensive and handsome volume for the pupil. This book the Committee have recommended through the Committee on Text Books for adoption by the Board as a necessary and important aid in the existing stage of musical education in our schools. And with in this point the Committee would again refer to the views expressed by them in a former Report (see printed volume of the School Report for 1865) in which they express their hope that before long they may possess a manual of music adapted expressly to our system of Public School education. Each manual, in three parts, adapted to Primary, Grammar and High School instruction, they believe, made more or less graduated, of the present efforts to adopt and carry out a thorough and progressive plan of musical culture in the schools of Boston,—which, when completed, should be recognized and adopted as the authorized text-books of the school, and be furnished to them at the cheapest rate free from any incumbrance of copyright, or the interest or emoluments of any individual, either compiler or publisher.

In the Girls' High and Normal School, as heretofore, this department of instruction is under the charge of Mr. Zerrahn. Here the Committee have observed with pleasure, a growing interest and appreciation on the part of the pupils, in their musical studies from year to year. This is owing to the natural result of the more thorough attention to this subject in the Primary and Grammar departments. Under the hands of an accomplished master and musician, the pupils soon acquire a greater fullness and smoothness of tone, style and method of delivery, a good degree of facility in the reading of music [illegible] single in two and three parts, and some knowledge of musical form and composition. Two lessons a week, of an hour and a half each, are apportioned equally among the three classes of the school.

In the Training Department of that school, for the general lessons in Education, Science, musical instruction in the art of teaching music, illustrated by lessons to Primary pupils, is given by Mr. Mason.

Leipzig

The annual examinations at the Conservatorium took place as usual in April, concerning the first of which we have received the following translation from the Leipziger Tageblatt of April 14:

"On the 11th of April the first of the annual public examinations of the Conservatorium der Musik took place in the Gewandhaus Hall. The programme comprised five pieces for the piano, two for the violin, and one for the violoncello. In the first named Messrs. Ernst Rabenberg, of Berlin, (A minor Concerto by Hummel, 1st movement); Miss Wayrauch, of Rammelsloh, (Concert-Polonaise Op. 36, Moscheles); James Wilson, of Newport Rhode Island, (Rondo Brillant in E flat, by Mendelssohn); George Hodorowski, of Poltawa (A flat Concerto by Field, 1st movement); Gustav Kogel of Leipzig (E-flat Concerto, Beethoven, 1st movement) and Charles Harp, of Birmingham (2d. and 3d. movements of the same Concerto). The violin was represented by Messrs. Lukoff Bakeroff, and Davydoff of St. Petersburg; the violoncello by Mr. Julius Hegar, of Basel.

"The large audience of invited listeners (generally only seen here on similar occasions) signified their approval of all the performances, but especially (very naturally) those of the two youngest and smallest (Wayrauch and Hodorowski, the former of whom is fourteen, the latter thirteen years old) by thunders of applause. With this simple notice our report might perhaps be considered, by many quite sufficient. A reporter however who has always deemed it his duty to take not so much the opinion of the more or less select Dilettanti public (to whom still in equity and fairness, a certain knowledge of art, developed by long and steady interest in upon good musical entertainments, cannot be denied) as to receive for his guide the principles of the art itself judges it to be in the interest as well of the art and the tonal school, as also of the young artists themselves to some extent some searching and discriminating discussion upon the efforts of the latter.

"The Conservatorium at the Institution, which is indebted for its high renown to Mendelssohn Bartholdy, its chief founder and first leader, in whose present list of teachers such celebrated names as Moscheles, Moritz Hauptmann, Ferd David and E. F. Richter are found, requires indeed a closer and more sensitive observation than other schools, which cannot boast so distinguished a position. For we may rightly here expect and claim that such an Institution correspond with its world-wide fame, and the solution of this question we are enabled, for the most part, to find in these Examinations.

"Above all, every criticism must have a firm basis. It is accordingly our duty to define our position well, before we examine more closely this, as well as later following Exhibitions. In our day it has been allowed the creating, not the executing musician to content himself with mere outward appearances, without clearly and precisely showing the inner motive of the same. From the artist of the present, not simply the mere technical skill is required, but also intelligence and an appreciative interpretation of the music. Even the study of technic, indispensable to such interpretation, we claim that he must try to investigate and reason the spirit of the tone-art through its materials. Without this intellectual element the technic alone is a mere handicraft. The dexterity of the hands alone where it is unmaked by the inspiration of the soul, even if the written marks of expression be ever so carefully and precisely given, are far from forming an artistic representation. The "How" of the performance is almost of secondary importance. Does the scholar feel it to be in consequence of genial intuition (which notwithstanding is often manifested in children) or in consequence of the explanations of a master himself deeply imbued with the true meaning and spirit of the tone language—if the scholar so soon finds himself inspired by the 'Why'—i.e., by the intellectual necessity of those shades of expression, as these will certainly influence his innermost understanding, and involuntarily impart themselves to his fingers. Thus following the inspired impulse he will find the correct colour of expression. More technical general directions and prescriptions can come in aid here. This much is of no moment in advance, as preparing the way for a correct appreciation of the following. Among the pianists mentioned above, Messrs. Harp, Hodorowski, Wilson and Wayrauch distinguished themselves by a more or less intellectual comprehension of the "Why." With Mr. Harp (a young man of 20-22 years) it appears already as the result of inner feeling and one with young Hodorowski (the boy) apparently only from the elements of hereditary and thorough talent; with Mr. Wayrauch the musical talent may yet also prevail, although the inner sense is already distinguishable, while in Mr. Wilson (a young man of some national [illegible]) we see the full result of reflection intellect. In the most of the four above named gentlemen the fruit of the school—the purely technical power—is only to be regarded as commendable in connection with the touch, the influence which the inspired impulse lends rarely on arrives upon the fingers and which as it exists in the classes relationship with the individual character of each artist, appears accordingly variously modified. The playing of Messrs. Rabenberg and Kogel, on the mentary displayed only the result of severe technical school and commendable industry and perhaps from this point may claim corresponding compliments. Only we could have wished from Mr. Nagel a somewhat soberer appreciation of the standard of which, among other things, the occasional glances toward the audience could not well be considered an incorrect indication.

"Of the violinists, Mr. Lehr represented the respectable technic gained through industrious study. Young Tewydow, however, [illegible] possessed in addition to fine technical skill, the intrinsic art of individual colour, with reflection of an [illegible] ripe and [illegible]. Mr. Hegar finally —whose control of his instrument gave token of an excellent school—appeared, with reference to [illegible] interpretation, to stand upon the same ground with Mr. Hegar."

Music in the Public Schools.

We copy to-day in full the Annual Report (written by Dr. Upham) of the Committee on Music, embodied in the very elaborate Annual Report of the School Committee, a formidable document of 350 pages. It must surely be read with interest by all who believe in Music as an important element in popular education; and if well read and pondered, it must go far to convert some who are still unbelievers. It shows what hopeful and indeed remarkable progress has been made, not only in our High and Grammar schools, but in nearly every one of our 250 Primary schools, in teaching nearly every child to sing simple music both by rote and by note, by that rare teacher Mr. L. W. Mason, who seems to have been sent into the world on just this mission to show how to win the children, and their teachers too, to music; what wonders are wrought at the same time by another equally gifted teacher, Mr. Monroe, in building up the voices together with the health, of the young; how happy the children are made by this exercise, and how much more cheerfully, with what light hearts and clear minds, they go from it to their other studies; how it promotes the love of order by giving them the sense of rhythmical support; how one by one the leading members of the School Committee and the heads of Schools have come to see and own the good of it, and how pleased and inspired by what they see, the teachers in the several rooms of nearly all the schools have made themselves scholars of the gentlemen alluded to, and have qualified themselves to carry on the exercises in the same spirit in their several class rooms. So that vocal Music —of course in its very simple, rudimentary stages, not in the higher sense of Art—has at length become a vital part of our whole common school system, and the Committee, having these ideas by abundant practical experiment, have gained courage to establish the Rule that among the indispensable qualifications for the office of a teacher in whatever grade of schools must be a certain power of teaching music,—a rule which is fast becoming all-but universal throughout.

The time asked for this exercise is so little as to be only that the loss would be but trifling, even if it did no good. No one pretends that it does harm, and the general testimony of teachers and competent witnesses is, that it is doing incalculable good. By the tables in the Report it will be seen that we do not yet give more than half as much time to music relatively to other studies, as they do in the schools of Germany, on which our foremost educators have long gazed as the best models. But it is wonderful how much may be done in half hours, in ten minutes, if done heartily, with live energy and on a sound and rational system. We have now a School Committee with whom it is a conviction and a thing of conscience; we have found the two men (and we should name a third, Mr. Sharland, who follows up Mr. Mason's good work in the Grammar Schools), who in themselves impersonate the art of teaching children music; we have got the children interested, glowing with the sense of daily progress; and hundreds of their teachers heartily participating in the work; the idea, the faith is fast taking possession of the community, becoming a part of public opinion, leavening the whole mass. Shall there be any falling back? The moment just before complete success is always an anxious one. The School Committee do well, therefore, in their annual Reports to iterate, reiterate their plea, re-state their arguments, fortified by new experience, that a good work so well begun, so full of promise, shall be protected to the end; that no neglect, no cavils of doubting Thomases or partisan opponents, shall be allowed to arrest the plant midway in its growth.

This Report is the more significant in view of a recent agreement in the School Board of the question of abolishing that Musical School Festival, which has proved so happy for two fine years. Happily it was but a small minority of those [illegible]. Such motions by this there are always apt to cause doubts and opposition to all schemes in advance of culture, and to all reforms however sure in the most liberal and hard [illegible] [illegible]. Are they not providential means and tests to fall asleep in good works that require faith and persistent labor?

It is one of the incidental, but not fatal, difficulties of a popular government, where all claim a voice, and nothing ever gets entirely beyond discussion, that there will be agitations — perhaps for the mere sake of self-assertion; would [illegible] in putting down anything at all fine and elevating, looking up to the moral and spiritual elevation of the race, which it has cost zeal and toil and sacrifice and years to build up. No doubt, there would be found thinking and influential people in this city, who would like to have the Public Gardens or even the Common, here in every child, cut into building lots and sold because in our (very narrow) sense they can be looked upon as superfluous. For the very reason, to soothe this need restlessness of a competitive bureaucracy to harmonious tastes, feelings, hearts, a love of the beautiful, to round off the sharp corners of the Yankee character and manners, to pervade the soul of man with that instinctive reverence which goes with the sense and culture of the Beautiful, do we need Music in our schools.

Music in Boston.—Review of the Season, 1866–7.

(Concluded.)

Having counted up our wealth in instrumental music under the two heads of Orchestral and Chamber Music — to which we might have added a long list of Organ compositions of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., as well as the Trashy Offertories of Batiste Wely and the like, but that it would be essentially a repetition of the list we printed for the year before,—we come now to the larger and the smaller forms of vocal music, limiting ourselves, as before, to such works and authors as may be considered classical, and whose performance marks the progress of taste and culture in a sound direction. For it would be an endless and an idle task to count up all the sentimental songs and ballads, the hackneyed commonplaces from Italian operas, mere bravura merely written to show off a singer, which figure in no end of miscellaneous "popular" concerts, and which always, everywhere, have their audience, just as the sensational and shallow melodramas flourish even in communities where Shakespeare is well known and felt. We begin with the noblest.

III. Oratorio.

Boston still looks to a single source for all its opportunities in this kind. The old Handel and Haydn Society, only one of a numerous offspring, has grown in seriousness and power as well as numbers. In one season a chorus of 500 voices for the ordinary performances,—a number which a few years since came only at the call of a great Festival—and it has already had two Festivals greater than the average in New York,—higher in character of course, than any individual speculation like the latter, pandering to heterogeneous crowds by anthems of military bands and "Drum Corps" side by side with the Messiah and Elijah). Our old Society is one yet all that it should be, as none know better than its own directors, who have been doing all they can, and with encouraging success, to better it. The quality of voices and the choral discipline certainly improve from year to year; while in the choice of means the standard has been kept very high.

This year (there being no Festival—that will come next Spring) the number of public Oratorio performances has been six. The works produced have been: Handel's Messiah (our annual Christmas tradition) and Jephtha, which though given here many years ago, may be counted the novelty of the season; Haydn's Creation; Mendelssohn's St. Paul, Elijah, and Hymn of Praise; this last with Rossini's Stabat Mater made up a single concert, as they often do in England. In Jephtha the Creation, Elijah, the Stabat and the Hymn of Praise, we had the benefit of Mme. Parepa Rosa's noble voice and style; in Elijah we had also the superb contralto of Miss Phillipps; in St. Paul and Jephtha a tenor, Mr. Simpson, was borrowed from New York, for the rest we have been served, not greatly, but for the most part faithfully and well, by relying on our own resources ("home talent"): Miss Houston and Mrs. H. M. Smith, soprani; Mrs. J. S. Cary and Miss Kate Barnett, for contralti; Mr. James Whitney and Mr. W. J. Winch for tenors; and Messrs. Rudolphsen, M. W. Whitney and J. F. Winch for basses.

Jephtha was the only new accession to the repertoire. St. Paul was the new thing of last year. The Creation and Messiah, great and sure to be forgotten, are truly old stories with us,—so much so that it would cost a miracle at least, a new inspiration, to lift the chorus out of the old unconscious habits, [illegible] them. Even Elijah and the Hymn of Praise are getting to be as familiar as household words with all our music lovers. Two great obstacles there always are to widening the field of our acquaintance with great works of this kind, to studying and bringing out other great works which by their intrinsic worth have quite as great a claim on us as any in our list. First the mass of a chorus are too busy to set to work with unstinting energy upon a difficult new work, as say by Handel's contemporary and in least his equal. Then the material economy of such a Society, the eye is outward and seemly to success, so easily forgets the real end of its first purpose, of learning things and doing things for Art's sake, being tempted by some splendid opportunity, as the chance presence of a famous prima donna, into doing the very old thing over again for the hundredth time just for the sake of presenting her; the people pay and crowd the hall so as to hear the singer, the singer being the first question, the music subordinate: the prosperity is so intoxicating, so easily won, that the same round of Oratorios is fain to repeat itself indefinitely; indeed have not these first, which we all know by heart, proved just the right sort of background on which to display the Nightingales and [illegible] whom we are all so crazy about. And we do not care whether we ever know Solomon, Saul or not? Perhaps for that we need a new Society, some small, [illegible] club of singers, who would devote themselves to the [illegible] of [illegible] the Hexaplar, the Christmas Oratorio, [illegible] of his three hundred sacred Cantatas. We confess we sometimes wish that the Handel and Haydn Society would either become a great deal bolder [illegible] so that we might without [illegible] dispense with it and build up another on a new foundation. We have rejoiced more than once of late years at the infusion of new wine into it; but perhaps, after all, new wine needs new bottles.

IV. OPERA.

Here the account is meagre. The German Opera, which promised so well, fell to pieces, and though a company of it since have several times been drawn together again at New York and Philadelphia, our Theatre has not been open to them. We have had no Fidelio again: no William Tell: no Mozart opera, except one bad performance of Don Giovanni: no Weber: no Cherubini; none of the stirring good things which we have so long had to wait for.

Italian Opera, making its headquarters in New York, still visits us for a few weeks at a time, playing every night in the week, and two afternoons besides; the repertoire about the same as usual, with now and then one of the latest fashions from Paris, such as L'Africaine. We have had two visitations, each for a fortnight, of MARETZEK'S TROUPE, consisting of Miss Kellogg, Mme Carmen Poch, Mlle Anna [illegible] Hauck, Mlle. [illegible], Stella Bosisio and Mme. Natali-Testa; tenori Signori Mazzoleni, Baragli and Testa; baritoni, Ronconi and Bellini; bassi, Antonucci, Dubreul, &c. They gave the following operas:

Bellini's Sonnambula; Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia, Lucia, Elisir d'Amore, Favorita; Verdi's Trovatore and Ernani; Il Ballo in Maschera; Gounod's Faust; Auber's Fra Diavolo; Herold's Zampa (first time in Boston); Meyerbeer's Africaine and Star of the North (twice); Ricci's Crispino e la Comare.—The [illegible] in opera seria, as Lucrezia, the Verdi roles, &c.,—was Mlle Poch, new to our public, who made a good mark. In such roles as the Sonnambula, Traviata, in "Star of the North," &c., it was the young and beautiful Anna Hauck, who became a [illegible] favorite and the singer of late promise. Miss Kellogg took the lead as usual in a few light and joyful pieces. Mme. Testa did the Azucena, [illegible] for Orsini and other contralto parts. Sig. Ronconi was the great card, admirable of course in the Barber, Dr Dulcamara and Crispino. As conductors, Herr Bergmann and Sig. Torriani alternated, now and then Maretzek in person.

Then for a single week came the MAX STRAKOSCH TROUPE, consisting of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, with [illegible] of the [illegible], Brignoli, Fossati and Ferranti, strengthened by Miss Phillipps and Sig. [illegible]. They performed the Trovatore, Il Barbiere, Lucia, Don Giovanni, and Norma twice.

We have only to add the tentative experiment of "PARLOR OPERA" in the Music Hall, when Don Pasquale and Norma were each given twice (in English), and the "Robinson Crusoe" [illegible], by Miss [illegible], Mr J. Whitney and Mr Farley, tenors, Mr Rudolphsen, Mr. Guilmette and Mr. M. W. Whitney, basses,—and our record is complete.

SACRED CONCERT. On Sunday evening June 16, a concert of classical sacred music will be given at the Church of the Unity (Dr. Hepworth's), complimentary to Mr. J. E. [illegible], who is about to leave for Europe in September to pursue his musical studies. Several of our best artists will assist.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The Advertiser has the following report of the annual meeting, Monday evening, May 27, in Bumstead Hall:

The president, Dr. J. B. Upham, presided. After the records of the last meeting had been read, the treasurer, Mr. George W. Palmer, presented his report, which exhibited receipts during the year amounting to $[illegible]; expenditures $[illegible]; leaving a balance of $[illegible].

The report of the librarian, Mr. George H. Chickering, was then presented. The report stated that the additions to the library during the year were as great as in any former year, while the [illegible] has been larger than any should be. Among the additions were 111 copies of the Stabat Mater and 100 copies of Jephtha in octavo book form, containing the music of the complete works in vocal and piano-forte score. The Jephtha was imported from London, and generously presented to the society with the necessary orchestral parts, by the president, Dr. Upham.

The president next submitted his report giving an abstract of the doings of the society during the year.

Nine regular meetings of the government had been held during the year and the society had been called together five times. At all these meetings a gratifying harmony had prevailed. Thirteen members had been admitted, eight discharged and four resigned. There had been thirty-two rehearsals with good attendance, and six public performances in the Music Hall participated in by choruses of five hundred voices, and orchestras of fifty aided by celebrated singers, and crowned with good success. In speaking of the proposition which had been received in the board of government, to publish the annals of the society, the president expressed the opinion that that work should not be much longer delayed, as some of the original members of the society were now living and it would every year become more difficult to preserve the records. The president spoke of the evil of absenteeism at some length, saying that although it had been considerably lessened it still prevailed to such an extent as to be a great obstacle to further achievements by the society. After speaking of some other matters of minor importance, in which [illegible] might be made, the report alluded to the proposal for the society to take place during the coming year, and expressed a hope that while the ordinary work of the season is [illegible] neglected the festival might be made successful in all respects.

After several members had spoken in high commendation of the suggestions of the president's report, it was voted to print it in pamphlet form for distribution.

The report of the trustees of the permanent fund—Judge Putnam, Nathaniel Harris and the president of the society—stated the value of the fund [illegible].

The meeting proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year with the following result:—

President, J. Baxter Upham; Vice President, O. J. Faxon; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Geo. W. Palmer; Librarian, George H. Chickering. The others were re-elected. For Trustees instead of the old Board, as given by the Advertiser, the following were chosen:

G. Frank Clark, Theophilus Stover, Charles H. Webb, D. L. Laws, E. C. Daniell, R. M. Lowell, Stephen Somes, Oliver R. Lathrop.

PHILADELPHIA. The German Opera troupe (from the Stadt Theater, New York) closed last Saturday a series of performances at the Chestnut Street Theatre which appear to have given great delight. Certainly the repertoire of these few weeks is worth all that the Italian Opera gave us in two years. It included William Tell, Don Juan, Fidelio, Nozze di Figaro, and La Dame Blanche, as well as the Huguenots, the Jewess, Robert le Diable, Faust, Masaniello, Merry Wives of Windsor and Stradella. In Don Juan, Mme. Johannsen was Donna Anna, Frederici Elvira, Rotter Zerlina, Habelmann Ottavio, Wilhelm Formes, Don Juan, Hermanns, Leporello. Faust had the old cast, Frederici, Himmer and Hermanns, with Johannsen as Siebel and W. Formes as Valentine. In the Jewess a new prima donna, Mme. Seeling made a successful debut. A new tenor Bernard sang the music of Raimbaut acceptably. There was a chorus of 40 voices, and a good orchestra, conducted by Herr Neuendorf. The Bulletin says of the performance of Rossini's masterpiece:

Herr Himmer looked and sang the part of "Arnold" in the most effective manner and Hermanns, Formes, as "Tell" was also good, though his voice is scarcely strong enough for the music. Weinlich, was excellent as "Walter," and Mr. Chandon, a new actor, was equally good as "Gessler." The graceful music of the fisherman was well sung also by Mr. Bernard. Mme. Johannsen as "Mathilde" sang the [illegible] and acted very well. Mme. Frederici sang and acted nicely as "Hedwig." Mme. Rotter's small [illegible] made the part of "Jemmy" one of the most important of the scenes, and her [illegible] with fine effect in the concerted pieces. The chorus and orchestra were good, and every real lover of music who was there rejoiced in the rare treat. [illegible] the Academy had been [illegible] only ignoring all operatic performances [illegible] take place in their own building.

SMALL REED ORGAN. Messrs. Mason and Hamlin are constantly adding to the attractiveness of their elegant warerooms, at 154 Tremont street and one may pass a very agreeable hour or two in examining and admiring their superb Cabinet Organs, which have now attained such worldwide fame. The enterprising firm have just completed the largest reed Organ ever made, which is surely a magnificent instrument, whether we consider its tone, power and the completeness of the entire work.

It consists of sixteen complete sets of reeds, with twenty-two stops, two manuals and complete pedal key board. The following detailed description of each will afford an idea of its compass, the peculiarities of tone, and the mechanical devices employed.

The stops are arranged as follows:

UPPER MANUAL.

Viol d'Amour	Flautina,
Hautboy	Vox Humana,
Flute.

LOWER MANUAL.

Diapason 16 ft.,	Cornet Angelais,
Diapason 8 ft.,	Bassoon
Bourdon,	Euphone,
Gamba,	Principal.

PEDALS.

8 feet.	16 feet.	32 feet.

MECHANICAL STOPS.

Full Organ,	Pedal Coupler,
Tremulant,	Forte Upper Manual
Manual Coupler	Forte Lower Manual

The compass of each manual is five octaves, each stop in the same comprising sixty-one notes, and having its own peculiar tone. Many of the above stops closely resemble those of the same names in pipe-organs, and the variety and beauty of the combinations of which they are susceptible, is really surprising. The Viol d'Amour is an 8 ft. tone from CC to C in alt. It is the softest in the organ, very smooth, and equals in effect the corresponding stop in a pipe-organ. The Hautboy as a solo stop, is of a very rich quality of tone, quite clear and resembles the Italian Oboe. It is an 8-ft. stop. The Flute is a 4 ft. tone, from C to C in alt. It has a silvery and flute-like quality, and is very fine either as a solo stop, or combined with others. The Flautina is a 2 ft. tone, from C to C in alt. It has the clear shrill quality of the piccolo, and when combined with an 8 ft. or 4 ft. stop, the effect is [illegible]. It is rarely used as a solo stop but is intended for effect in the full organ in combination with one or more stops. The tongue of the reed instead of [illegible] is but [illegible] of an inch long. The Vox Humana is an 8-ft. tone from CC to C in alt. the effect is [illegible] designed, as its name indicates, to resemble the human voice.

The 16 ft. Diapason is a full sonorous tone, of great depth and power, giving body to the full organ, and a necessary bass foundation stop. It is a 16 ft. tone from CCC to C in alt.

The Bourdon, also a 16 ft. tone, possesses the qualities of the preceding stop, with the exception of its heavy bass of so depth and fullness, but [illegible] adds [illegible] richness to combinations in which it is used.

The 8-ft. Diapason and Gamba are 8-ft. stops. The tone of each is quite sweet and mellow, possessing the rich diapason quality so indispensable in all organs.

The Cornet Angelais and Bassoon answer for one set of reeds of 8 ft. tone, the latter covering the lower octave and a half. This is the only set of reeds in the organ thus divided.

The Euphone is a remarkable stop. It is very being very peculiar and wholly different from the prolonged harmonics [illegible] reed. It is quite penetrating and crisp, though not sharp and adds greatly to all the tones of the full organ. It is an 8 ft. tone. The Principal is a 4 ft. tone, an octave above the Diapason and is mostly used in combination with other stops to produce a sparkling effect.

The Pedal Key-board has a compass of twenty-seven notes which is as complete as that of the largest pipe-organs. It operates three sets of reeds, 8 ft., 16 ft. and 32 ft. tone respectively. The lowest note of the 32 ft. is CCCC.

The names of the mechanical stops clearly indicate their use and require but a brief notice. The "Full Organ" draws the entire power of the two manuals independent of the various stops. The "Tremulant" acts on the Cornet Angelais alone. The Forte Upper Manual and Forte Lower Manual are separate swells one for each manual, while the two combined may be operated by the foot. Each stop works on the pneumatic principle, a new feature in reed instruments.

The case of this organ is [illegible] chosen, [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible]. It stands 12 ft. 3 in. high, [illegible] ft. [illegible] wide and 6 ft. [illegible] deep. An elegant carving representing the various stops [illegible] the stops are [illegible] the top, the whole presenting a very beautiful appearance.—N. Y. Mus. Gazette.

June Roses.

O warm rose, thou stately rose
Unfold your buds of scarlet hue,
You know not that you bring me news
To all my heart holds true.

Long ago a lady fair
Gentle sweet and unassuming,
Star among the maidens rare,
I'll say unto to watch your blooming

Spiders, weave your wizard spells,
Spirit elves, fairy and fall;
Lilies, swing your silver bells
Sing your sweetest, nightingale

Moon and stars, O tender moon
While I watch my roses growing,
Nearer nearer bring my love
With your coming and your going

O my white rose, so dear—so dear!
For whom my poems come and go
Close in my heart from year to year
Forever bud and blow!

Music in Vienna in the Year 1793.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

The music performed in private concerts embraced all kinds, from the Oratorio, the Opera, the Symphony, to pianoforte variations and the simple song. Such concerts during Beethoven's second winter in Vienna (if not, as seems certain, during his first) were arranged by princes Lobkowitz, Lichnowsky, Lichtenstein, Esterhazy, Schwarzenberg, Auersperg, Kinsky, Trautmannsdorf and Starhemberg; by Counts Appony, Batthyany, Kollonitz, Fries and Johann Esterhazy, Czernin, Harrach, Palffy, Fries, Strattman and Zichy; by the Countesses Hatzfeld and Thun; the barons Lang, Pasqualati, van Swieten and von Kees; the Hofrathe Meyer, Greiner, Paradies; by Fräulein Martines, the banker Henikstein and others. Those among the best musicians and composers, too, whose circumstances allowed it, gave private concerts, in which they made themselves and their works known and to which their colleagues were invited. O'Kelly, the Irish singer, who was the first Basilio in the "Marriage of Figaro," met Mozart for the first time in an assembly of this kind at Kozeluch's, where the then favorite composers Vanhall and Dittersdorf were also present.

Prince Joseph Max, prince Lobkowitz, was, at the time when Beethoven came to Vienna, a young man (born Dec. 7, 1772) and had just married a daughter of prince Schwarzenberg. He was a violin-player of considerable facility and such a devoted lover of music and the drama, that he squandered his whole income on them and in 20 years became completely bankrupt. Being just of Beethoven's supposed age he entered into extraordinarily intimate relations with him, occasionally they had disputes and then were with one another as if born of equal rank.

The reigning prince Esterhazy was that Paul Anton, who after the death of his father (Feb. 28, 1790) broke up the musical establishment at Esterhazy and dismissed Joseph Haydn after 30 years of service. He died on the 22nd of January 1794 and was succeeded by his son Nicolas, a young man just five years older than Beethoven. Prince Nicolas inherited his grandfather's taste for music, engaged an orchestra again and was soon known as one of the most zealous furtherers of Catholic Church music. The best composers of Vienna, Beethoven included, wrote Masses for the Chapel at Esterhazy, where they were performed with great splendor.

Count Johann Nepomuk Esterhazy "of the middle line at Frakno," was a man of 45 years. He played the oboe well and, what reflected on his honor, he had been a true friend and protector of Mozart.

Of Count Franz Esterhazy, a man of 15 years, Schoenfeld in his "Annals of Music" says: "The great friend of music gives at certain parts of the year very great and splendid Academies, in which for the most part great and sublime works are performed, especially the Handel choruses, the Sonatas of Emanuel Bach, the Stabat Mater of Pergolese and the like. These occasions always bring together a select company of the best virtuosos."

It was not the then reigning prince Joseph Kinsky (who died 1798 in his 48th year), who at a later period became a distinguished patron of Beethoven, but his son Ferdinand Joh. Nep. then a blooming boy of 11 years (born Dec. 4, 1781) upon whose youthful taste the power, beauty and novelty of the works of that master made a deep impression.

Prince Carl Lichnowsky, the scholar and friend of Mozart, had every Friday morning a Quartet performance in his house. Schuppanzigh, son of a professor in the Royal School, at that time a young man of 16 years (all the musical [illegible] are to be trusted), played the first violin, Louis Sina, a pupil of Förster and also still a very young man, the second, Franz Weiss, (who on the 18th January 1793 completed his 15th year), the viola; and Anton Kraft, or his son Nicolas, a boy of 14 years (born Dec. 18, 1778), the violoncello. It was in fact a Quartet of boy virtuosos, of which Beethoven, who was some years older, could make what he pleased. The wife of the prince was Marie Christine (18 years old), one of the "three Graces," as George Forster called the daughters of that Countess Thun, in whose house Mozart found such high appreciation and warm friendship, and whose noble qualities are so much praised by Burney, Reichardt and Forster. The princess, as well as her husband, belonged to the best dilettanti in piano playing.

Hofrath von Kees, vice-president of the Court of Appeal of Lower Austria, was still alive. "He," says Gerber, speaking of a somewhat earlier period, "was considered the first friend of music and first dilettante in Vienna, and gave several concerts twice a week in his house, where the first virtuosos who then chanced to be in Vienna, and the first composers, like Joseph Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf, Hoffmeister, Albrechtsberger, Giarnovichi, &c. were assembled; where Haydn's Symphonies were performed." In Haydn's letters to Madame Genzinger (Haydn in London, by Karajan) von Kees's name frequently occurs, the last one in a note of Aug. 4, 1791, in which the writer mentions that on that day he was to dine at the Hofrath's. This distinguished man left behind him at his death (in January 1795) a very rich collection of music, consisting according to the auction advertisement, "of Symphonies, Concertos, Arias, Choruses, Church pieces and whole Operas, which had been collected with great pains from various places or sought out for him by masters, and part of which were only to be found in his possession." The list of authors numbers in all 120 names, among which scarcely one of the important instrumental composers down to that time is wanting.

Gottfried, Baron van Swieten, son of the famous Dutch physician of Maria Theresa, "is to be regarded," says Schönfeld, "as a patriarch in music. His taste is purely for the grand and sublime. He has himself many years ago written 12 fine Symphonies, ['as stiff as himself,' said Joseph Haydn]. When he is present at an Academy our half-connoisseurs never lose sight of him, trying to read from his looks (not intelligible enough perhaps to everybody) what sort of an opinion they should pass on what they have been hearing. He gives every year some very grand and splendid musical occasions, where only pieces by old masters are performed. He is especially fond of Handel's style, of whom he for the most part gives great choruses. At the last Christmas festival (1792) he gave such an Academy at prince von Paar's, where an Oratorio by this master was performed." Neukomm told Professor Jahn (Life of Mozart, III. 389) that in concerts, the moment that any whispering began, his Excellency, who used to sit in the front rows, stood up full length turned with solemn dignity to the delinquent, measured him a long while with severe look and slowly sat himself down again. That always had the desired effect. Van Swieten had some peculiar ideas of composition. He had, for instance, a partiality for the imitation of the sounds of nature in music and compelled Haydn to imitate the frogs in his Seasons. Haydn himself confirms it, when he says: "This whole passage regarded as an imitation of a frog did not flow from my pen. I was forced to write down the French rubbish. With the whole orchestra this wretched thought soon disappears indeed, but as a pianoforte arrangement it cannot stand. I trust the reviewers will not deal too severely with it. I am an old man and cannot look that all through again." But at any rain van Swieten must have the glory of founding in Vienna the taste for Handel's Oratorios and Bach's organ and piano music, and thereby adding a new element to the music of that capital. The expenses which such oratorio performances involved, however, were not, as Schindler seems to intimate, defrayed by him, but by a society which had been called into life through him and of which he was permanent secretary. Among its members were princes Lichtenstein, Esterhazy, Schwarzenberg, Auersperg, Kinsky, Trautmansdorf, Sinzendorf, Counts Czernin, Harrach, Erdödy and Fries. In their palaces as well as in van Swieten's house (next to the hotel zum Römischen Kaiser, then called "zu den drei Hacken," on the Renngasse) and sometimes in the great halls of the Imperial Library the performances took place at midday before an audience of invited guests.

Fräulein Martinez, who occupies so prominent a place in Burney's description of his visit to Vienna, a pupil of Porpora, in whose house he once, forty years before, the young Joseph Haydn was employed as accompanist, was still living in the Michaelerhaus and gave musical parties every Saturday evening during the season.

"Herr Hofrath and Kammerzahlmeister von Meyer," says Schönfeld, "is so distinguished an amateur of music that everybody about him in the chancery is musical and among the [illegible] may be found even a Raphael and a [illegible]. It can easily be conceived therefore that a great deal of music is made both here in the city and at his place in the country. His Imperial Majesty himself has been present at such entertainments."

These sketches will suffice to illustrate and confirm the remarks which have been made above about Vienna as the central point of instrumental music. We must now name some of the more important among the great number of composers in this branch of the art, whom Beethoven found there.

Of course Haydn stood at the head. The [illegible] but at a wide remove [illegible] was Mozart's successor in the office of an Imperial chamber composer Leopold Kozeluch, a Bohemian, then just 40 years old. Although now forgotten, and as Beethoven expressed it, "miserabile," he was at that time famous in Europe through his Quartets and his chamber music. This great [illegible] we shall see below.

A man of [illegible] with the multitude but of solid talent, whose knowledge far exceeded that of Kozeluch, whom Beethoven prized in a high degree, calling him twenty years afterward his old teacher, was Emanuel Aloys Förster, then a Silesian then 45 years old. His Quintets, Quartets and [illegible] works were highly valued but at that time known for the most part only in manuscript.

Anton Eberl, five years older than Beethoven, a Viennese by birth, had in his sixteenth year composed two Operettas, which had been performed in the Kärnthnerthor Theatre and one of which had won for the composer the applause of Gluck. He appears to have been a fervent [illegible] of Mozart, and strove so hard to write in the style and spirit of the master that some of his works were printed by dishonorable publishers under Mozart's name and circulated through Europe. In 1795 he accompanied Mozart's widow and her sister Madame Lange on their journey through Europe, and won for himself in other cities the renown as a pianist and composer which he possessed in Vienna. His strength was instrumental composition, and we shall presently behold him, for a moment, as a Symphonist snatching the palm away from Beethoven!

John Vanhall, whose name was as well known in Paris and London, that Burney 20 years before had sought him out in his attic chamber in a suburb of Vienna, was as inexhaustible as ever in production. Gerber in his older Lexikon (1792) says that Breitkopf and Härtel at that time possessed 26 of his Symphonies in manuscript. The secondary was like that of Haydn; his talent of such a kind that—all his works are now forgotten.

It would be useless to continue the list further. But one more fact significant as to the musical taste and culture of the higher classes of the capital may be added. During the winter 1792–3 there were 10 private theatres of amateur companies in operation, three of which the most important were in the houses of Edlen von Stockhammer, Kinsky, [illegible], and the bookseller Schrambl. Most of these companies produced Operas and Operettas.

MEYERBEER AND MENDELSSOHN.

To-day I feel like a bold young warrior drawing his sword for the first time in a real quarrel.* It seems as if this little Leipzig, where already some important questions have already been discussed, were to be the scene of a musical one also, for it came to pass that the two most prominent compositions of the day have been performed here, probably for the first time in the world together—namely Meyerbeer's Huguenots and Mendelssohn's St. Paul. On such a subject where can one begin or end? Of comparison between them, or preference of the one to the other there can be no question. Our readers know too well the tendency of these pages, and that when a work of Mendelssohn's we have no thought for Meyerbeer so [illegible] opposed are the paths of the two. They know also that to characterize the two it is only necessary to allude to the one that [illegible] It is enough to make one think there must be something wrong in [illegible] to see the success of Meyerbeer in our sound, musical Germany and to hear people, otherwise sensible enough, and even musicians who can take delight in the quiet triumphs of Mendelssohn and yet can say of this music—"There is something in it."

It is an history need full of the lofty art of Schröder Devrient [illegible] that I saw the Huguenots for the first time. Who so [illegible] not to rejoice in a new thing and to know the pleasures of hope? Had not [illegible] written with his own hand that there was much in the Huguenots [illegible] might rank with Beethoven? And what said others? And what said I? Well, I fully agreed with Florestan who [illegible] his fist at the stage, and let fall the words that—in the Crociato Meyerbeer might be reckoned among [illegible] in Robert le Diable he had begun to stagger, but that in the Huguenots he has become one of Franconi's." It is impossible to express the disgust with which we were filled by the whole thing, though we always tried to recover [illegible] we were quite worn and wearied with the worry. And, although after hearing it oftener, many happier and more versatile things discovered themselves, yet my final judgment remains the same and I must [illegible] to say to those who venture to place the Huguenots by the side of Fidelio [illegible] though he below it that they know nothing of the matter, nothing, nothing! I should never think of attempting to convert them. That would be out of the question.

A witty writer has said that music is equally in its place in a church or a gambling house. Now, I am no Puritan, but is there any good Protestant who would not be shocked hearing his most precious hymn shouted out on the stage, or at seeing the bloodiest tragedy in the history of his faith degraded to a mountebank farce for the mere sake of getting cash and applause? In fact, the whole opera is revolting, from the overture, with its ridiculous, common-place, mock sanctity, to the finale, after which we might all to be burnt alive on the spot.* After the Huguenots nothing is left but to have criminals executed on the stage, and exhibitions of loose women on the stage.

We have only to go through it all to see its drift. The first act has an orgy of dissolute men with (such the showing taste!) one and only one, woman, but veiled amongst them. The second is yet another revel, but this time women bathing and (for the sake of the Parisians) a man blinded in the midst of them. The third [illegible] a farrago of profligacy and religion. In the fourth the massacre is arranged, and in the fifth it takes place in a church. Debauchery, murder and prayer [illegible] make up the whole of the Huguenots. It is vain to look for one permanently pure idea, one one true Christian emotion. Meyerbeer nails up the hearts of his characters for all the world to see, and says—"Look, there they are, pray touch and handle them!" Throughout, all is artifice, trick to show and hypocrisy.

And the heroes and heroines of this piece—[illegible] alone excepted, who are not much quite as low as the rest—what are they? First, there is Nevers, a thorough French libertine,* who makes love to Valentine, then jilts her and at last marries her. Then Valentine herself, in love with Raoul and marrying Nevers, in company to be true to the former and yet allowing herself to be betrothed to Raoul; next, Raoul in love with Valentine, rejecting her and making love to the Queen, and after all taking Valentine to wife; and lastly the Queen herself. Queen of all these puppets! And people put up with all this just because it is pretty to look at and comes from Paris—though surely our modest German women won't look at it! And all the [illegible] knowing of composers [illegible] at their hands for joy!

To describe the music itself an amount of books would be enough, every bar is considered, and something might be said of each. To startle or to tickle is Meyerbeer's highest aim, and with the mob he succeeds perfectly. As to the [illegible] which he [illegible] into the opera, and about which the French are so mad, I declare that if one of my pupils had brought me such counterpoint, I would have [illegible] him with all [illegible] never to do it worse. How the common people are [illegible] how deliberately [illegible] superficial it is, and how Marcel's continual roaring "Ein' feste Burg" smells of the blacksmith's shop.

A great deal has been said about the "Benediction des poignards" in the fourth act. I grant that it has much dramatic power, some striking and spirited changes, and the chorus especially produces a great external effect; situation, scenery and instrumentation all conspire, and, the horrible being Meyerbeer's element, he has written with real fire and love of his subject. But examine the melody from a musical point of view, and what is it but the "Marseillaise" a little dressed up? Again what art is there in making an effect [illegible] with such means? I am not blaming the employment of all means in their proper place; but it is absurd to make a "grand effect" with a dozen trombones, trumpets and ophicleide, and a hundred men's voices in unison are all doing their loudest close by. I must mention one truly Meyerbeerish piece of calculation. He knows the public too well not to be aware that too much noise at last becomes tiresome, and see how cleverly he counteracts it. Directly after every great crash he has whole arias accompanied by a single instrument, as much as to say—"See how much I can do with a little. Look, you Germans, look!" Unfortunately we cannot deny that he has some wit.

But we should never have time to go through it all in detail. Meyerbeer's very sensuous tendency, his extreme eccentricity and want of style, are as well known as his ability in orchestral arrangement, brilliant display in dramatic treatment and command of the orchestra, and great facility in form. It is not difficult to point out in him Rossini, Mozart, Herold, Weber, Bellini, even Spohr,—in short every possible name. But his special property is that [illegible], fatal, bleating, offensive rhythm, which runs through almost all the airs in this opera. I had begun to mark the pages where it occurred, but at last grew tired. However, the piece contains better things; [illegible] occasional grand [illegible] passages it would be mere spite to deny. Marcel's battle-song [illegible] the page's air [illegible] lovely; the greater part of the [illegible] its lively scenes among the people, as is the first part of the duet between Marcel and Valentine from its strong character; also the sextet, and the mocking chorus from its comic treatment. In the fourth act the "Benediction des poignards" has great [illegible] and above all the duet which follows it between Raoul and Valentine is admirably constructed and abounds with ideas. But what is all here [illegible] against the vulgarity, exaggeration, want of nature, the [illegible] and nonsense of the whole? Thank God, [illegible] it has reached the limit, there can be nothing worse [illegible], unless the stage is turned into a gallows, and the terrible cry of a great talent tormented by the spirit of the time, awakes a hope that things will now mend.

II.

And now a few words on something nobler—a thing to bring a man into tune again with faith and hope, and [illegible] the shadow of what [illegible] palm-groves and see the [illegible] landscape spread at his feet. I mean the St. Paul of Mendelssohn, a work of the greatest purity, the offspring of peace and love. It would be a mistake, besides being unfair to the composer, to compare it, even remotely, to the oratorios of Handel or Bach. They are [illegible] of sacred music [illegible] the Madonnas [illegible] but Bach and Handel had reached maturity when they began to write, whereas Mendelssohn was [illegible]. The work of a young artist whose imagination is [illegible] graceful [illegible] cannot fairly be compared with a work of [illegible] by one of those divine masters who, from their seats among the stars, looked back over a long and hallowed life.

I have already spoken at length of the general treatment of the subject, of the adoption of the chorale from the old oratorios, of the distribution of the choruses and solos among the actors and spectators, and of the [illegible] of the several personages. It has been [illegible] remarked that the chief drawbacks to the general effect of the work are to be found in the first half, that the [illegible] part of St. Stephen, if not absolutely, throwing St. Paul into the background diminishes his importance; that Saul's [illegible] is the character of a romance than of a concert [illegible] also that the oratorio is too long and [illegible] be [illegible]. A [illegible] subject for the artist is the position [illegible] in which the appearances of our Lord are treated (by a chorus of [illegible] and alto), but [illegible] it would be impossible to wound the composer's feelings more easily, than by this, one of his most beautiful inspirations. To my mind nothing can be more appropriate than to represent God as speaking with many voices, and revealing His will through a choir of angels, just as in painting, His presence is indicated more poetically by cherubs hovering in the upper part of the picture than by the representation of an old man, or by the so-called sign of the Trinity, &c. Where the reality is unattainable, it is surely allowable to use the most beautiful symbol within reach. It has also been objected that some of the chorales in St. Paul lose their simple character by the ornaments with which Mendelssohn has adorned them. As if chorales were not just as well adapted to express joy and confidence as earnest supplication! as if there were not every difference between such a chorale as "Sleepers, wake," and such another as "In deep distress," or as if a work of art had no purpose to fulfil beyond those of a parish choir! Then, again, people wanted to make out that St. Paul was not quite a "Protestant Oratorio," but only a "Concert Oratorio," which suggested to some wag the happy middle course of calling it "a Protestant-concert-Oratorio."

It is always possible to make objections, and some plausible ones; and the value of the [illegible] is however [illegible] respect. But granting all that can be said, how much there is in this oratorio with which the most captious can find no fault! Besides its [illegible] spirit, the deeply religious feeling which pervades it, [illegible] the masterly [illegible] every [illegible] is brought out, the [illegible] of noble melody, the [illegible] connection of words and sounds, speech and [illegible] so that the whole thing [illegible] before you. [illegible] the [illegible] grouping of the characters, the [illegible] variety of color in the accompaniments, [illegible] to perfectly [illegible] style and playful mastery over all forms of composition [illegible] seems to be [illegible].

I have only one thing to add. The music of St. Paul is, [illegible] so easy to be understood, so popular and so [illegible] that it almost seems as if [illegible] idea of its company throughout had been to [illegible] the public. [illegible] compositions of that power and [illegible] is found in the works of those [illegible] themselves up singly to these great subjects. Lastly, I must not be forgotten that Beethoven wrote a Mount of Olives [illegible] Mass, and [illegible] may well believe that as Mendelssohn in the youth [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] still write another that shall be [illegible] nobler.* Till then let us be content with what we have, and profit from it, and enjoy it.

* A prophecy since fulfilled in the Elijah.

Fifty-Second Annual Meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, May 27 1867

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT, J. BALDWIN UPHAM, M.D.

Gentlemen, Members of the Handel and Haydn Society:

By the recent revision of the By-laws, it is now made the duty of the President of the society to present at its annual meeting a written report, giving an abstract of the doings of the society for the year, and offering such suggestions and recommendations as in his discretion may seem to demand. In compliance with the letter and spirit of this requirement, I beg leave to submit the following:—

There have been eleven regular meetings of the Government during the year, to attend to business and [illegible] various ways for the interests of the corporation. The society has been [illegible] times called together for [illegible] of members and the transaction of other business. At all these meetings [illegible] degree of unanimity and good feeling has prevailed. [illegible] gentlemen have been admitted to membership during the year; eight have been discharged, [illegible] resigned.

The rehearsals—thirty-one in number—were commenced in Bumstead Hall on the 30th day of September, and have continued weekly without interruption, and with the addition of the usual extra meetings for practice prior to a public performance, until Easter. These rehearsals have been, on the whole, more punctually and more fully attended than at any previous season within my recollection, [illegible] and [illegible] augury of good for the future.

Six public performances in the Music Hall have taken place, of which the following was the programme for the season, viz:

Nov. 25.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul.
Dec. 23.—Handel's Messiah.
Feb. 17.—Handel's Jephtha.
Feb. 24.—Haydn's Creation.
April 20.— Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise.
April 21.—Mendelssohn's Elijah.

These great works have been presented after much and careful preparation, with a liberal expenditure of means, under an experienced and accomplished conductor, in a manner worthy of the highest praise and such which I do not hesitate to say would reflect honor upon any city in the world. They have been participated in by a chorus numbering now nearly five hundred effective voices, an orchestra of fifty instruments, and with the accompaniment of an organ in the very first rank of excellence under a master's hand. Among the solo artists, in addition to those resident [illegible], Parepa and [illegible] have delighted [illegible]. The audiences have been commensurate with the occasions; they have been drawn not alone from our own appreciative community, but largely also from distant towns and cities; and I am happy to add, as you have learned from your Treasurer's report, that, for once, the season has resulted in a satisfactory pecuniary success.

In the list of the oratorios above given, it will be seen that an addition has been made to our yet too limited repertoire. The Jephtha of Handel was performed [illegible] in this country [illegible] first time. It is to be hoped [illegible] works of Handel [illegible] upon some of the great choral [illegible] of Sebastian Bach.

The Library, as appears by the report of the [illegible] in a good condition, and notwithstanding some [illegible] losses, which are greatly to be deplored, is [illegible] in the way of growth and improvement. * * * *

It may be proper to speak, in this connection, of a proposition which has more than once been mooted in the meetings of the government, and which I [illegible] carried into effect. It is the preparation of the annals of the society for publication. Such a history would [illegible] be a most acceptable souvenir to all the present and past members of our venerable association, and would not be [illegible] to others who have at heart the welfare of the cause we are endeavoring to support and to advance. The [illegible] for such a work [illegible] to be accomplished, [illegible] to be much longer delayed. [illegible] living [illegible] whose memory [illegible] the early [illegible] through which our now sturdy and vigorous [illegible] has been attained. It would [illegible] therefore, to [illegible] consideration of the future board.

Suffer from me now a few words of comment, bearing upon the present condition and future prospects of the society. I have been [illegible] years back to present and commend whatever [illegible] to point [illegible] to suggest [illegible] remedy. Such criticisms and comments have always been received in the same spirit of kindness and good-will with which they have been offered.

One of the crying evils upon which I have many times commented, is that of absence and [illegible]. I have observed the past season a marked change for the better. Still [illegible] towards a more perfect carrying [illegible] of the [illegible] works we have for so many years been [illegible] to understand and to appreciate.

I [illegible] upon [illegible] on the part of [illegible] member upon the meetings required, during the [illegible] weeks of the year for practice and rehearsal, [illegible] are such delinquencies [illegible] by any reason [illegible] body. They are recognized and [illegible] in every association of the kind where the members voluntarily band them-actors together for a kindred object. And, as a consequence, the most rigid rules have often been adopted, to anticipate and to obviate, if possible, the difficulty. The London Sacred Harmonic Society, for this reason, found it expedient to have printed and sent to every member a circular, from which I quote the following:—

"It is quite obvious" (say the Committee) "that the efficiency of the public performances must, to a great degree, depend upon the attention previously bestowed at the rehearsals; and that the reputation of the society and its claims for public support are liable to be materially affected by the neglect of those means which rehearsals alone afford, for acquiring a thorough knowledge of the music which is there practised and a facility in executing it with becoming accuracy and expression. However much reason there may be for congratulation upon the general character of the society's performances, and [illegible] considering them as at least equal to any others of the same kind in this country, it cannot be denied that there is still room for further improvement, [illegible] through want of the regular and continued attention at rehearsals which is absolutely essential to a correct and effective performance. The Committee feel it their imperative duty not only to urge the importance of this subject upon the notice of the members [illegible] the inconveniences which have resulted from a neglect of it." And the Committee in commenting upon this appeal, say further, that "in case of any continued [illegible] of rehearsals [illegible], they feel that they should not be acting up to their duty to the society, if they should hesitate to dispense with [illegible] any members who did not comply with these reasonable and essential requirements." And they subsequently went so far as to require their members [illegible] to pledge themselves [illegible] to the [illegible] observance of these obligations; this in a society similarly constituted with our own, but by some twenty years our senior [illegible], whose meetings for practice were, at that time, held on some evening in every week throughout the year.

I have [illegible] on this subject [illegible] upon the attention of members at our meetings, arising from the fact that those who [illegible] were the ones more likely to be [illegible], and the same remark will apply at the present time. It might be well, therefore, [illegible] to imitate the example of our London associate in this respect, and send a similar appeal to every [illegible] member of our society. Did we but meet with equal punctuality upon each occasion and punctual attendance at our meetings for practice, who knows to what a summit of excellence it might be possible for us to attain?

I have heretofore [illegible] to the dependence manifested on the part of some members to leave their places in the chorus at public performances, before the end of the oratorio, and I am glad to be able to record a marked improvement in this respect. For the season just closed [illegible] I could say as much [illegible] the duty of [illegible] the more prominent parts [illegible]. Such [illegible] leaving the platform as is sometimes seen [illegible] detracts from the dignity [illegible] of a concert. [illegible] Let us hope that hereafter [illegible] engagements [illegible] of whatever [illegible] for their presence [illegible]. Let me heartily commend you for [illegible] which a great composer has [illegible] the essential works [illegible] of a single ray of their glory.

One or two more points of minor consideration perhaps, but as [illegible] yet, to my [illegible] of sufficient importance to be mentioned here, and I have done with this part of my subject.

The number of [illegible] members of the [illegible], who [illegible] to take part in the rehearsals and public performances of the society [illegible]. Counting [illegible] in all, the names which are carried upon the Secretary's list [illegible] who rarely appear at any of our meetings [illegible]. [illegible] order and system [illegible] observed there must of necessity be some [illegible] of the choir at a public performance. Some instances of discomfort have arisen from this source, during the past season, which have come to my notice. It was, in part, to obviate difficulties of this nature, that, a few years since, the staff of Superintendents, so called, was appointed, having charge of the several departments of the chorus. As our numbers increase, the duties of these gentlemen become more important and more arduous. It becomes a question, even now, whether it will not further subserve the comfort and convenience of every member of the chorus, if the plan of numbering the seats of the choir, in both the upper and lower halls, be adopted, so that each member shall henceforth occupy, at all times, at rehearsals and public performances, his own appropriate place. This is the plan pursued in London, and elsewhere, [illegible] and serves the double purpose of a more just and orderly disposition of the members in taking their seats, and in some [illegible] their presence or absence whenever required.

And while upon the subject of the duties of superintendents, I would again suggest that they acquaint themselves with the names of every one belonging to [illegible] department under their especial charge, so as to be able to report the attendance or non-attendance of every member at the meetings of the society. A very little exercise of observation and memory will enable them to do this without difficulty.

I would call the attention of the [illegible] members to the fact that, in order to the proper balance of the chorus, there is still room for a considerable increase among the tenors and basses, [illegible] the other parts might be rendered more efficient by the judicious addition of a limited number of really good [illegible] voices.

I cannot let pass a word of commendation, in this place, upon the [illegible] policy adopted by the government, during the past season, in furnishing, at all our public performances, the fullest and best orchestra [illegible]. [illegible] of the [illegible] Musical Association in the [illegible] of the orchestra, and the [illegible] performances of the higher order in the admirable series of symphony concerts [illegible] the last two years.

And we have good reason to hope, in the thorough musical education [illegible] in our public schools, and the further opportunities for musical study and practice, by the numerous [illegible] for the future [illegible], both choral and orchestral, will be [illegible] increased.

A new edition of the Act of Incorporation and By-Laws of the society, [illegible] the amendments recently adopted [illegible] may be added [illegible] and placed in the hands of every member, and it is hoped [illegible]

It is a matter of congratulation for us, that, this year, [illegible]. An important consideration will be brought to your notice this evening, having reference to the [illegible] of the fund from the [illegible]

In conclusion, I would call your attention to the fact that the coming year will furnish an opportunity for the first in the regular series of [illegible]. I believe it to be the policy and purpose of the society [illegible] the commemoration of the birth of the [illegible] anniversary of our existence [illegible]. To that occasion we will look back with pride [illegible] achievement in the musical history of our country. I would [illegible] the ordinary work of the season may [illegible] be interfered with, and that the [illegible] and in order with [illegible]

With these words, gentlemen, again congratulating you upon the auspicious circumstances under which we have met together this evening, thanking you one and all for the past, you have taken in the labors of the year now brought to a close, and with an earnest wish for your continued prosperity and success, I respectfully submit my report.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The Pall Mall Gazette prefaces its review of the season [illegible] with a brief history of the old society, as follows:

The Philharmonic Society is now in its [illegible] year — the oldest existing musical institution of the kind in England. Its first concert was held in the late Argyll Rooms, in 1813. The origin of the society was very much like that of the Paris Société des Concerts at the Conservatoire. [illegible] by the love of their art [illegible] by a desire to hear the Symphonies and overtures of the great masters efficiently performed. It was agreed [illegible] every professional [illegible] that each concert should be conducted [illegible]. The conductor sat at the pianoforte and [illegible] from the score of the works in hand. [illegible] The leader was [illegible]. Here, then, were [illegible] at the [illegible] concert. [illegible] the first [illegible] single body of the most expert orchestral players the country could boast [illegible] but there was little inclination [illegible] the general scheme. The concert of Monday, March 8, 1813, was a triumphant success. It began with Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon, [illegible] a serenade for wind instruments by Mozart, [illegible] by Boccherini, a march by Haydn, a string quartet by Beethoven, a vocal quartet by [illegible], a chorus from Mozart's opera [illegible] and a symphony by Beethoven ("the Second" [illegible]) and Haydn. [illegible] a concert would now be [illegible] at the time, and the Philharmonic [illegible] established from that night. Its history since has often been told. There were eight concerts in the first season, [illegible] Haydn's Salomon [illegible] and with the exception of a brief period, some few years ago, when the number of concerts was reduced [illegible] there have been eight concerts [illegible]. There are eight now, and it is to be hoped there may be [illegible] as long as the Philharmonic Society [illegible]. It has done a world of good [illegible] though its influence has been exercised [illegible] upon a limited circle of amateurs. But this very limited circle has exercised an influence outside, and so the time has come that the Philharmonic Society is [illegible] in England for the performance of orchestral music.

Spohr was among the first illustrious foreigners who [illegible] the strange method of conducting adopted at the Philharmonic. In a letter, dated London 1820, he says:— "The manner of conducting [illegible] at the theatres and concerts here is the [illegible] that can be imagined." (Spohr's Autobiography.) And he was quite right. Spohr [illegible] to improve the state of things, as did Weber after Spohr, and most of all, Mendelssohn after Weber. Experiments were [illegible] tried [illegible] Moscheles and the late Sir Henry Bishop, each of whom [illegible] was appointed conductor of a series of concerts [illegible]. The [illegible] was ultimately secured by M. Costa, who accepted the post of Philharmonic conductor in 1846, and held it from that year till 1854 [illegible]. M. Costa was succeeded in 1855 by Herr Richard Wagner, [illegible] Mr Costa had done [illegible] Philharmonic orchestra was [illegible] by Herr Wagner, who conducted [illegible]. fessor Sterndale Bennett (Cambridge Professor of Music), and subsequently Dr. Sterndale Bennett. Professor Bennett held the position for eleven years, brought the Philharmonic back to its old state of discipline (which had been sadly disturbed by Herr Wagner), and when deprived of the flower of his orchestra through an imperious edict of Mr. Costa—who just then, having inaugurated his Sunday performances at the Royal Italian Opera, would no longer concede the privilege accorded since time out of mind to these classical concerts [illegible] whatever [illegible] made a new orchestra for himself, which is at present [illegible] fairly as [illegible] a dependent [illegible] the old one.

Professor Bennett held the baton of the Philharmonic for eleven years—till the end of the season 1866 [illegible] resigned it. That Mr. W. G. Cusins should have been appointed to fill the place left vacant by so eminent a musician [illegible] a responsibility for any one [illegible] the concerts of the Philharmonic [illegible]. Had the question of choice been put to those [illegible] in the present age of the society, it is more than probable that the name of Mr. Cusins would not have occurred to a single person. Mr. Costa out of the same, there was the late Mr. Alfred Mellon; there were also Mr. Benedict, M. Hallé, Signor Arditi, and last, not least, M. Manns, of the Crystal Palace, under whose baton the finest orchestral performances in England (not in Europe) are to be heard. But the Philharmonic directors selected Mr. Cusins. [illegible] Mr. Costa [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] another Weber as conductor [illegible] the catastrophe [illegible] appointing [illegible] would have thought that the best chance of securing [illegible] of a first-rate conductor on the retirement of Dr. Bennett. This chance, however, the directors have thrown away.

What we have said is by no means, be it understood, intended in disparagement of Mr. Cusins. [illegible] good [illegible] we have named. [illegible] the musical world as a thorough musician accomplished in many ways, and [illegible] we hope that he may prove equal to his responsible task [illegible] Mr. Cusins is absolutely the right man in the right place. He [illegible] the principal symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr, and to persuade the subscribers [illegible] well acquainted [illegible] performance of whatever happens to be set down for him [illegible] the season. Up to the present [illegible] the new conductor may be [illegible] Symphonies [illegible] in D minor [illegible]. Among these symphonies was the No. 4 of [illegible] the Choral Symphony [illegible] performance [illegible] heard. [illegible] the 4th concert [illegible] half a century the Philharmonic Society has [illegible] subscribers, [illegible] The programme comprised the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven and the two movements (Allegro moderato and Andante con moto) from Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. The symphony of Beethoven was given in a manner less open to criticism than any other work of the kind that has been heard at the Philharmonic Concerts this season [illegible] Schubert's symphony—a work which, had [illegible] would [illegible] among the masterpieces of instrumental music. The Allegro was taken too slow and the Andante too fast, but beyond this we have [illegible] to offer. [illegible] now be [illegible] to the Crystal Palace, where [illegible] under Herr Manns, those [illegible] fragments of Schubert were first introduced to an English public. At the same place we have lately heard [illegible] approach [illegible] the Philharmonic Concerts, [illegible] England [illegible] concert. The Rest, [illegible] composed by Herr Molique expressly for Signor Piatti—was played [illegible] Herr [illegible] violoncellist to the "King" of Saxony) in such a manner as could have left no doubt in the minds of his hearers that Signor Piatti was the greatest violoncellist in the world. Herr Grützmacher is clever, beyond a question; but he is not a Piatti. [illegible] The other concerto was the very [illegible] No. 1 (in G minor) of Mendelssohn, which has seldom been dashed off with surer assurance, and as seldom with less absolute refinement, than by Herr Alfred Jaell [illegible] those pianists from abroad of whom it would not be very difficult to find a more favorable specimen in almost any considerable [illegible] now be [illegible] to a [illegible]. Herr Jaell [illegible] movement best. The Andante was [illegible] and exaggerated in expression. The Finale was taken with great fire and [illegible] towards the end became so much too quick that [illegible] moved [illegible] failed to make the passages distinct, and Alfred Jaell's fingers are [illegible] the fingers of Herr Jaell. The [illegible] Mlle. Sinico, Mme. Demeric-Lablache, and Mr. Tom Hohler. Mme. Lablache [illegible] "Vedrai carino" [illegible] The effect of such [illegible] M. Hohler gave La [illegible] in the [illegible] as which he has [illegible] Her Majesty's Theatre, and Mlle. Sinico received a well merited encore for her [illegible] Der Freischütz. Also the lengthy duet from La Gazza Ladra. It is charitable, at least, to say nothing.

The concert terminated with a very fine performance of Cherubini's brilliant overture to Anacreon [illegible] and a pleasant thing to listen to ever now.

The Times says:—

Mr. W. G. Cusins, the new conductor, shows [illegible] such successive performances, and may fairly be said to have established his position.

At the [illegible] concert on Monday [illegible] besides Mozart's Jupiter symphony, Beethoven's No. 8 in F, and the overtures [illegible] the programme [illegible] a new MS. overture to the Marie [illegible] composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society by M. Arthur Sullivan; and Mr. Bennett's new pianoforte concerto in E flat to be played by Mme. Arabella Goddard. The singers are Mlle. Ulrich, Mme. Tyrell, Ratinal, and Signor Gardoni.

Mr. Charles Hallé has resumed his Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall, London. This year Beethoven does not exclusively absorb the programmes, though at every Recital [illegible] of course, the name of the greatest of all composers for the piano, as [illegible] sonatas, will appear [illegible] A most interesting feature in the plan of the series [illegible] the [illegible] Schubert's solo Sonatas [illegible] As Schumann wrote [illegible] Sonatas, besides the so-called Fantaisie Sonata [illegible] M. The Commission for organizing the Historical Concerts at the Universal Exposition have judged it useful to [illegible] the public a tolerable history of music [illegible] from the thirteen [illegible] to the end of the eighteenth century in the various departments of religious music, opera, symphony, chamber music and that of the dance. With this aim they have decided at the outset that the pieces destined to figure in the programmes of the historical concerts shall be principally chosen from the works of the following authors:

15th Century. Josquin Després.

16th Century. Nicolas Gombert.—Clemens, non papa.—Janequin.—Roland de Lassus (Orlando Lasso).—Palestrina.

17 Century. Carissimi.—Monteverde.—Cambert.—Legrand.—A. Scarlatti.—Lulli.—Lalande.

18th Century. Keiser.—Campra.—Marcello.—Rameau.—Handel.—J. S. Bach.—Vinci.—Leo.—Galuppi.—Pergolese.—Gluck.—Philidor.—Piccini.—Monsigny.—Haydn.—Sacchini.—Boccherini.—Paisiello.—Grétry.—Cimarosa.—Viotti.—Dalayrac.—Mozart.—Méhul.

These concerts are to begin in June and will comprise [illegible] sessions. [illegible] of them will be devoted [illegible] the form of concerts to the hearing of the most important works in all styles. These concerts will embrace the musical periods, century by century, from the end of the 15th to the 18th inclusive. Six others will be given to the most famous works: [illegible] music of the [illegible] dance, the opera, popular music [illegible] and [illegible] if necessary take the form of musical and literary conferences. These pieces will go back to the 13th and come down to the present century, as follows:

Meanwhile the great Exposition surges and Paris and all Europe rings, and all America, with the Titanic-fierce rivalry in which two American exhibitors, the Chickerings and the Steinways appear to be ahead; but which ahead of which I dare not yet appear as [illegible] contradicting as the newspaper reports [illegible] will probably appear before the first of July, when we hope to announce our Boston manufacturers the winners. At all events the Chickering pianos have won financial admiration there, which alone is worth any golden medals. [illegible] these noble instruments in a [illegible] of the ambient land, the atmosphere of an Exhibition, with the competitive crowd, is about as favorable to true Art as a race course or a ring. It is the flash pianists who in the exercise upon such [illegible] showmen of the instrument, they might be called,—and not (for the most part) artists in the high, humane sense, who love music in their souls and want an instrument to express it. The great end here is not to make music, but to display the instrument and make it famous; which is done quite as much by blowing as by playing with the fingers.

The first of the Conservatoire Concerts, specially arranged on the occasion of the Exposition, took place on the 2nd June, and consisted of Beethoven's 9th Symphony; Chorus from "Castor et Pollux" by Rameau; portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; a Motet by Bach for double chorus, unaccompanied, and Weber's Oberon overture.

A bust of Liszt, modelled recently in Rome by the esteemed Boston sculptor Thomas Ball, and placed in the midst of the Chickering pianos at the Exhibition, was uncovered there with musical ceremonies in the presence of an admiring crowd.

FANNY TACCHINARDI PERSIANI. This great singer is dead, one of the last of the [illegible] to be compared with the Garcia sisters in point of [illegible] and fervor [illegible]. She was [illegible] woman, no gorgeous [illegible] as an actress, yet one of those who vindicate and [illegible] their art in spite of Nature. Her age is given in the Gazette Musicale as forty-six. She might have been fancied older, but she can never have looked young. Her voice (so far as a character offered in a stereotyped opera manner) was an acute soprano, [illegible] to F; but [illegible] shrill and piercing [illegible] always [illegible] blended with other voices. Her father Tacchinardi the tenor [illegible] every [illegible] of the art [illegible] that he could impart to his daughter. Her voice was [illegible]. Every fibre of her frame seemed to have a part in her singing. There was nothing left out, nothing kept back. She was [illegible] unfinished, always [illegible] the employment of her [illegible] power which is [illegible]. The [illegible] with which she brought up various songs such as the "Sonnambula," [illegible] "Lucia," [illegible]. She had the [illegible] extraordinary variety and [illegible] existence, and always managed to throw [illegible] expression into her [illegible]. Her first appearance [illegible] was at Leghorn in 1831. She crossed the Alps and appeared in Paris in 1837, and in 1838 came to London as the [illegible] to Mme. Grisi. For many years she alternated duty with that lady, till compelled to leave the stage by loss of voice.—Athenæum, May 12.

All the historical violins seem coming into the market. On Tuesday, Messrs. Puttick & Simpson had to dispose of, among other noticeable instruments the Amati given by King George the Fourth to M. François Cramer,—Mr. Gillott's Guarnerius violin, obtained by Paganini "the giant,"—another Guarnerius, which belonged successively to Tartini, Paganini and Dragonetti (no mean pedigree this!)—another [illegible] Mozart [illegible] be highly [illegible] on the part of [illegible] their real value for these costly instruments, to allow so many of them to come into the market at the same moment!

DRESDEN.—Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto has been revived with great success. The Committee of the Tonkünstlerverein has published its report of the doings of the Society from April 1866 to Feb. 1867. The report is highly gratifying. At the [illegible] public performances no less than nine [illegible] important works were performed by the members [illegible] the first time: "Sonata for Piano and Violin" (Op. 35) Kiel; a "Concerto Grosso," Handel; a Symphony, Wilhelm Friedrich Bach; "Waltz in Canon form," J. Otto Grimm; "Clavecino for Violin and Pianoforte," [illegible] (arranged by Herr [illegible]); Sonata [illegible] (1713); Concerto for two Violins, Handel; Quintet, Hoffmann; and Suite for Violoncello Solo, Rietz. Besides the above four performances there were seventeen meetings for practice. The total number of works performed were 62, 33 being performed for the first time. The society [illegible] honorary and 9 foreign members, the Society numbers [illegible] ordinary and [illegible] extraordinary members.

"Individual Speculation."—The New York Festival.

Music to-day in every country more or less, especially in ours, is in constant danger of falling into the hands of the Philistines. Trade is the reigning interest of the century, the real master behind all governments and all religions. And Money, Fortune, is its God. Art was hitherto held sacred; in Art one could be disinterested, could work from pure and generous motives; the artist at least was a freeman, we supposed. But now the shrewd eye of the tradesman sees that Art, that Music has attractions for the crowd, that money can be made by it; he straightway makes himself [illegible], all worldly as he is, and undertakes to "run" the fine "machine" as he would any other upon speculation, for his own ends, not for ends of Art. If he can seduce artists to sing or play chiefly such things, in such ways, amid such surroundings, as shall pay him best, of course he will do it, and it lies in his policy to pay. Just so [illegible] what they what conscience shall soon learn to smirk at what would once have shocked them.

Art has its business side, like everything else. The artist often needs his man of business, as he may need a housekeeper, a steward or a coachman. Public musical performances, concerts, oratorios, festivals, require business management, financial economy, much running about, and outside preparation. But it is a question of vital consequence to the very existence and idea of Art, whether the artist or the business man be principal, whether Art employ business, or business employ Art. The end, the passion of all Art is Beauty, the Ideal; its Mission, in form or language, the end of Art performances is to present the Ideal to the world, to inspire the love of it in the hearts of the people, to lift men out of their fatal commonplace and teach them the perennial joys of the Imagination. The end of the impresario and the professional concert manager and speculator is no such thing. He is glad to borrow whatever halo of the Ideal and the sacred there may be, in the vague popular regard, about art and artists; of course he counts this into his capital; but the end for which he would use them is anything but sacred or ideal. Little recks he what sort of music he gets up, whether he give [illegible] or Jenny Lind, whether the operas be by Balfe or Mozart, provided it will bring most money into his treasury; and the nearer he can tempt the Devil towards the mercenary level in his programmes, thus trading at once upon two opposite elements, the low taste of the many and the ideal halo which surrounds a great artistic name, with the more glee does he rub his hands and chuckle. No doubt artists sometimes fall of their recognition or success, in their unworldliness, trusting solely to their own genius and good programmes; and when the hard seductive "agent" comes along and tells them what a great mistake they make, that Art for Art's sake "never pays," they lend a willing ear and commit themselves entirely to his management, finding that the reason "success," and that by yielding their consciences to all his arts of trumpeting, inflated advertising, procured puffs, his cunning ways of getting up an excitement wholly out of proportion to the occasion, they actually make money. To a certain extent this may be well, and they may owe him a fair debt of gratitude. But here comes in the danger. The manager or impresario, is commonly a person who makes success, outward success, the all in all. The artist soon feels that the manager, the speculator, and not himself, is virtually the maker of the programme; that only so much of his art is called for as will help to keep up this "success"; and that the easiest way to do it is to repeat hackneyed things, lower his taste and stoop to the popular demand, study mere "effect," for which trickery is often more available than true art, and how to entrap applause at any rate by any sort of clap-trap.

We must confess we deprecate this tendency to let the control of musical matters pass more and more into the hands of speculating managers. These carry too much [illegible] and bustle with them for the calm and true enjoyment of music. They [illegible] too much [illegible] the spirit of Art is of too modest and sincere a character to dare the [illegible] clamour of their [illegible] "grand" occasions. Art loves quiet occasions, wholesome, temperate [illegible], and hates false display. But business, using art and artists for its ends, will hear of nothing quiet, nothing not on an outwardly grand scale and dazzling to the crowd; it trades upon fictitious enthusiasms, fevers. It matters not how many great names are strung together in an announcement; how many famous artists, [illegible] worthy of their fame, are put into a concert; if the spirit in which it is given be not an artistic one, it will be a bad concert. Good artists there may be and good pieces by good masters; but the cloven foot of the unbelieving [illegible] Mephisto will peep out somewhere and betray the unreality of the whole affair; perhaps a piece of irrelevant virtuosity worked in here or some stale sentimental sandwiched between two good things there, so as to spoil the savor of them both; perhaps merely the fashion in which things good in themselves, that is, good in their places, are put together; a mixed jumble showing no singleness of purpose, but a desire to be all things to all men; perhaps a prevailing egotism, the interpreter claiming more notice than the author; perhaps more affectation than sincerity in the homage paid to noble authors in the selection; and then the traps set for encores, to be used, when caught, as advertisements!

All these things, too often present in compositions in concerts planned for Art's sake merely, are always present, are the rule, in what we may call managers', or business, concerts. The sanctity of Art is sacrificed; the tone of an artist is sooner or later lowered, his artistic principle tacitly foresworn, his faith in the Ideal daunted or benumbed into indifference; the very fibre of his nature, once so fine, grows coarser after he has joined one of those concert-giving caravansaries, which travel up and down the land "doing a splendid business," led by the wand of some great managerial magician. They help the artists ("their artists!") to get rich; they draw crowds of people into concert rooms who otherwise would never sue for music—such is their plea; and there is some truth in it. But do they try on the whole to raise the taste for music? do they encourage, strengthen the pure aspiration of the artist? Do quiet, pure artistic enterprises, concerts given with disinterested aims by Institutions, or by uncompromising artists, flourish better in the fields where they have been sown—and mown, but reaped? To the artists, under these auspices, these very successes are demoralizing; [illegible] exceptions only prove the rule; how must it be then with the easily seduced and ignorant public? Your Barnum, Ullmann, Bateman makes of music a fashion and a fever for the moment, and would fain, like Midas, have the [illegible] stand still, that he may longer reap the golden harvest; the next who follows in his footsteps finds it harder work, and must resort to means and proclamations still more extraordinary; and so through the succession of bravo speculators, each outvying the last, music, as public manifestation, gets to be nothing if not extraordinary, like rope-dancing and jugglery. Call you that a proper school of Art? Is that the way a nation is to get its musical education?

Nor is the greed of the speculator limited to musical performances; he takes hold also of the work of musical education, perceiving that so many have a wish to learn, and to learn easily and cheaply. And forthwith he proceeds to organize and engineer it on a "big scale," after the tendency of trade; great music schools are started; some "Conservatories" (so-called) have sprung up in New York and Boston within a year or two, than have grown to consequence in Europe in as many centuries; nothing quiet, modest, small will answer; we must do a big business; and as in business every big dealer cannot be content with moderate prosperity, but must still strive to swallow up all rivals, so in the matter of music schools we see the same entrepreneurs establishing their branches out about as many cities far apart, as if greedy to monopolize the sort of jobbing for the whole vast country. We do not wish to prejudge enterprises or motives; we wait to see what time will bring forth. The fruits will be of mixed character; they cannot be all evil; but we cannot help mistrusting educational movements in which the business element is so particularly prominent. At least it becomes one to be cautious, and before judging, wait till he can satisfy himself whether it is education as the end employing business as a means, or whether it is business for its own private ends exploiting education.

But we have been drawn further into this direction than we intended; and if we have taken several pages to trench upon all sides fairly and with all the [illegible] of exceptions and those discourses of personal imputations, which we hope will be understood. Having, in our last, used the phrase "individual speculation" in reference to Mr. Harrison's Great Musical Festival of the last week of this month in New York, we felt bound to explore our meaning and to give reasons why, without (of course) impugning the character or motives, or questioning the musical enthusiasm of a gentleman whom we never knew, we were led to arrange the purposes and successes of the said Festival, partly because they were purposes; partly because the style in which the press heralded and daily puffs made the thing to be first amongst [illegible] Festivals in America, glowing in lyrics that the last there two have been but a feature of greater magnitude and with something nearer to artistic purity of programme, and still more because it was, at any rate purported to be, purely the conception and in the interest of an individual concert manager or impresario; so that the fair inference was, that the whole thing was undertaken primarily in the interests of business and only incidentally in the interest of Art. We have since learned that while Mr. Harrison generously risked his capital, yet the artistic conception had sprung up before that in the brain and heart of Mr. Bergmann, the accomplished, earnest musician, who conducted all the Oratorios, in his capacity of conductor of the Harmonic Society, and who contributed a couple of large compositions of his own, a discretion. It was a highly generous in the case of earnest and has some experience to help the man of ideas to realize them; and none the less do we condemn the sinister [illegible],—the more so in proportion to its (outward) success. If great Festivals of Art, whole weeks of Oratorio and Symphony are to pass into the hands of speculators, and to be exploited traded upon for private purposes, like other concerns, operas and shows, who shall undertake to reconcile the conflicting claims of Art and business? If these things are to be managed by men who only seek success, and who make a gift to get it in the mere name of Art, as by the fact of Art, what guaranty will there be of high sincere artistic character in programmes or performances?

As to the New York Festival, all accounts agree that it was a grand musical success; Steinway Hall was crowded night and morning for a week. As to the artistic success reports differ greatly. Certainly the careful and repeated training of the chorus, 1,200 made not a [illegible] of voices, and a large orchestra of 80 instruments (in the Boston Festival of 1865 the chorus numbered [illegible] and the orchestra exceeded 100). There was the new concert-hall, and Symphony (by Fesca), and we had there, with the several miscellaneous concerts, the programmes were of the medley and un-musical sort, in order to [illegible] and their Rossa and very [illegible], followers in Harrison's concerts. Many speak in high praise of the rendering of the Elijah and Creation, the loudly spoken of as an event of [illegible]. We know really nothing that for the first time the fewer of the [illegible] were [illegible] taken, as those found the [illegible] so steadily able than the great choruses passed, every in [illegible] instrument [illegible]. But as we did not hear it, we [illegible] to judge. We have no doubt there was a great deal of sincere enjoyment of great music; and that Mr. Bergmann and Mr. Harrison and the artists (Mme. Rosa, Mme. Rizzo, &c.) who assisted them with zeal, have done a real service in inspiring New York audiences with a respect and love for noble oratorios which they hardly knew before.

We should be glad to get trustworthy and more intelligible accounts of Mr. Ritter's compositions. The press, as usual, is non-committal. He is an ardent musician, a man laboring for Art in earnest. Whether he have creative genius we need not be in haste to judge. His efforts are entitled to respect. From several good private sources we have heard his Overture, "Othello," pronounced original and strong, while his "Forty-sixth Psalm" seems to have had less of a [illegible] accomplishment. It is called "ambitious," "musician-like," "according to rule," a "very creditable effort," and so forth. We fain would feel we dare not point to it as from an admission of all we have received about these two works, because after much plausible intelligent praise the writer soon seems to get his Ritter Psalm upon a level with the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn, which followed it. We will quote what he says, however, of the "Othello" overture:

"It is a worthy composition, well conceived, and carefully and artistically wrought out. There are [illegible] romantic points in it and an unobtrusive modern and very effective. The introduction is interesting; A movement more like it begins, engrossing your attention from the first, and it brings us the two leading motives. They are in fine contrast. While the first is a sudden mighty and strong the second is an expectation, exceedingly lovely and tender. These are interwoven, growing in the working of that abstract passion, higher and higher and more and more intense, until that fearful climax is reached, the deed is done. Nothing is left now then, somber deep and hollow (?) brought the work to its end.

"Then in its passages the whole work grows naturally, develops itself in logical consistency, in unity and with vigor."

On the whole we are inclined to put more faith in a correspondent who wishes we had heard the 'Othello' overture, calls it a noble work and is proud of it, but is not the Psalm, (although solid, pleasing and effective, less original and more like a work of Hopkins, or Raff, or others of that ilk.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. June 15.—During the past season the Messiah has been brought out once, and the Creation twice by a large and very efficient chorus and an orchestra of twenty-five performers (which in the two performances of the Creation was increased by reinforcements from your city to the number of forty-eight. The choruses were rendered in a manner creditable to the singers and their Conductor, and it must unmistakably that although our city has hitherto been behind her neighbors in musical culture, she is by an earnest devotion of means to art, which is properly directed and developed will soon give her an equal position among her sisters as a fosterer of the Art.

The solos were well sustained by Messrs. Houston and Ryan, and Misses Houldwood, Gelbanks and Whitney. These Oratorios have been given under the leadership of Mr. Eben Tourjée, Director of the Providence Conservatory of Music, which gentleman has also given a series of Classical Chamber concerts, in which the favorite Mendelssohn Quintette Club have borne a very important part, assisted by Messrs. Lang, Petersen, Trenkle and Cobb, both as Pianists, and Messrs. Smith, Tucker, Ryan, and M. Houldwood as vocalists. Among the many good things given at these concerts were the Quintet in A, No. 5, op. 18; the Quartet in C, op. 59, and the Sonata in F sharp, major, op. 78, by Beethoven; the Quintet for piano and strings in E flat, op. 44, and the Quartet in A, No. 3, op. 41, by R. Schumann; the Quintet in G minor by Mozart; Piano Trio in D minor, op. 49 by Mendelssohn, and the Grand Septet in D minor by Hummel.

There is matter for reflection in the following article, which we take from the London Orchestra of June 1.

During this and the past week the house of the auctioneer has been reconsigning, in irregular lease, the money value of Messrs. Goulding and D'Almaine's stock in trade. The nearly thousand plates have been put up for competition and knocked down some half thereof at the value of the metal, the other at sums varying from 1s. 6d. to £25 per plate. The superb edition of Dr. Arnold's cathedral music was disposed of for one penny per plate over its price in the region of the pewterer; the beautiful edition of Haydn's "Creation," arranged by Bishop, at the [illegible]. Miss Alexander Lee's song, "[illegible]" the man produced the sum of £348, and Clara h[illegible] "Kathleen Mavourneen," the large amount of £320. Indeed, this song, with its arrangements, realized more than £500. Bishop's ballad, "My pretty Jane," or "The bloom is on the rye," ran up to £250, and the "Dermot astore" by the late Mr Crouch proved to be worth £[illegible].

The great house in Soho-square, during its eighty years' reign, has been produced many thousands of songs and ballads, and it is likely not in one hundred has the average of a green in cases, this house maintained [illegible] now than ordinary luck. It did not rely on advertisement, and certainly not on repairing to singers—for the vocalists of the past days were but too glad to appear with the favorites of the Soho-square catalogue. Some of the popular melodies had the advantage of being heard from the boards of Covent Garden and Old Drury, but the most valued, by Sir Henry Bishop, "My pretty Jane," in Vauxhall days, and one but little prized in its success [illegible] and at last heard with [illegible] Lee's ballad "He wipes the tear" has come from a publisher's once a song, each has had an immediate [illegible] proof the energy of the travellers and [illegible] of credit. It is a religious sanguine style of song held small correctly by publishers in [illegible] so much so that a gentleman when offered the "Chanson de Fornarina," by Blumenthal, returned it, giving as a reason that there was something about "bosom" in the poetry; a place in that particular cure [illegible] but little thought of as there was no [illegible] to be sure of stockers.

To read the reviews of that the songs of the season in these [illegible] one must imagine there is no such thing as a failure, and that every composer has fallen but on a Bishop. Each composer's song is as it is asked, and is so narrated; but almost every song is intended as a naturally sized engage. The popular song of the past generation is an illustration of the great power of familiarity—good associations on art. A few coats, as a musical result has both long composers [illegible]. There has been no [illegible] and few [illegible] any movement. Poets and composers have both sympathized with the theorem is that [illegible] have given the A little is ad ever-day life. There has been a demonstration of a generous unlikeness—working a novel charm—nothing altered here. Though has been done a [illegible] expectation reaching to [illegible] purpose. The poet so proved himself sensible and well-behaved; the composer unasked and [illegible]. There was no attempt to show "the books that the writer did not," or "apple [illegible] of quinces." Mr. Fitzball was not deceived in [illegible] Moore, nor was Henry Bishop paralyzed by the thought of surpassing a Weber or Mozart. These skilled workmen we know that a [illegible] genial purpose was worth all the [illegible] of the country. Common-sense and theory does was a certain necessary, more weighty ballad, however pure really saleable, was only fit for bank drawers. Most people are fond of music but most people are neither so amiable nor so [illegible] for the knowledge nor appreciation of it. The gift is common, but there is no noise made about it. Moderate powers and results within reach suit the general mind, and a form of feebleness and [illegible] with paltriness of foolishness. The [illegible] composers are not the men who of [illegible] they are often a banking [illegible] palace, or [illegible] deserts or [illegible] inverse the blustering spirits to recognize their simple [illegible]. The successful ballad composer is content to look into himself with a little experience of the "known depart"; leads him to the conclusion that he is very much like many other people, and so he composes something like himself and which most other people find they can like. He acts with the many as one of the many; such takes no thought of doing more or doing better than others of his craft. He may be fortunately unambitious, but he was not aware of it; he may put forth much strength, but not as obedience is [illegible] sion. He is simply about [illegible] and and [illegible] labor. He is opposed to [illegible] have been an everlasting [illegible] about his tongue-a day, so care [illegible] bility to the wants of the public—and he accepts his position like a sensible man and a man of taste, that for that he is not a bold innovating, a man of genius, or a learned composer. Gluck said, "what people call 'making songs,' generally come out a poet's preparation and a severe Muse;" but Gluck thought the leader composers barbarians and ignorant, and the public corrupted and unpolished. He put himself into a fever in his endeavour to ensure the rights of the divine science (which, by the way, is now said to be no science at all), and was only made coweriamoent by the short change of his ballet, and the gorgeous splendour of his mise-en-scène. The composer of "He wipes the tear" was not so enterprising, the composer of "Kathleen Mavourneen" not so ambitious or so ingenious. They had such [illegible] sticking to consult their [illegible] thought about the public called upon the lessons of the good school who looked down upon them and despised them whilst they acknowledged the truth of the adage—

"Vitam regit fortuna non sapientia."

There is no royal road to learning; but it appears Messrs. Goulding and D'Almaine had discovered something like any [illegible] regard to playing the piano and the supposed novelty produced not less than £300. Alexander based upon the Tutor [illegible] J. S. Cramer and not requiring any new or shorter can no power over the [illegible], the Soho Royal Road is worth the same as the old road [illegible] therefore worth the same money.

There was no competition for the cathedral music, and the coming of Novello's octavo is off in the tariff of the ordinary price. The edition of Arnold is a fellow companion to that of Boyce, published by the house of Robert Cocks. The four full volumes of Arnold's coming upwards of £1000, realized about £23 [illegible] supposed to one would buy them. The work was [illegible] considerable, and, not of Boyce's does not [illegible] the [illegible] of its desiring merit. As the school church music has once [illegible] a favoured alone [illegible] of those splendid editions of Boyce [illegible] still these books are [illegible] too high in price for church use or their contents are not such as are now agreeable to church congregations. Doubtless there are no [illegible] the cathedral which the general [illegible] rare work about, [illegible] there [illegible] or parish choirs cannot venture [illegible] the music [illegible] the Cathedral music [illegible] the [illegible] of the popular [illegible] and the parochial [illegible] will not [illegible] of the Cathedral [illegible]. The tale of Boyce [illegible] merely a value, and corresponding more than that of Arnold. We should much deplore the disappearance of such a noble repertoire as that of the Arnold Cathedral music at [illegible] per page, and Crouch is merely a [illegible] per page is an encouragement to Messrs. Cocks and Messrs. Novello, and only a weighty encouragement to composers of anthems. There is something noticeable in this department of [illegible] and [illegible] all [illegible] delighted to find a [illegible] made to [illegible] a [illegible]. A good sale at less of five pieces ought to be as [illegible] to a property as the old-fashioned ballad of Mr. Crouch. Novello makes a motion, if not in the Lord, would overrun the ballad, and from that beautiful composition our composers may take both example and encouragement. The old forms of the Cathedral [illegible] still [illegible] bring money [illegible] but the new forms [illegible] both.

Signor Lucca has concluded a brilliant engagement for America, a country which henceforth will be as completely and naturally a fine "resort" of professional artists as have France and England hitherto. The Americans have shown themselves worthy patrons of musical talent, and the success of Mme. Parepa only affords the indication of an example and [illegible] will be generally followed. The professional [illegible] include New York as positively as London and Berlin.

Edmond [illegible] van der Straeten, of Brussels, is about to publish a book, entitled Music in the Netherlands before the 19th Century. It will contain many documents hitherto unknown, together with biographies and notices of old Netherland composers, also [illegible], [illegible] of [illegible] Netherland operas, musical songs, Anecdotes, Gallic books, portraits and [illegible] of subjects in any way connected with music. M. van der Straeten has searched every archive in collection and library, and has arranged the various subjects according to the composers' dates, so that they form a kind of chronological table. He has also devoted a large amount of [illegible] remarks and [illegible] of reasons regarding the rise and progress of French [illegible] during the 17th and 18th centuries.

Quartet Playing.

THE QUARTETS OF THE BROTHERS MUELLER AND THE FLORENTINE [illegible].

[We translate the following from Dr. [illegible] Leon [illegible], from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Leipzig, May [illegible], 1867.]

The so-called Florentine Quartet of Messrs. Jean Becker, Masi, Chiostri and Hilpert just now attracts the most intense interest of the musical world, and in several circles occasions lively controversies in comparison with the Quartets of the older and the younger Brothers Mueller. * * * *

Jean Becker is a native of Mannheim and is settled with his family at Strasburg. Hilpert, a Nuremberger and pupil of the Leipzig Conservatory, was living as a violoncellist in Zurich when at the suggestion of Becker who was living in Florence, he removed to that city. There Becker had found suitable Quartet comrades in Signor Masi, a violinist from the Roman territory and Signor Chiostri, a violinist of Florence. Thus of two Italians and two Germans at Florence was formed the Quartet which is named after that city. Becker and Masi the two violins, Chiostri the viola, and Hilpert the violoncello.

Becker the founder, a world-renowned concert violinist of the noblest culture, remained still the soul of the Quartet. The two Italians stood somewhat remote from the German Quartet literature; the Ape Brothers, Schumann, were rather foreign to them, and the later Beethoven for a long time wholly unintelligible. If Hilpert was at first incomparably beyond them, yet he too first received through Becker the key to the understanding, conception and mode of treatment of Beethoven; but so we [illegible] of Schumann's Quartets. I give these data as I remember them from oral communications.

And here we will introduce some remarks about the Brothers Mueller, which may also serve comparatively for other Quartets of importance which performed in public at that time and to which certainly belongs a share of the merit of furthering the art of Quartet playing.

The older Brothers Mueller were four sons of one pair of parents in Brunswick. I knew this positively for I myself a [illegible] and knew the gray-haired father (the musician Egydius Mueller) of the four older brothers, and with me the whole city knew that they were "actual" brothers. This fact has been doubted and there has been talk of a "supposititious brother."

The younger brothers, again, are all four sons of one couple. The father, Concertmeister Carl Mueller, was first violinist of the older Quartet. The dito is equally true, and that here too there is not no supposititious brother "sounds" or what not (as has been erroneously asserted) I know with not less certainty, for as a youth of sixteen (who now after 37 years, remember that time with pleasure) I went in and out at Concertmeister Mueller's, and in the Quartet practice of the boys Bernhard (now viola player) and Carl (now first violin of the younger Quartet) their excellent teacher the violinist Kammermusikus Mewes, used to employ me to help out the tutor at the tenor or the second violin desk while he himself officiated as violoncellist. The other brothers, Hugo (now second violin) and Wilhelm (now violoncellist of the younger Quartet) were still very little fellows who "played" to be sure but had as yet no seat or part in the Quartet. At any rate all the famous Muellers are genuine blood relations.

This little genealogy was necessary here, not only to settle certain historically the family of the "the Brothers Mueller"* but also as a text for a few musical observations.

We may call the older brothers the fathers of the more modern Quartet playing. The more exterior thorough culture of every part [illegible] in accordance with the spirit of the whole, such as is only possible through perfect uniformity of musical technique, made the players brothers in an artistic sense also: a harmonious understanding blended them into a perfect unity, amounting to a sort of individuality.

The older brothers had much to find out for themselves, as regard to the conception and rendering of the Beethoven Quartets from op. 59 onward, which are still in [illegible] years and we understand as there [illegible] of models they had really none: these were their own original. The latest Beethoven Quartets they had to try to fashion in their own way; for Schumann they had no inward affinity. In these Beethoven Quartets those revelations of the locked up inner world of a personality which can now be regarded as the vital centre, the germ of a future which he already ruled silently beforehand—in those Quartets the older brothers gave the keynote of the common mood and understanding; the technical realization of the same was to them a difficult labor brilliantly successful to be sure, but still moreover a "labor." They had done enough and more than merely satisfied the best demand of their time. It is easy to perceive now how the younger Brothers Mueller could study less Quartet-playing attain to an intellectual, deep conception and strove after the ideal since they were constant listeners to the older four. The type of rendering the earlier and middle Beethoven had entered, unconsciously into their very flesh and blood; here as well as in the Haydn and Mozart Quartets, they were purely receptive. But both in the Schumann and in the later Beethoven Quartets there was in reserve for them much work of their own in the way of living themselves into and reproducing those compositions; they mastered Schumann in the course of time, and continued to enter more and more deeply into the spirit of Beethoven; with wonderful art they disclosed the mostly tones (greatly discovered by themselves) of works so long looked upon as riddles. They had to a good degree increased the collective Art-capital of the older brothers, had discovered new territory and successfully improved it.

In coming back now to the Florentines, we have it at all to consider Herr Becker, as the representative of the Quartet.

What the eight Muellers had disseminated in their wide travels, what they had directly or indirectly introduced into all the string Quartet choice, thus establishing a common understanding and indeed a settled normal style, was for Becker an element already found. He had essentially nothing to think out and to fathom for the first time; the problem only was: how to dispose of the inheritance in the sense of his own individuality. He did this, as only a genial virtuoso can, who, in the possession of a not only perfectly formed, but even a peculiar technique, is able to reproduce something received so that it shall come out fresh and in a certain sense his own.

* Goethe said, that his countrymen, instead of disputing whether he or Schiller was the greatest ought to rejoice in having two "such fellows."

Becker sets more euphony or beauty of sound, very high; he agrees therein with the principle handed down by the Italian school which was I now cultivates the charm of sensuous effect even beyond the sonnet limits. Thus Becker was a proper magnet for his new Italians. Moreover, for a German seems a point of necessity to have harmonized well with his colleagues; here and there, to be sure, he has to hold back with his stronger strokes,—and yet the violoncello, even with its greater strength, is just the instrument to harmonize with softer sounding Quartet voices; indeed the Basso for the most part the supporting ground, the firm foot for the rest, and even in obbligato playing it has always voices above itself.

Now if the Florentine Quartet, in its quality of sound, has decidedly the paramount and purposely cultivated character of the tender the lovely—not however to the entire exclusion of the powerful; we must characterize the tone of the Mueller Brothers Quartet, with all its beauty rather as a nervous one; they cultivate beauty of sound as well less than they invest there as to characteristic expression. The Florentines are never inclined to sacrifice aught of tone-beauty to characteristic expression; sharp outlines, strong contrasts are not the point with them. The Muellers on the contrary go boldly right into the matter and make it a point to express hard rugged, downright passionate parts with a corresponding mode of bowing, taking no especial thought of the due sensuous effect.

With the Florentines, a sensuous beauty of form, a soft and tender kind of tone, is the material in which they clothe the thought according to their personal feeling of truth; with the Muellers on the contrary a firmer tone material and characteristic delineation are the prominent peculiarity. Moreover the Muellers are the creators of the modern Quartet playing, whereas the Florentines are the receivers and continuators. Accordingly the two modes of playing are related to one another somewhat as the natural and the feminine. The hard (major) energy there and the soft (minor) tenderness here, are characteristic fundamental moods, proceeding from which however each of the groups draws to itself the peculiarities of the other. To pursue the comparison yet further one might say for example: the Muellers and the Florentines stand contrasted to each other like Schumann and Mendelssohn, like Beethoven and Schubert, like Joachim and Jean Becker; and so on,—but, be it borne in mind again, only in respect to their inherent natural disposition, apart from other more universal particularities. Shall we venture them? Well then: to Basel it we must attribute unconditionally a peculiar power of specific violin autocracy: the first violinists of both the Mueller Quartets, formerly excellent solo players, have fallen off in that while they have given themselves up almost exclusively to Quartet culture. You remark, as far as virtuosity is concerned, in the exceedingly fine and easy execution of so many technical difficulties on Becker's part a plus, which however is easily missed.—A comparison of the other players, the second violin of the Muellers with that of the Florentines, &c., would lead into small details in the weighing of opposite peculiarities. We may sum it all up in the remark that with the Mueller Quartet, the nature of the men their deep and earnest absorption into the very heart and vital meaning of the works, is an original and positive power; while, on the contrary, the Florentine Quartet has received into itself the already fashioned meaning and as a free far more conscious handling of the form.

This last remark I would apply especially to the later Quartets of Beethoven: in the rendering of which the Florentines excel in a peculiar manner. They play them as easily as Haydn's music. As the Florentines render them a hearer who with all musical feels no difficulty in understanding the meaning entering into the mood or seeing through the intricate complexities of form. With them the playing of these works is indeed play; whereas in the rendering of the Muellers, with all the high enjoyment one always feel the earnestness of an original reproduction of the difficult music; we the hearers in a certain sense, help in the reproduction,—we have a harder time of it, but we also feel ourselves more deeply interested. The Muellers belonged to those whom we cannot highly enough honor who had at first hand to find a true blending of substance and form, a true deciphering of just what Beethoven meant, and to realize it to the ear. The technical exercise of playing together with a beautiful precision, economy in strength on the scale, was rather a mere external, secondary thing with them, compared with bringing out the spirit and poetic meaning. But the Florentines, after such genial pioneering in this last respect, found their chief difficulty in just the technical practice; modified however by the fact, that these four violins could play over every phrase to the accustomed ones with the most beautiful and masterly understanding. Yet in spite of that the Florentines, in point of execution, have had more peculiar difficulties than the Muellers; for the latter from their youth up had been imbued with the spirit of German and especially of German Quartet music, while the Italians (as members of an Opera orchestra) stood as it were aloof from it.

Here then is the place where I must shake hands, a special well Signors Masi and Chiostri, those good honorable men as the name of German workmanship, will admiring recognition and will joy over the German sympathies of their true artist nature. What must not these gentlemen have lived through in working during the gradual mastering of that most difficult of tasks—to render beautifully clear to others that which was unknown and unintelligible to themselves! For of all nations the Italians, compared with the French for example, stand the farthest away from German music and especially from the difficult music of Schumann and the last period of Beethoven! In fact it did cost Signors Masi and Chiostri a long, long time to feel themselves at home in the Schumann, and especially the later Beethoven Quartets; they were masters of all the other Quartet works and had been making successful concert tours in Switzerland for months long during which time the later Beethoven Quartets, particularly those in A minor and C sharp minor, were still not quite ripe for performance and were continually studied together even at the rate of six hours in a day. What a guaranty for Art, what a deep-rooted tendency to the Ideal, Jean Becker must have [illegible] up to this noble-reached height at which they now stand! He, properly, has made the Florentine Quartet, whereas the Mueller Quartets made themselves. Composed of men of different lands and different tendencies in Art, and therefore more universal and sympathetic in its style, the Florentine Quartet has decidedly a cosmopolitan character —in contrast to the brothers Mueller, who are of right old German, national nature, and who accordingly (as representatives of all the Quartet style of the Germanic stock) best give the tone in the most German of all Art.

We fancy we have indulged in as much comparison as our theme requires. And what is the result? How far does it serve to answer the question put in many ways: Which party play the best, the Muellers or the Florentines? In the first place I think that they both must play otherwise there would be something essential wanting. Each has something different and each has its charm. Which is the more beautiful, ideal man, or a beautiful, ideal woman? Apollo, or Diana? Whichever of the two statues you may see (having mutual sympathy out of the account) that will be most beautiful; and if you see them both together you would not willingly miss either!

So it is also with our Quartets. It would afford an exquisite satisfaction to hear the Florentines and the Muellers play a Quartet piece by piece alternately. And if there could be added with a third set purely Italian, as the Quartet of Messrs. Chevillard-Maurin is specifically French, then we should have before us, in visible and audible sequence, the whole logical historical development of the Quartet-playing art as it naturally sprang from German stock and grew perfected up to this cosmopolitan summit.

So here I close my observations, heartily greeting all my dear Quartet friends!

[By W. B. ... Of the London Musical World.]

CONCERTOS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—Pianoforte music fills an important place in the modern history of the art; for in that branch the beginnings of a new musical era first appeared. The most remarkable musical talents of the day may be found among pianoforte players; a fact which has been noticed of former days also. Bach and Handel, Mozart and Beethoven, grew up at the piano; and, like the sculptors who first model their statues in miniature in clay, they most often have sketched at the piano what they afterwards worked out in full for the orchestra. Since that time the instrument itself has attained great perfection. With the ever increasing nonplussed perfection of pianoforte playing and with the tremendous impulse which Beethoven gave to the branch of composition, the instrument has also grown in compass and importance; and when it comes to have pedals added to it like the organ, which I believe it will, new prospects will open for composers; they will gradually free themselves from the support of the orchestra; and thus acquire greater independence, and more fulness and richness of tone. This separation from the orchestra has for some time been impending; in defiance of the symphony, modern pianoforte music intends to make its way by its own resources alone; and this may be the reason why so few pianoforte concertos and, in fact, so few original compositions with accompaniment have appeared lately. The Zeitschrift has since its commencement noticed almost all the pianoforte concertos; and in the past six years they scarcely amount to sixteen; a small number compared to what they formerly were. These changes [illegible] considered as additions of the forms of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. It would certainly be a great loss if the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra were to fall into disuse; but on the other hand, we can scarcely contradict pianoforte players when they say that they do not need [illegible] help, and that their instrument produces its most complete effect alone. And so we must rest content till some genius shall discover a new and splendid way of combining the orchestra and the piano, so that the player may display all the riches of his instrument and his art, whilst at the same time the orchestra may not [illegible] [illegible] spectator, but may enrich the scene with its various characters. One thing however we may [illegible] of our young composers—that if they [illegible] the solid, dignified form of the concerto, they should give us a new [illegible] equally solid and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], or one [illegible], [illegible] thoroughly finished and [illegible] [illegible], such as, it may come, might serve for the opening of a concerto.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] shall often have to resort to those older compositions which are so perfectly adapted [illegible] [illegible] for opening a concert, and for testing at the [illegible] the [illegible] of the player, such as the splendid concertos of Mozart and Beethoven or to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] whose great name still [illegible] [illegible] honored, one of Sebastian Bach's, or to bring forward something new, some of those in which the footsteps of Beethoven have been happily and ably followed.

Amongst these latter we would place a high distinction to a concerto, which have lately appeared by J. Moscheles, and F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Both composers have so often been spoken of in the Zeitschrift that they need no further introduction. J. Moscheles, we have the rare example of a [illegible] [illegible], though [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and successfully occupied with the study of the old masters, has taken note of each novelty as it appeared, and profited by the progress of [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] act as a check upon those influences, and thus, from a combination of the old, the new, and the individual, proceeds a work such as this concerto, clear and sharp in its [illegible], approaching the romantic school in character, and yet original and the very reflection of its author. Feeling [illegible] such fine [illegible], the concerto [illegible] at [illegible] at every [illegible] but everything has its tone of bloom and he is no longer the same as when he wrote the [illegible] Concerto, though still the industrious [illegible] artist sparing no pains to make his work equal to the best. At the very outset he commences [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], the concerto [illegible] "[illegible]"—and is [illegible] but what is that to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]? Its difference in form from other concertos and Moscheles' own earlier ones [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The first movement [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the "[illegible]" [illegible] than usual, but the pianoforte is accompanied by the orchestra almost throughout. The second movement, with its slower [illegible], seems to me rather [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] followed by the last movement, which is of the same pathetic character as the first but more passionate. In comparison to other new concertos this is not difficult of execution. The passages are carefully elaborated, but a little practice will enable a moderately good player to master them. When played with the orchestra the greatest attention is necessary on both sides, and an intimate knowledge of the score; such a performance, by displaying its artistic construction, will make the work interesting in the highest degree—as we remember with pleasure when we heard Moscheles play it at Leipzic.

The modern concerto writers deserve a special vote of thanks for not wearying us with tuttis made up of shakes and arpeggios. The old cadence which formerly gave so much scope for the bravura of the player rests on a far [illegible] idea, and might still perhaps be made use of with success. And why should not the scherzo, so familiar to us in the symphony and sonata, be used with effect in the concerto. It might introduce a sort of contest between the different [illegible] instruments in the orchestra, at the same time that the form of the whole would undergo a slight change. No one could do this better than Mendelssohn, of whose second concerto we have now to speak.

Here, as everywhere, he is always the same, moving along with his own joyous step, and the sweetest smile on his lips. The players will find it hard to display their wonderful powers of execution here, he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to do that they have not already done; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] before. It is their [illegible] complaint,—and to a certain extent they are right. The opportunity for allowing the player to display his powers [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] passages should not be lost sight of in a concerto. But a [illegible] should go before everything else; and the highest praise is due to one who [illegible] [illegible] so nobly. Music in the expression of a [illegible] [illegible], no matter whether it be represented before by [illegible] or in the stillness of [illegible], so long as it is indeed the utterance of a lovely nature. This is why Mendelssohn's compositions [illegible] such an irresistible effect when he plays them himself; the fingers might just as well be [illegible], for they are only just used to be what the words are carried to the ear and thence make their appeal to the heart. It often seems to me that Mozart must have played like him. But though Mendelssohn [illegible] the praise that he always gives such [illegible], we must not therefore deny that some of his works are [illegible] and less [illegible] than others. This concerto belongs to that class, and I [illegible] much mistaken if it was not written in a few days, perhaps in a few hours,—just as when one shakes a tree the ripe, sweet [illegible] more deeply off. People will ask in what relation it stands to the first concerto. It [illegible], and yet unlike, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ten years later. Here and there [illegible] Bach peeps out in the harmonies, but the melody, the form and the [illegible] are all Mendelssohn's own. The [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible], though slight, [illegible] to please. It puts one in mind of those works which the older masters used to throw off when resting after their more strenuous [illegible]. But our young composer would not long [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] forward with some splendid [illegible] tion,—of which we have full proof in Mozart's D-minor and Beethoven's G-major concertos.

Pygmalion's Statue.

Is that story [illegible] the statue!
Statue shaped with art so rare
Till your sculptor growing so pure
Leaned in [illegible] of the despair
Till sweet Art took [illegible] breath,
Lent you life and gave you death!

While he sighed: "Ah [illegible] beginner
If indeed your hands wrought it all,
Beauty should catch life [illegible] [illegible]
[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] very skill!"
One more touch—her breast [illegible]
Transforms [illegible] be garment's fold

[illegible] while Art and rapture mingled
And the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] smile;
How those [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
With the first faint [illegible] of being Did he [illegible] with sudden cry—
"She will change, grow old, and die!"

So to gain her was to lose her,
So to quicken was to kill—
Love always [illegible] [illegible] lost, too lost,
She will wake to perish still.
Yet would I—who would not I—welcome
So to gain and so to lose.

Verdi's "Don Carlos" in London.

It would not be easy to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] personal [illegible] than [illegible] who have [illegible] changed [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of later [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has been [illegible]. The [illegible] and [illegible] and feeling [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—however [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be [illegible] in his early [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and throughout the second [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], as in [illegible] "Missa Solemnis" or "Choral Symphony." At all events, [illegible] Gluck and Beethoven changed, Signor Verdi has not. He is more careful in his [illegible] [illegible] than when he began—more ambitious in combination, less [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] every [illegible] [illegible] of the "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Dante's Divine Comedy and Michael Angelo's Sistine ceiling. That he has used the [illegible] [illegible] expression we concede [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their brows and [illegible] [illegible] them [illegible] whether the [illegible] [illegible] requires [illegible] [illegible] the expression of a simple emotion [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To have [illegible] so [illegible] [illegible] to a [illegible] Italian opera composers what [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] among English dramatists.

And this is illustrated in no small degree by his preference of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in his choice of subjects. Look at the list of his operas, from a score at [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a work of [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] beyond that of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the first act of "La [illegible]" a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to deal with battle, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], conspiracy, intrigue, [illegible] [illegible] and hypocrisy, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. That operas could [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "The Comedy of Errors" and "As You Like It" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "L'Allegro" as well as [illegible] Messiah. [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Verdi has never been able to get beyond, in music, the style of "Tamburlaine."

Of this the [illegible] score of "Don Carlos" gives [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There was a certain [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Signor Verdi's earlier operas—as [illegible] "[illegible] Lombardi," "Ernani," "[illegible]"—which [illegible] the town [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "second [illegible] [illegible]" was "[illegible] [illegible]." [illegible] young blood which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and what we [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] writer's last opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or by those [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], which in a period of great, yet not [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the play-going public into the conclusion that another great composer had risen above the horizon. There has been no transformation of Signor Verdi's manner—merely a change from one Italian form of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to what was done by Rossini when, after being the most Italian of opera composers, he wrote his "Guillaume Tell" for the Grand Opera of Paris.

Boston Music Hall.

At the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders, June 19 the President, Dr. Upham, made the following Report:

Gentlemen,—Stockholders of the Boston Music Hall Association:—

I have thought proper [illegible] to report [illegible] and [illegible] to present to you [illegible] a brief Report, in which I shall endeavor to convey [illegible] sum of such a [illegible] of the [illegible] incidents and facts in the history of the Association.

The Act of Incorporation of the "Boston Music Hall Association," as it was somewhat quaintly styled in the original document, which [illegible] from the State House bears date May 2nd 1851. This Act or Charter was accepted by the Stockholders at a regular meeting called for the purpose, on the 13th of June of the same year. Early in the Autumn work upon the building was commenced by the laying of its foundations so deep and so broad and massive [illegible] in all safe in [illegible], and to [illegible] a hall [illegible] that its proprietors [illegible] to see their work completed.

[illegible] than a year from the time of breaking ground the [illegible] finished and ready for occupancy [illegible], on the evening of the 20th November 1852 it was formally opened with appropriate ceremonies to public use, at a total cost of $[illegible] 792.41. Since then some important additions and alterations have been made. [illegible] questions as to the right of way and [illegible] of the various passageways to the Hall [illegible] settled; a covered corridor has been constructed from Tremont Street along what was formerly known as Bumstead Place [illegible] permanent frame work of iron, adapted [illegible] covering, has been thrown over the entrance from Winter St., and [illegible] afford to the visitor [illegible] both these [illegible] ways.

In the interior alterations have also been made from time to time. Gas pendants have been affixed to the balconies, the platform of the stage has been enlarged [illegible], while the opposite end of the Hall has been materially changed by the taking away of the [illegible] of the deep gallery [illegible] the front of this gallery, and supporting the balcony above by suitable iron columns, corresponding with those which uphold the structure below. Two choral stages of amphitheatrical form have been constructed in a [illegible], and [illegible] manner as to allow [illegible] up and taken down and moved away at pleasure. The largest of these will accommodate with comfort and safety a great chorus of 1200 [illegible] on the occasion of the Annual Festival of the Public Schools in July. Proper [illegible] for the stowage of these structures are made [illegible] in the cellar beneath the Hall. [illegible] machinery [illegible] has been [illegible] to be used as occasion requires [illegible] against [illegible] the [illegible] with [illegible] improvements have from time to time, been carried in to the account of [illegible] to [illegible] of the Hall.

The Organ, with the necessary preparations for its reception, and the motive power in the cellar [illegible] thereof at the present time with a cost of very nearly $60,000, of which sum $12,043.57 was obtained from outside contributions, the balance from our own funds.

I need only refer in a word to the [illegible] have from time to time, been made to us by our friends. The earliest contribution of the kind was made by Jonathan Phillips, who presented to the Association the sum of $[illegible] 000. This was placed to the credit of the Organ Fund, the nucleus of which [illegible] was formed from the net proceeds of the Opening Concert in November 1852. The clock in the gallery opposite was presented by our fellow citizen, Mr. Lewis. The bronze full cast of Apollo in its [illegible], through the [illegible] of Mr. Edward N. Perkins [illegible] by the Boston Athenaeum. And for the [illegible] in Munich bronze, one of the [illegible] works of the lamented Crawford, we are indebted, [illegible] to the [illegible] of Mr. Chas. C. Perkins. To these should be added [illegible] our [illegible] Art friend of ours, Miss Charlotte Cushman, [illegible] in Rome,—four richly wrought [illegible] symbolizing the [illegible] and genius of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and which, [illegible] in the future, [illegible] for their appropriate statues in marble.

During the past winter a new use of the Hall has been found in its occupancy [illegible] by the New England Conservatory of Music. That [illegible] however been found [illegible] for [illegible] growing wants, and they have called [illegible] the Directors for additional rooms with the [illegible] can be furnished the Conservatory [illegible] permanent abode beneath our roof. Your Directors have therefore, through their Executive Committee [illegible] and [illegible] Architect of the Hall, which [illegible] been examined by the Directors of the Conservatory, and favored by them [illegible] accommodation.

In order to furnish such additional apartments, no interference with the company of the present Hall is required. They may be built up upon and over the Ladies' Retiring Room across the large corridor and would comprise a suite of [illegible] rooms and two halls [illegible] anterooms, to be approached by appropriate stairways—and so as not to interrupt by their occupancy the ordinary uses of the Hall.

All this can be done in accordance with the Architect's plans and estimates, based upon actual written offers from contractors for every portion of the work, for a comparatively moderate sum, for which the Conservatory are willing to pay a reasonable rent, exclusive of the cost of lighting and warming; and the Directors unanimously recommend that the Stockholders grant them the requisite authority to make such proposed improvements of their property. The financial aspects of the Association may be briefly stated as follows:

The average annual net revenue of the Hall for the [illegible] years prior to the construction of the Organ was $[illegible]. For the four years since it was placed in position, the annual net revenue has been $[illegible]. There are at present 1,000 shares of Stock outstanding at the par value $[illegible] each. There is a debt with mortgage on Estate, falling due in July of this year of $10,000, and there remained in hand on the first of June, as appears by the Treasurer's Report, the sum of $4,[illegible].

The Organ has withstood the test of four years almost constant use, in a climate noted for its changeable and extremes of heat and cold. It is kept in tune and in repair by a competent artisan, Mr. [illegible] who is retained for this purpose at a fixed salary. The [illegible] proving the wisdom and [illegible] worth of the Great Instrument,—the most excellent of its workmanship [illegible] and its right to all respect in [illegible] companionship with the greatest works of its kind in the world.

The Hall with all its belongings and possessions, is at the present time in better condition than ever before. In its acoustic properties and its fitness for the various uses for which it is so frequently called into requisition, it has answered the ends for which it was designed, [illegible] than its most sanguine friends could have anticipated. We trust it may long continue to fulfil the noble purposes of its foundation—a source of just pride to our city and an honor to the Art to whose interests it stands pledged.

Decadence of the Drama.

The Tribune presents the following statement, which is worthy of the thoughtful consideration of every friend of the Drama. Would that it applied only to New York!

It is, we think, rather a remarkable fact that at the present time in the City of New York there is not a single dramatic performance given which a person of sense and refinement can witness with entire satisfaction. [illegible] good acting may indeed be noticed occasionally here and there, and there is abundance of bright scenery for those who [illegible] it. But a dramatic performance is given which depends for its attractiveness upon skill, the intrinsic worth of the drama or the art of acting. And yet we have upward of eight prominent theatres in active operation.

On the leading theatrical attractions [illegible] the city has comment [illegible] made in these columns from time to time. We haven't [illegible] do full justice to most without being [illegible]. In the present instance an [illegible] we [illegible] the truth. Thoughtful observers of the [illegible] are "running" must be [illegible] that [illegible] has very few [illegible] dramatic merit. The most popular of these is "The Black Crook," which is [illegible] to characterize as a drama. A few odds and ends of incident from "Faust," "Manfred," "Der Freischütz," [illegible] to [illegible] afford occasion for the display of ballet dancers and scenery. In "Treasure Trove" at the [illegible] we see a [illegible] spectacle than "The Black Crook," and [illegible] of the [illegible] work. Mr. Barnum has presented in his [illegible] at the Museum an [illegible] consideration appears to [illegible]. Mr. Wallack may be seen also, as the Broadway Theatre [illegible], in the [illegible] of "Rent Lease" [illegible] of the [illegible] and its [illegible] has only a [illegible]. Elsewhere [illegible] and [illegible], not particularly [illegible] with the [illegible] of the [illegible].

[illegible] Not only does [illegible] afford innocent amusement in hours of relaxation from the cares of [illegible] many persons appear to consider its sole [illegible]. It [illegible] play the finest faculties of the mind and the noblest emotions of the heart. In the [illegible] great cause of [illegible] upon which the future of mankind depends. A well regulated stage has a great chance for [illegible] in portraying character.

[illegible] the greatness [illegible] through a period of history. It [illegible] the light of [illegible] the lofty [illegible] of [illegible] higher ideas of character and conduct [illegible] admiration of nobleness in man and [illegible] in woman [illegible] in moral influence, [illegible] for the sacred [illegible] and the [illegible] and [illegible] influence on [illegible] freedom and [illegible] the most [illegible] the preacher and [illegible] the philosopher, the poet, and the statesman, [illegible] to make the world happier and better.

[illegible] degenerate [illegible] treating it as if it were a kind of curious [illegible] and [illegible] indeed, [illegible] this way of considering [illegible]. They are [illegible] of the drama [illegible] it is only worth while to [illegible] them, however [illegible] time [illegible] for [illegible]. The time, we believe, is not far away. In [illegible] we must not lose sight of [illegible] present. There are those [illegible] dramatic vocation—who appreciate the power of the drama and hold it in due reverence. In them is our greatest hope. "The [illegible] the [illegible] as Shakespeare and the dramatists of "the spacious times of great Elizabeth;"

On Tuesday, "La Traviata" was repeated; on Thursday "Fidelio" was given in subscription night; and for Saturday, the third appearance of Mdlle. Nilsson is announced, the opera to be Gounod's "Faust." The event is anticipated with considerable interest. "La Forza del Destino" is understood; and there is reason to hope that this long-expected production of Verdi's will at length see light in England, and prove attractive to many of the composer's admirers. A single morning performance of the "Huguenots" is also announced for Monday.

The appearance of Mdlle Patti as Amina on Monday at Covent Garden drew a large audience, as it was announced that the representation this season would be confined to a single evening. In commenting on a performance so well known as this representation [illegible] only necessary again to note that Mlle. THE CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S.—The musical portion of this annual festival service was exactly similar to that of last year. Mr. Henry Buckland [illegible] his place as [illegible] and conducted the music with considerable energy. Mr. George Cooper [illegible] at the organ, while the trumpeters and drummers [illegible] valuable assistance. The Te Deum and Jubilate were sung to [illegible] the children's [illegible] power. The juvenile choir also joined in the Gloria Patri at the close of each psalm, and in the usual portions of the "Coronation Anthem." They sang Mendelssohn's chorale "Sleepers wake," before the sermon, which was preached by the Bishop of [illegible] and after [illegible] the [illegible] Psalm, and the Hallelujah Chorus. The spectacle [illegible] is merely [illegible] one of the most affecting which can be witnessed, and few can [illegible] all the fresh young voices, [illegible] by the [illegible] of the organ, [illegible] may have [illegible] The portion of the service given by the Cathedral Choir who were assisted by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and the Chapels Royal were anything but satisfactory. A performance of Herr Schachner's Oratorio, "Israel's Return from Babylon," was to be given at Exeter Hall, for a charity. Two of the principal parts will be sung by a [illegible] and the wife of a Bishop.

At Mr. Ella's last meeting of the Musical Union, Herr Auer played for the last time this season, with M. Jacquard, the [illegible] violoncellist from Paris, and Herr Lübeck, the pianist. At the next concert, M. Rubinstein, we read, will appear.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. At the fourth concert a new Overture, by Mr. Molto, was performed, of which the Athenæum says:

"The piece, which is written in a light and brilliant style, contains much flowing and graceful melody, and some very skilful instrumentation, and is [illegible] thoroughly [illegible] who should be better known to the public." The other orchestral pieces were Meyerbeer's "Struensée" Overture and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, and the programme also included Beethoven's [illegible] played [illegible] by Mme. Goddard and [illegible] Concerto for the [illegible] associated by Mr. Henry Holmes.

ITALY. The Gazzetta Musicale of Milan announces that government has decided on withdrawing all the annual subsidies. This is [illegible] on the death blow of opera. Popular Concerts, under the direction of Signor Mabellini [illegible] have been given at the Pagliano, Florence, made up of the music of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and [illegible] was [illegible].

[illegible] Mercadante's "Vestale," which contains some of the composer's best music, has been given at Venice with great success. The singing of a new tenor, Signor Pattisson, has been most highly praised.

MADRID. The Stadt Theatre closed on the first [illegible] During the past season, there were eighty-eight operatic performances given and no fewer than forty [illegible] different operas. There were no new ones, among them the revival old ones were revived. The [illegible] of these performed:—Czaar und Zimmermann, Ondine, Der Freischütz, and Faust (Gounod) [illegible] Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Le Domino Noir, Les Huguenots, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Stradella, La Fille du Régiment, Templer und Jüdin, Orpheus (Offenbach), and Il Trovatore, [illegible] Der Wasserträger [illegible] Robert le Diable, La Muette, La Marie [illegible] Tell, Martha, Jessonda, Joconde, Fra Diavolo, Lucrezia, [illegible] Zampa, and Les Deux Journées, [illegible] Le Prophète, Fra Diavolo, Lucia di Lammermoor, Le Postillon, La Dame Blanche, Fidelio, [illegible] Tannhäuser, [illegible] La Juive, Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, Die lustigen Weiber (Flotow) and Norma, Don [illegible].

MUNICH. Herr Richard Wagner returned to this capital a short time since. By order of the King, a [illegible] has been taken for him on the banks of the Starnberg Lake, and he is now there, employed in the completion of his new opera, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.

ANTWERP. Mr. Oscar Beck is engaged in a three act musical opera entitled Lenore. It is founded on the old legend of The Spectre Horseman, popularly used by Bürger in his celebrated ballad.

SONDERSHAUSEN. Herr Max Bruch has accepted the post of Capell-Conductor.

LEIPSIC. Schumann's Paradise and Peri was performed here last month.

BOSTON, JULY 6, 1867.

Robert Franz.

The friends of the great Song composer will rejoice to know that during the past Spring in spite of the calamity of increasing deafness he has been cheered by fresh and frequent visitations of the Muse. He has composed some forty songs since February. They compose themselves, also then he will so [illegible] a song or a [illegible] as unbidden straight, he says, "come unbid or keep humming and singing in my head and heart." Who would not be resigned to deafness, to find himself the medium of such gifts to the world!

The publishers of Leipzig and elsewhere are now eager to bring out his songs, which until recently they have thought it a generous favor to accept. The great house of Breitkopf and Härtel have already published the first set of the new ones, six in number, Op. 35, to words by Heine. Five or six more sets are in the hands of these and other publishers. Each Opus thus far has contained commonly six, sometimes twelve songs; and all but three or four of his published works are Songs, so that the Songs of Robert Franz now number more than 250!

And what Songs they are! Not one of them falls under the category of mere graceful clever commonplace, or ever loose its freshness. They do not ring the changes upon the same old sentimental melody which runs through a nine-tenths of the German songs so popular with young people of a certain age and which are almost as much Italian as they are German. He never repeats himself: the little poems of Goethe, the songs of Shakespeare, are not more individual and each essentially a new creation. No wonder that to many his melody is at first so strange they do not take part in turns, and when they would fall by habit into the old cadences it seems to elude and mock them! But let the singer once fit to closer acquaintance let him enter fully into the spirit of poem, melody and accompaniment, all three; and he will find that the melody was strange only because it was fresh and true and original, that in each case this is the very music of the poem—the soul thereof set free in music. And the test of it is, that once captivated by a Franz song you never weary of its charm. With all his peculiarity you cannot charge him with mannerism. When he brings you a new Opus you are unaware of a fresh gift, as if he were a new person, or just come from a new country or a new world. These are real inspirations: these are sincere and genuine products: these [illegible] grew and not all on the same tree but scattered over a wide field of rich deep, various mental and musical experience. And [illegible] they are full of poetry, of passion, of imagination, not less remarkable are they for chaste refinement, of a [illegible] dom from all empty ornament or bravura, and for a mastery of accompaniment which is profound [illegible] learned in the best sense. For no man since Mendelssohn was so thoroughly imbued with the spirit, as the very letter of Bach. In his piano accompaniments, romantic, graphic, free as they often are, you very often feel a tendency to the polyphonic style, each part in the harmony moving with an individual significance. It is the blending of Bach, of the old contrapuntal art, with such free imaginative play of thought and feeling (most modern of the moderns) as leads some (ignorantly, though not unnaturally) to class him with the so-called musicians of "the Future." But it is through this very quality in his accompaniment, this Bach-like refinement and conscientious working up of the essential matters, that his melody preserves itself in everlasting freshness, while some more catching popular strains, or tunes, haunt the ear or plague the mind at last and keep ringing themselves over and over amid custom stales. His songs are at once naive and intensely art in the simplest sketch of melody which he flings forth simple song, it sometimes [illegible] you feel that it is a thoroughly informed and cultured as well as a mature, deep musical nature that has no hope its freshness. With such a man genius and culture still draw breath together.

From larger forms of composition Franz seems resolutely to abstain, though often urged to it, and doubtless felt as capable as any, were he as willing to rush into Symphony or Oratorio with or without call. He must be the judge of his own calling; and is it not a great one to represent a whole new race of songs!

As modest as he is earnest, he has felt it to be his and a duty to spend a vast share of his most precious hours and energy upon bringing the [illegible] treasures of Sebastian Bach nearer to an age which but begins to appreciate and understand him. His labors as arranger and editor of many of Bach's sacred works cannot be overestimated. Taking the scores as Bach left them with much of the harmony but barely indicated or implied, he has so [illegible] out so fully in Bach's spirit, so successfully carrying out and thereby demonstrating Bach's art of [illegible] that he has made these works for the first time really practicable for performance. He began with culling Arias for each of the four voices from Cantatas, Masses, &c., with condensing into a piano-forte part all that he found, if only sketched or hinted (or some only understood), in the instrumental parts of the score; in this way he has made accessible to singers who have earnestness enough to study and win their way to the heart of such treasures, a set of Arias for each kind of voice. Also a set of Arias from the Passion Music and a set of Duets. This led him further into preparing in the same way whole Cantatas, six of which are published; and then came the Magnificat, in full, of which he has also published an analytical analysis in a pamphlet. From Bach he passed to similar choice works of other great masters, and has put Astorga's Stabat Mater, Durante's Magnificat, &c., within easy reach. But his last and greatest service has been the preparation of a full score of the Matthew Passionsmusik, in which he has filled out the orchestral and organ parts with such consummate truth and skill, that this greatest of Oratorios is now in a complete state for performance by any Choral Society who have the will and means. Heretofore, wherever it has been performed, in Germany or England, some parts have had to be put to [illegible] some [illegible] to be supplied, by the Conductor or Kapellmeister: now the work is done, and done perfectly (as say the experts) once for all.

But it was not our purpose now to speak of Franz as a creator nor of his great services as an editor and interpreter of Bach. In a third character he has passed the [illegible] and manhood of his mature [illegible], winning respect and love in his quiet, quaint old town of Halle by his labors as a Conductor. In the autumn of 1847 he undertook the charge there of the Sing-Akademie, into which he breathed a new life, a spirit of seemingly inseparable [illegible], inspiring its members to enthusiastic efforts in the study and performance of the noblest choral works. For 17 years he was thus their sole conductor and director until the physical infirmity of which we have spoken compelled him a few months since to resign. By way of exhortation and example to our own Oratorio and Choral Societies, we call attention to what Franz has done in Halle, drawing our information chiefly from an article in a recent number of the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.

It was no easy task to build up a Choral Society after the ideal of Robert Franz. Nothing could content him short of seeing them all work in the same spirit that animated his own musical activity. It would have been hard anywhere; and Halle was not particularly well prepared by previous musical culture, though it was proud of being the birthplace of Handel. The members who poured in in the first excitement of a new hope, soon dwindled away from such high and stern requirements, leaving neither voices nor pecuniary means enough for such performances as they contemplated (for, be it understood, the "Handel and Haydn" and "Harvard" Société of Germany are made up of singers who love their work not enough to pay for it themselves!) there were [illegible], too, as may well be supposed: and more than all the male voices were drawn almost exclusively from the students of the University, a constantly changing body, so that it was almost impossible to form the tradition [illegible] so [illegible] except with the female voices.

But these and other difficulties hid Franz's perseverance overcome. His steadfast devotion to the cause [illegible] pupils of both sexes to hear; and these soon formed the kernel of a faithful band, who followed him [illegible] on paths of more significance than they had dreamed of. The example was catching; difficulties overcome brought increase of power and [illegible]; and in a few years there was a chorus with which he could solve the grander problems, before which he could set the highest musical goals; a choir which had its peculiar [illegible] itself up through him and upon him which stood in such a personal relation to him that it not only willingly followed his intentions, rapidly seized his ideas, but even sang the most difficult pieces more easily when they he [illegible] with Franz's own musical peculiarity and was slower to find itself at home in easier ones when they [illegible].

"How Franz led his chorus to the solution of such unusual problems, no one can doubt who knows him by his own compositions or by the few words which he has occasionally published about works of Bach. True to his vocal nature, he sought to draw from every musical piece its soul as it were, and to impart others all that he had [illegible] felt out keeping the poetic meaning and the personal expression as well as the musical form, before their eyes. And this he did with equal care even with works more out of the sphere of his natural sympathies, such as Romberg's 'Song of the Bell,' which we had to perform at a Schiller Festival."

The writer goes on to tell how many and what great and difficult works were brought out under Franz's direction by the Singakademie, naming of course only the more important. That he should lavish attention almost the very best things and by preference, to the masters who claimed his highest veneration, is not to be wondered. And as the Halle choir can boast of bringing out, under his lead more of the Bach treasures than any other musical society. Besides a great many single solos and chorals, three Piano Concertos, unprinted Motets, &c., they gradually mastered and performed 16 of the Church Cantatas, of late years naturally with the instrumental accompaniment elaborated by Franz himself. To which add the Funeral Ode (Trauer-Ode,) the Magnificat, twice the greater part of the great Mass in B minor, twice. The solo forces were not sufficient for the St. Matthew Passion, and only the concluding chorus was sung repeatedly.

Of Handel, too, the list is very rich, including the Messiah, three times; Samson, three times; Judas, twice; Judas Maccabæus, three times; Israel in Egypt, twice; Jephtha, twice; also the Dettingen Te Deum, the Hundredth Psalm, and many solo and choruses from L'Allegro ed Il Penseroso and other works.

It has been the practice also of this Society, for a number of years, on the evening before the Todtenfest (memorial festival of the dead) to sing alternately the Requiem of Mozart and then of Cherubini; both have now been [illegible] seven times. Moreover the Kyrie of Cherubini's Mass in D minor has been given; and from the great Mass (in D) of Beethoven, at least the Kyrie has so small times been sung. Of Mendelssohn: the Elijah and the St. Paul, four Psalms, several Hymns, The Lobgesang twice, the Lauda Sion four times, the choruses to Antigone, the choruses to Œdipus, songs and other things, have been produced; and by Franz himself the Kyrie à Capella, the Psalm for two choirs, and the choral in part-songs on various occasions. Of older works we may name here the Stabat Mater of Astorga, the Magnificat of Durante, the De profundis of [illegible], Chorals by Eccard, &c. Nor were Haydn, Gluck and Romberg wanting, while Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," given three times, and his [illegible] from Faust, twice; [illegible] "[illegible]" Meeting "Song of Triumph" and other things by Schubert. This is by no means all, but it is abundantly enough to disprove the charge of one-sidedness so often brought against Franz, at least in his character of conductor. His love of Bach has only made him the more quick to recognize the good things of the old Italian masters.

GOOD NEWS! And yet it can be no news to our readers, for all must have seen, and read with joy in all the newspapers, the short, significant dispatch which came over the Atlantic cable this week, and which we print again for the pure pleasure of it:

PARIS, July 1, 1867.

To Chickering & Sons, Boston:

In addition to our Gold Medal, I have to-day received a decoration of the Legion of Honor, which puts us at the head of all Piano Exhibitors.

C. F. CHICKERING.

We had already had the official list of all the prizes awarded at the Paris Exposition to Americans and others. The gold medal had been awarded in the names of our two leading Piano Manufacturers, equal honors appearing in the names of Steinway & Chickering placed first. But now it appears that there was a new distinction in reserve for only one; [illegible] which gives the firm of Chickering & Sons the place in the lead. The decoration was presented by the Emperor in person on the grand day of awards, before [illegible] people. Description of the splendid ceremony, the Emperor's speech, &c., are in all the papers; we have only room to copy this:

*After the speech the exhibitors who were in a [illegible] place, marched in the front of the throne each passing separately. [illegible] At each name was called the recipient ascended the steps of the throne, bowing to the Emperor and Empress received from Napoleon's hand the gold medals. These were passed one by one to [illegible] Hercules [illegible], [illegible]. Many of the recipients were called up again and received the decorations of the Legion of Honor; the same ceremony being gone through with as in the case of delivering the medals. The gold medals only were distributed by the Emperor. All together there will be 14,500 recompenses to ninety thousand exhibitors. There are sixty grand prizes, nine hundred gold, three thousand six hundred silver and five thousand bronze medals, and nine thousand honorable mention.

We have never entertained a doubt that the Piano Chickering deserved all this, and we heartily congratulate these noble representatives of Boston, the pride of any American ingenuity of art as well as of such sterling social qualities and graces, on a success so honorably won and so conspicuously awarded.

A well-known lady correspondent of the Chicago Tribune closes a very outspoken letter about the recent New York Festival, as follows:

Sunday evening saw the conclusion of the Festival, when a "Grand Sacred Concert" tolled the knell of departed joys. The concert was hardly "grand"; nor was it even "sacred," notwithstanding that Rossini's Stabat Mater occupied the first part of it. Rossini is a delightful composer, and the Stabat Mater is a fine composition; but it requires a curious effort to consider it as sacred music, all its effects and fioritura being modelled after the Italian operatic school, and the treatment which it generally receives [illegible] rather than diminishing this inclination toward the secular. Of the seven soloists... two were duly received on Sunday night, [illegible] being the Inflammatus... Parepa, and [illegible]... than ever before in New York, and the [illegible]... Fac ut portem, rendered by Madame [illegible]... an encore [illegible]... Not M. An encore was more decided than ever a Pro peccatis, while the quartet of Stabat Mater could hardly have been worse sung, and Parepa's Inflammatus lacked fervor. Whenever an encore is required, Parepa is to produce an effect upon the critical.

Part second was devoted principally to what the New York Tribune calls the "Dances of Death" [illegible]. Parts second and third through a solo and a duet [illegible]... hoped all the ... gone [illegible] that the Festival ... Sunday night and learned ... the sad failure of their [illegible]... Signor [illegible] ... never had ... a low degree, and showed what a wondrous difference there is between singing a note and being an artist. Then Carl Rosa performed a perfectly delightful Andante of Mendelssohn's, on the violin, answering it well, but somehow or other leaving the Mendelssohn's [illegible]... W. Morgan, the organist, [illegible]... the oratorio of John the Baptist. The [illegible] ... when the Baptist had lost ... and as an encore, and added that judging from his [illegible]... the [illegible] must have been made to feel like a chopper? I was greatly shocked by this ... on the part of my friend, and ... [illegible] the [illegible]... The [illegible] ... of the [illegible]... the pen and presented by the daughter of Herodias ... represents the author of the Head in the ... [illegible] Mr. Morgan may be ... informed.

On the whole, the Festival can not be called a musical success, however well it may have been patronized; but it is a beginning, which is something; and from this small beginning a truly great festival may finally be evolved. E. F.

HARTFORD, CONN. The Courant has the following account of Mr. Hatch's New Organ:

The instrument which Mr. Hatch has had fitted up in his house for the use of the people, and for private musical parties, is 14 feet [illegible] and [illegible] feet deep. It [illegible] has been placed the new organ from the manufactory of M. Johnson, of Westfield, Mass. The organ [illegible] a comparison with [illegible] ... in [illegible] ... the voicing and general appointments to an organ in [illegible] ... Music Hall organ by the same builder. The mechanism ... and compass of the instrument ... virtually impossible of performance upon many organs of much larger size. Persons familiar with organs may be interested in the following specifications:—

Compass of manuals, CC to A in alto, 58 notes. Compass of pedals, CCC to [illegible] F, 30 notes.

Great Organ.—Open Diapason, 58 pipes; Melodia, 58; Dulcet Flute, 58; Mixture, three ranks, 174; Clarionet, 58.

Swell Organ.—Open Diapason, 46 pipes; [illegible] 46; stopped diapason, treble and bass, 58; principal 58; bourdon treble and bass, 58; pedal bourdon 30. Total number of pipes, 583.

Mechanical Movements.—Great to swell; swell to pedal; great to pedal; pedal check; engine; tremolo; swell pedal; three combination pedals; pedal to [illegible] tremor.

The organ is blown by water power, one of [illegible] music motors being used. This water engine consists of a double cylinder, containing three valves. These are so arranged that they open to receive the force of water and close after they expel it. The regulator, patented by William H. Thatcher, can be easily adjusted to work to a heavy or light power, so that with a given stream of water, pipes of different sizes may be used. The bellows shuts off the water, so as not to fall, so that there is no waste, and the water gate is opened gradually or suddenly, according to the amount of wind required. A pianoforte pedal, invented by Mr. Clapp, of the firm of Clapp & Bayduck, of this city, and sold by that firm, is used. This is turned by a pedal, and is quite an ingenious contrivance, capable of being applied to a piano, as well as an organ. The exhibition of the instrument was much enjoyed by those present Monday evening.

MILWAUKEE. The 105th concert of the Musical Society, under the direction of Prof. H. Schmidt, took place on the 7th ult., at the Music Hall, with this programme:—Part I. Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.—Part II. "The Rosycross" [illegible] for mixed voices, Schumann; Duet for Piano, Mendelssohn; soprano Aria, with orchestra, from Mozart's Figaro; Capriccio, for three voices, Hauptmann; "The Morning," quintet by Lachner; scene from Gluck's Faust, for violin, piano and organ; Male Chorus, "The Prayer," by Zöllner, with orchestra.

NEW YORK. The only concerts of importance lately have been the popular Sunday Concerts (Sunday Popular) by Mr. Thomas's Orchestra at Terrace Garden. During the absence of Mr. Thomas in Europe, Mr. Eben has conducted. The first programme embraced:—The Overture to the "Vampyr," by Spontini; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Bach's air from Lohengrin, "Ensemble"; A largo from Beethoven's English Symphony; Fugue from Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," and many other pieces of light and pleasant music.

Mr. Thomas has returned and resumed the baton.

LOVERS of Mendelssohn, says an English paper, will be sorry to learn that numerous letters from Mendelssohn have been lately destroyed through an excess of [illegible]... The death of a well known English collector and patron of the fine arts, his valuable property ... of by his ... Among other ... was found a [illegible] ... discovered a letter from Mendelssohn. The [illegible] was full of interest, and inquiry was made to learn if there were no more, when the lady acknowledged that there had been a large collection, but that she, never having heard of the great composer, had destroyed them. She thus inflicted an irreparable loss upon his admirers.

THE GREAT EXPOSITION. The Commission of [illegible] composition have unanimously awarded the [illegible] prize for a Cantata to M. Camille St. Saëns. The jury was composed of Auber, Ambroise Thomas, Berlioz, Félicien David, [illegible] and many more. They devoted four sessions to examining the "one hundred and two" Cantatas sent in competition. Each session lasted from 1 a.m. to 6 p.m. Three other Cantatas obtained honorable mention. The same Jury, after examining the Hymns which were 800 in number, declined to award any prize.

On the 15th of June the Société des Concerts of the Conservatoire gave the second concert in connection with the Exposition. Programme: Beethoven's C minor Symphony; Chorus from the Deux Avares, by Grétry; [illegible] of Beethoven's Septuor; [illegible] double chorus by Lalande; Overture to Euryanthe; Psalm by Marcello.

Rossini has composed a hymn—not that of Peace—to be executed on the 1st of July on the ceremony of the distribution of the Exposition prizes. He has chosen M. Jules Cohen to [illegible].

Gounod is writing a new opera, of which Pomponne de Tonnerre is the subject.

Victor Massé is just now occupied with an opera on the subject of "Paul and Virginia," the libretto being brought by those facile writers MM. Michel Carré and Jules Barbier. This story, it may be recollected, was effectively treated, some sixty years back, by Rodolphe Kreutzer.

Musical Form.

BY W. A. B. [illegible].

A musical work is almost a living creature; it possesses a body and a soul. No other work of man is so truly alive—animate with life. Indeed, who shall say how much or how little of the Divine enters into the composition of those glorious inspirations which we call Master-works!

Music gives us pleasure. A portion of this pleasure is derived from the determinate manner in which the various chapters, or sections of the work are related, so as to become one whole. To the uncultivated ear a single period of striking and simple melody gives pleasure. A second period of independent melody gives pleasure but defaces the distinct impression of the one first heard. A second period may however be so constructed as to deepen the impression of the first. In order to this, it must bear to the first a certain inner relation of significance as well as an outer relation of key and general style. The second period must be as truly a [illegible] the first. Almost every musician can look back to the time when every extended composition was unintelligible to him save in so far as a scrap of melody emerged here and there from the chaos and gave him a rallying point for his scattered thoughts. From beginning to end it was a steady stream of music. At length one perceives that the work which was before so continuous, begins to manifest points of repose. After repeated hearings it is perceived to possess a certain orderly arrangement of parts. It is first seen to divide quite plainly into two or three chapters, each having, so to speak, its own point of crystallization, and all, again, bearing a determinate relation to each other. Finally every period in the whole work is seen to bear a necessary or appropriate relation to every other: the leading and accessory ideas are seen in their appropriate relations; and then it is that one begins to perceive the propriety and beauty of determinate Musical Form.

What, then, is Musical Form? What are its underlying principles? How are these principles manifested in the completed work? These are the questions which present themselves for our solution.

Several melodic phrases may be conjoined to each other in such a way as to form one whole melody or tune. In order to this, certain technical requirements as to relationship of key, time, etc., must be complied with. Moreover, several melodic periods, or a tune, may be conjoined into one piece, so that the listener feels that unity is maintained. And this again, is possible only when certain technical requirements of form and organization have been complied with. Yet again several compositions, each in itself complete and reasonably satisfactory, may be so constructed as to make one whole work: the several chapters of which mutually complement each other. This is seen in the Sonata, Oratorio, Opera, etc. And this possibility of connecting unity exists only in compliance with certain technical requirements of relationship, as before. The full statement of those several grades of laws, by which alone the musical fragments in question can be associated into one whole, constitutes the doctrine of Musical Form. But before proceeding to notice the several musical forms a distinction must be established, viz.:—The most perfect compliance with all possible details, laws in regard to the relationship of these several fragments,—so far as regards their key, tempo, and general similarity or contrast—will not authorize us to associate into one whole melodies which have not a unity of spirit.

Musical Form is determined mainly by two governing principles:—"Unity the type of the Divine Comprehensiveness;" and "Symmetry the type of the Divine Justice." The first requires that the entire work shall manifest a consistent plan; that the end shall have been seen from the beginning. However unexpected modulations or digressions may occur we must be made to feel that they are not inconsistent with the fundamental intent of the piece. Symmetry demands that a due relation shall exist between all the several rhythmic divisions of the work; that one chapter shall not overshadow or be overshadowed by any other. Unity is manifested principally by the relationship of the keys in which the different divisions of the work are written, and by the similarity or appropriate dissimilarity, of the motives employed. Symmetry is manifested in the appropriate extent or brevity of each several part, and in the general rhythmic balance of the work.

In accordance with these laws there have grown up two classes of musical forms:—Determinate and Variable. It is difficult to draw any just line of relative estimate of these two classes of forms. The former are logical. The latter fanciful and very various. Yet who shall say that fancy and imagination are more, or less, noble than a logical pro-do-termined order?

The Determinate Forms begin with the Period. Then follow the Song-forms of two and three periods. These are followed by the song-form with Trio. Next comes the Rondos. The Rondo is the beginning of broad forms. The technical structure of these forms was quite fully considered in No. of this Journal, nearly two years ago. The Rondo is followed by the Sonata, a broader form allowing greater scope for artistic light and shade. (See No. 120 of the Journal.)

The Rondo gives us a picture of a [illegible] or one mood. The Sonata gives us three or four phases of the same artistic nature. It is necessarily ideally nobler than the Rondo. With the Symphony we have the culmination of Sonata, the determinate forms and!

The Variable Forms are as variable in name as form. Most of them conform somewhat to the song-form or the rondo. In fact it is impossible to secure a high degree of artistic unity and symmetry in a composition without being more or less like the rondo form. Mendelssohn's "Whispering Wind" is almost a rondo of the second form. Weber's "Bacchanale" is also a rondo of the second form, without coda.—The theme is the composer's,—and also the episode—is a song form of three periods, of which the first is repeated. To this class of forms belong Overtures, Fantasias, Nocturnes, Ecclesiastical forms, Opera, Cantata, and Oratorio. In the three forms last named are united all the lesser forms. The most often assume the rondo form. The different numbers belonging to the same act of the opera are in as close sympathy with each other as are the separate chapters of a Sonata. There is yet another quasi art-form* which does not belong entirely to either of the classes named. This form is the Fugue. The rank of an art-work is measured by its pathos,—or expression. But the Fugue does not strive in the plane of the Emotional. It belongs rather to the Intellectual. Again, as to the correlation of its periods the Fugue has no determinate form. It's a fantasy yet in its whole technical structure it is not but a creature of the intellect than of the heart. But the vocal fugue becomes a real art work—whenever it aids in rendering the text more impressive. This one may find in the fugue "And He shall reign forever and ever" in Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. But when it is so arranged as to become simply the vehicle for the display of contrapuntal skill, it sinks again out of the plane of the Art sphere into that of the Intellectual. This one may find in the fugue "Cum sancto spiritu" in Mozart's Twelfth Mass and in the "Amen" of the Messiah. In each one discerns the undercurrent of artistic feeling, but how is it overshadowed by the superabundant contrapuntal skill which is everywhere displayed! How then, in fine, shall we define the real artistic value of the Fugue? We answer that no doubt a portion of the true artistic delight consists of "ideas of relation." These ideas we derive from the Fugue more than from any other musical creations. But the noblest and truest mission of music is to express emotion. When otherwise engaged Music has left the sphere in which she can, of every other form of expression and contents on a lower plane a rivalry in communicating ideas rather than feelings—a contest in which she is not sure to come off conqueror. In these she has adversaries with superior means. "Speech, for ideas; tones, for emotions," says a modern writer. We assign to the Fugue, then, a rank subordinate to that of the nobler forms—the Rondo and Sonata—in so far as it expresses less than they.

By universal suffrage of musical artists the Sonata enjoys pre-eminence over all other instrumental forms. It remains to suggest, as briefly as we may, some of the supposed grounds of this pre-eminence. In No. 639 of this JOURNAL—Art, Good Music—quite an extended statement of the theory of the elements of modern aesthetics was made. To that we now refer as furnishing materials available for the determination of the present question. In brief we may say that the Sonata, and more especially in culmination, the Symphony, exceeds all other instrumental forms in the variety of impressions of beauty it may give us. From the same work we may receive ideas of unity, in its various grades, repose, moderation, symmetry, and purity. Moreover it may give us "ideas of power" and "of relation." In no other work is the balance between Symmetry and Unity so well kept: and in the depth and variety of its impressions the Sonata exceeds all other instrumental forms. Is it not, therefore, justly regarded as more noble than the rest?

Extracts from Berlioz.

I.

An admirable singer, the lamented Sontag, at the end of the trio of masks in "Don Giovanni" inserted a phrase which she substituted for the original one. Her example was soon followed;—it was too fine not to be—and the singers of Europe adopted for the rôle of Donna Anna the alteration of Madame Sontag.

One day at a general rehearsal in London, a conductor of my acquaintance, hearing at the end of the trio this malencontreuse substitution, stopped the orchestra and turning to the prima donna asked:

"Well, well, what is the matter? Have you forgotten your part, madam?"

"No, Sir, I am singing the Sontag version."

"Ah! very well; but may I venture to ask why you prefer the Sontag version to the Mozart version, which is the only one that we have anything to do with here?"

"Because it sounds better!"!!!

II.

There is a work of Beethoven known as the Sonata in C-sharp minor, the adagio of which is one of those poems which human language knows not how to characterize. Its means of effect are very simple: the left hand plays softly broad chords of a sad and solemn character, whose length allows the vibrations of the piano to die away gradually on each; above, the first fingers of the right hand play in arpeggios a persistent accompanying figure, the form of which hardly varies from the first measure to the last, while the other fingers sound a sort of lamentation, the melodic flowering of this sombre harmony.

One day, thirty years ago, Liszt was playing the adagio before a little circle of which I was one, and undertook to travesty it, after a fashion he had then taken up to catch the applause of the fashionable public. Instead of the long bass chords, the severe uniformity of rhythm and movement of which I have spoken, he inserted trills and tremolos, he hurried and slackened the time, disturbing by his passionate accents the calm of this sadness, and making the thunder roll through that cloudless sky darkened only by the withdrawing of the sun. I was cruelly annoyed, I confess;—more even than I have been sometimes at hearing our unhappy singers embroider the grand air in "Der Freischütz,"—for to this annoyance was added the distress of seeing such an artist fall into the tracks into which usually only commonplace players fall. But what could be done? Liszt was then like a child who gets up without complaining after a tumble, if you pretend not to see him, but falls to crying if you hold out your hand to him. He has raised himself proudly; and some years after he no longer pursued success, but success was out of breath in following him;—the parts are exchanged.

Let us return to our Sonata. Lately one of those gentle and cultivated men whom artists are so happy to meet had assembled a few friends; I was of the number. * * * * * [Liszt had been playing a piece of Weber's.] As he ended, the lamp which lighted the room seemed on the point of going out; one of us went to re-light it.

"Don't touch it," said I. "If he will play Beethoven's Adagio in C-sharp minor this half-light will not mar it at all."

"Willingly," said Liszt: "but put out the lamp entirely and cover the fire to make the darkness complete."

Then out of this darkness, after a moment's pause, the noble elegy, the same which he had once so strangely disfigured, rose in its sublime simplicity; not a note, not an accent, was added to the notes and accents of the composer. It was the shade of Beethoven, invoked by an artist, whose grand voice we now heard. Each of us trembled in silence, and after the last chord we still maintained the silence;—we wept.

[illegible] Alvaro, being a tenor, [illegible] with a high chest C. [illegible] ... Don Carlo [illegible] ... [illegible]

The music will [illegible] ... [illegible] "Non più [illegible]" ... "Madre, pietosa Vergine" ... [illegible] "La Vergine degli angeli" [illegible] ... lighted her hearers and made them pleased even with the commonplace duet of the forest, "Ah! [illegible]" But his chief effects were in the third act. Alvaro's aria, "[illegible]," a melodious and characteristically Verdian effusion, preceded with a recitative and a long prelude, in which there is a pretty clarinet solo, produced a sensation, and the audience would gladly have heard it a second time. The bold melody of the finale with chorus, "[illegible]," a parallel to the similarly placed "[illegible]" of "Il Trovatore," was given out with such sustained force, such reckless energy, that the singer could only just [illegible] [illegible] and two [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] was however [illegible], and the audience were in [illegible], [illegible] the popular tenor with an [illegible]. Signor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] is perfectly admirable as Don Carlo. There is not the shadow of [illegible] to be found with any phrase that he sings [illegible] the course of the opera, but [illegible] [illegible] effect [illegible] in the [illegible], "[illegible]," the slow movement of which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the best [illegible] opera. It was splendidly [illegible] English [illegible], the elaborate [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Equal [illegible] [illegible] Madame Trebelli [illegible] the part of [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A [illegible] [illegible], was deservedly applauded and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] encored. In this [illegible] would not have written but for [illegible] [illegible] "Les Huguenots," [illegible] throughout the opera, the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] very efficient. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the prophecy of [illegible] act. [illegible] "[illegible]," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the principal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] high above the [illegible] opera, was its [illegible] [illegible]. Not only were the chief singers at their [illegible] as they [illegible], but the subordinate characters were equally [illegible] [illegible] and Mr. [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] was excellent as the [illegible]. The scenery [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and more than usual attention had apparently been paid to the details of the [illegible].

That [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Verdi's [illegible] opera "La Forza del Destino" will be a [illegible]. It abounds with [illegible] and [illegible] melody. It [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and strong [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and is [illegible] admirably performed [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] public is certain. At the same time [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which Verdi for twenty years has kept [illegible] before our eyes.

Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

Just twenty years ago a "star from the North" came to throw [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at that [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] Lumley [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of Her Majesty's Theatre [illegible] [illegible] "Roberto." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] changed. [illegible] [illegible] —said Robert Schumann [illegible] Nightingale [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Covent Garden [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Now in the present year, up to the moment, the fortunes of Her Majesty's Theatre have looked anything but bright. The old [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mdlle. Titiens as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Signor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and Madame Trebelli-Bettini [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of Verdi's [illegible] [illegible] "I Lombardi" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible].

[illegible]," which pleased so greatly three years since, and promised to become a stock piece in the repertory, was scarcely more faithful. True, the cast of Nicolai's opera was inferior to that of 1864, when [illegible] played Fenton, M. [illegible] [illegible] Falstaff, and Mdlle. [illegible] Mrs. Ford—parts now represented with far less efficiency by Mr. Tom Hohler, Herr Rokitansky, and Madame [illegible]-Lablache. No matter what the cause, however, "Falstaff" did little for the season. The "Huguenots" itself appeared to have lost its charm, since [illegible] [illegible] "Marguerite" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Mdlle. Titiens [illegible]. One gleam of hope [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] [illegible] of Weber's "Oberon," which attracted an immense audience, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mdlle. Titiens, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Oberon," was not repeated. There was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], there was [illegible] Signor Arditi with his orchestra and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Her Majesty's Theatre, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Royal Italian Opera [illegible] "Swedish Nightingale," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by magic. Mdlle. Christine Nilsson [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] very little attention was paid in the fact. Mdlle. [illegible] de Murska had also been [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] London [illegible] original "Swedish Nightingale." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] appeared, and though the opera was that naughty "Traviata," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. She came, [illegible] saw, she conquered.

The history of Mdlle. Nilsson, so far as it concerns the public, may be briefly told. She came out [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris as the heroine in a French version of the same "Traviata," and as the [illegible] [illegible] of Violetta [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Revue des Deux Mondes [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson's [illegible] M. [illegible] Martha [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Lady Henriette [illegible]. One of the [illegible] [illegible] of M. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Théâtre Lyrique [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] French versions of German opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was the production of "Die Zauberflöte," under the title of "La Flûte Enchantée." The part of Astrifiammante [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson [illegible] Mozart's favourite opera at the Théâtre Lyrique [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson [illegible]. Indeed French amateurs, almost [illegible]

[illegible] hailed "la phénomène," and although we are not quite able to understand what "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]" may precisely signify, inasmuch as we never heard of [illegible] to a height, or [illegible] to a height, or [illegible] by any means to heights that are inaccessible, we are quite prepared to share the enthusiasm of the critic whose [illegible] [illegible] we have quoted. Christine Nilsson became the talk of Paris; and the words applied by an American dignitary to the celebrated "Madame Lange, for whom Mozart composed the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]"—which the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], were as fitly applied to her. "The Queen of Night" [illegible] the Paris [illegible] and the singing of Mdlle. Nilsson made even the music of Mozart [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Lutetia.

It is only natural that a reputation so brilliant, although [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] by a single performance—for it was the [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson should be offered the opportunity of [illegible] [illegible] in London. With two young [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the highest pretensions [illegible] Mdlle. [illegible] de Murska [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Lumley [illegible] Verdi has composed [illegible] [illegible] very little short of perfect. [illegible].

We shall not attempt to follow the new comer step by step through the entire performance, because we [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] more favourable opportunities [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "La Traviata" [illegible] should like to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the stage. [illegible] Mdlle. Nilsson [illegible] Violetta's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the only reason that she does not play the character as the author intended it, as Madame Doche used to play it at the French theatre, and Mdlle. Piccolomini in the Italian operatic version; and that we are half left to believe that consumption has nothing to do with the matter, and that Violetta dies mostly out of love, like "a maid forsaken and disconsolate." The wisest conclusion, in our opinion, that Mdlle. Nilsson could possibly adopt would be to abandon such parts altogether and confine herself to a healthier repertory.

In conclusion, let us not be over-sanguine. Mdlle. Nilsson has been compared with Jenny Lind. They are both Swedes; we are aware; but it is necessary to bear in mind that Jenny Lind's range of characters was varied and extensive—Italian, German, and French opera being equally at her command. Should Mdlle. Nilsson prove equally versatile, and be a artist for the art she professes, and ever more to maintain such a fame. There, however, [illegible] show. The high esteem of her capacity entertained abroad may be gathered from the fact that she is engaged at the Grand Opéra, at Paris, to play the part of Ophelia in M. Ambroise Thomas's forthcoming opera of "Hamlet." We can much more readily picture to ourselves an ideal Ophelia in Mdlle. Nilsson than a musical Hamlet from M. Thomas; but the [illegible] confirmed [illegible] to [illegible] in [illegible] On the other hand one thing is certain—Madame Miolan Carvalho will [illegible] see her most formidable rival removed from the Théâtre Lyrique [illegible].

Meanwhile Mdlle. Nilsson sings a second part in London in Martha, [illegible]. She, too, was "enchantress"—but with a difference.—Saturday Review, June 15th.

A New Organ.

(From the Chicago Republican.)

The completion of the great organ in the Boston Music Hall was hailed as an event of national interest. It was a novelty, and crowds flocked to see and hear it. There was little of Old World grandeur in its measure issues that marked a new chord in America. Its [illegible] cities quickly caught the spirit. Brooklyn and Worcester have already their large organs; and the Young Men's Christian Association now propose to devote fifty or sixty thousand dollars to the purchase of one for Chicago. The Jesuit church is also to have one, at a cost of about thirty thousand dollars.

Every advancing [illegible] that [illegible] by [illegible] to do with it, there are significant facts in our musical history, and taken in connection with the rapid succession [illegible] within the last few years, [illegible] much for its future. It has not been very long since organs commonly were the only thing of any American [illegible] of music. In the [illegible] of the [illegible] in the streets, and even in church [illegible] program and solemn measures, the simple [illegible] were heard [illegible]. There was an occasional [illegible] of [illegible] by [illegible] quaint orchestra of [illegible] which [illegible] of a [illegible] of which Mr. [illegible] has lost caught the public [illegible]. But [illegible] so long [illegible] and [illegible] that [illegible] to be unearthed, perhaps, the most [illegible] of the [illegible] century and held by [illegible] of the Troubadours and Minnesingers, as a part of [illegible] Americas.

Next followed a deluge of sacred ballads. Scarce one small [illegible]. It touched the heart of the people, and forthwith the country was flooded with sentimental [illegible] of bad poetry and worse music. [illegible] were the burdens of the song. Good they were, certainly, but they suggested the [illegible] good little boy of the Sunday school books. He grew to be dreadfully tiresome if he is good, and one cannot help cherishing the naughty wish to read about some bad little boy, if the bad little boy only won't be stupid. It was the first timid venture of Puritanism into the field of secular art, if art it could be called; and it probably was not done in [illegible] to make it more [illegible]. Still, it reflected a pleasant phase in our social [illegible], and developed a few songs of real characteristic music or forms of which the rest were diluted imitations.

The war brought a taste of patriotic songs, modelled mostly after the [illegible] forms. These fulfilled their mission and passed with the occasion. But the war brought also the necessity of sincere feeling to great [illegible]. Music [illegible] took a graver tone of thought. The current of life deepened. After the storm the "still small voice" was heard. That is caught in more [illegible] forms. The [illegible] was ripe to receive the seeds of an old experience that were cast here from over the country through the grand [illegible] of foreign masters. It remains for us to see what shall spring up and bear fruit, and what shall stand and become mature.

But one of the most hopeful signs of the development of a solid taste is the demand for organs and organ music. Art, abolished from whatever [illegible] rulers of vanity or fashion, becomes a teacher. Love follows knowledge. The influence of the organ as a moral power finds ample [illegible]. It is essentially the interpreter of sacred music and naturally follows in the wake of strong religious convictions. Or is it a cause as well as an effect? It was the chief instrument of Germany in its evangelical [illegible] that preceded Klopstock and Lessing, and produced Bach, the great monarch of the organ, and the master of the Protestant type of music. In it we have [illegible] the religious [illegible] element of which Mendelssohn is the best modern exponent, and is the basis of the grand choral music of Germany.

The [illegible] of France are more dramatic. Its taste is formed from the operatic stage. The [illegible] is too grave for the [illegible] French character. The orchestra is better adapted even to the brilliant Catholic service and their organs are made to differ from the German in the predominance of the [illegible] stops. But in England, the influence of the organ can be more clearly traced. English taste is preeminently solid. It has [illegible] and [illegible] the marks of the Chinese [illegible], "Truth first [illegible]. "We like them because we [illegible] well governed. If their manners be good or bad, [illegible] be [illegible] persons." England is [illegible] the home of the oratorio. Handel and Mendelssohn have always found there the largest audiences, and the warmest admirers. She has also the finest organs [illegible] in the world. With these [illegible] across the English [illegible] [illegible] it leads us to conclude that a taste will [illegible] has grown out of strong [illegible] consequence is not [illegible] [illegible] model [illegible] of a [illegible] that always sleeps upon the [illegible] of [illegible].

The still more [illegible] of American taste is scarcely yet determined, but there is a [illegible] element in our [illegible] life which must find its best expression in the [illegible] of music of which the organ is the interpreter. A large organ [illegible] as [illegible] a large [illegible]. This [illegible] the [illegible] ahead waiting in Chicago in connection with the Musical Conservatory [illegible] large organ may become the [illegible] with [illegible] power. What such a [illegible] and a [illegible] [illegible] other [illegible] the [illegible] and we might [illegible] of time [illegible] for something like the [illegible] where [illegible] the grand [illegible] with a [illegible] effect that can scarcely be conceived, and the bearing of which forms no [illegible].

Music Abroad.

London.

Crystal Palace. The beautiful Palace, as help repair the ravages by fire, took a benefit on its own account in the last week of June. An immense audience filled the [illegible] and the galleries adjacent. The orchestra was filled by some 2500 singers and players the very best that London could bring together. Very seldom has any concert so many artists of the highest rank. The management, aided by Handel [illegible], were [illegible] by the Sacred Harmonic Society. "The Crystal Palace," as the Times says, "has done a world of good for music; and it is only right that a [illegible] of such musicians should come forward to lend a helping hand to the Crystal Palace," which they did [illegible]. The first part consisted of copious selections from Elijah, Mr. Costa conducting. According to the Times:—

"A finer execution of Elijah, or rather of those portions of Elijah selected for performance, was never heard in this country. The choruses were superb, from 'Help, Lord!' [illegible] to the indescribable [illegible], to 'And then shall your light break forth.' The natural [illegible] of the [illegible] and also of [illegible] a performance—one grand [illegible] of the admirable [illegible] and [illegible] the selection had been made. [illegible] more than one of the choral performances—as for example [illegible] will [illegible] 'Hear our cry,' [illegible] 'He watching over Israel,' which as the [illegible] and [illegible] we do not remember to have been surpassed; and last and greatest of all, 'Thanks be to God! He laveth the thirsty land,' which might bear comparison with the most successful achievements of any of the Handel Festivals; but it is enough to record that general and hearty commendation which is the just due of a performance almost from first to last irreproachable. The tempi, too, of each chorus were taken to absolute perfection. How the solo vocal parts were sustained by Miss Tietjens, Madame Rudersdorff and Madame Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley, may easily be imagined. On such an occasion it would be out of place to criticise the performance of these distinguished artists; but [illegible] they [illegible] excellent [illegible] to their several [illegible] under any circumstances, they would have afforded the most exacting critic [illegible] of exercising his function. Enough that the mission from the two parts of Elijah—a very [illegible] one, including the majority of the finest pieces—was heard with unqualified satisfaction from beginning to end; and the only regret was that under such unusual conditions, the whole of the sublime oratorio of modern times could not be presented. The occasional 'plaudits' at Exeter Hall of the 'contingent 1400,' representing the quota supplied by London to the Handel Festival Chorus, have borne good fruits.

The second part was miscellaneous. It began with such a performance of Auber's overture to Masaniello as would have made its composer twenty years younger could he have heard it. The orchestra, with the strong [illegible] as one man under the [illegible] of a conductor [illegible] the movement of vast masses [illegible] orchestral general [illegible] of Europe. The effect was 'electric.' The overture was called for again amid a storm of applause, and repeated with the same precision and effect. Another 'sensation' was produced, immediately afterwards, by Madame Grisi in 'The Minstrel Boy.' The [illegible] and [illegible] this, one of the greatest of [illegible] melodies. It was old and always [illegible] remembered favorite, [illegible] itself in every letter and so [illegible] as it was heartily cheered how thoroughly her efforts had been appreciated. Scarcely was public performer received with more marked and significant favor. Then came the famous duet 'Crudel perchè' from Mozart's Figaro sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Gassier, as it has so frequently been sung in the Royal Italian Opera and most [illegible]. But the bright [illegible] a performance by Mdlle. Adelina Patti, with Mr. T. Harper as trumpet—[illegible] had the overwhelming enthusiasm. The [illegible] duet from Norma, sung by Signora Nandin and Brignoli, and the great scena of Leonora from Fidelio, in which the [illegible] voice of Madame Marie Vilda was heard with fine effect [illegible] and were succeeded by Mr. Costa's [illegible] 'Ecco [illegible] sung by Mlle. Adelina Patti, Signor Mario, and M. [illegible] Faure. It was one of the most [illegible] of [illegible] and no wonder that it should be [illegible] asked for again. To say nothing of Mlle. Patti, whose part it would have been difficult to fill so well, it was a treat to hear the greatest of [illegible] and the greatest of English tenors join their voices together in a piece of music so admirably calculated to display the best qualities of each. After the [illegible] a [illegible] pianoforte fantasia on 'Home sweet Home,' played by Madame Arabella Goddard as she, and played it over and over again, and received with the honor as a [illegible] always been accorded from the first helped to make popular this very popular composition. The [illegible] from Rossini's Mosè in Egitto, glorious in its majestic simplicity, was admirably given by the chorus and received as a matter of course. To this succeeded the air with chorus, 'Con il [illegible]' from Donizetti's Don Pasquale, in which Signor Mario, [illegible] the solo part. 'Hush, ye pretty warbling choir,' from Handel's Acis and Galatea, charmingly sung by Madame Sherrington as [illegible], Mr. Beckwith [illegible] the magnificent air with chorus, 'Sound an Alarm,' from the same composer's Judas Maccabæus, splendidly declaimed by Mr. Sims Reeves, who has long made it his own; the [illegible] trio from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, with Mesdames Grisi, Rudersdorff, and [illegible] Dolby, in Carolina, Elisabetta, and Fidalma; '[illegible] the duo [illegible] with its [illegible] and grand [illegible] Santley [illegible] M. [illegible] Faure; and [illegible] [illegible] 'See the conquering hero comes,' in which the solo parts were undertaken by Mesdames Sherrington, Rudersdorff and Dolby; a [illegible] to a concert almost [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. The only regret was that Miss Tietjens, who had delighted everybody present with her singing of 'Hear ye Israel,' and 'Holy! Holy!' in Elijah, had nothing put down for her in the "miscellaneous" selection.

The Prince of Wales remained through the whole of Elijah and until about the middle of the second part. The concert was a brilliant success, and it is hoped may prove of substantial advantage to the Crystal Palace.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD. The London papers are ringing the praises of their favorite pianist, for giving a performance consisting of a selection from Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, except that Mme. Sainton-Dolby sang songs and words between the four groups of the selection, each consisting of four.

OPERA. At Her Majesty's, the Nilsson had appeared in her second rôle, Gounod's Margaret, with increase of admiration. They say she loses all recollection of herself in the character of Goethe. Mme. Trebelli was the Siebel, Sig. Gardoni, Faust, and [illegible], Mephistopheles.—The succeeding pieces were the Huguenots, Faust again, Traviata again, and then the long promised Forza del Destino," followed by Faust, Martha, Faust &c., &c.

At Covent Garden, meanwhile, they had Semiramide, with [illegible] Don Carlos again, La Traviata with Lucca, Mario and Graziani, L'Africaine, Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, Faust, Crispino, with repetitions of some of these. Gounod's Romeo et Juliette is in rehearsal.

Of Verdi's "La Forza" we have already copied one description, strongly condemnatory of the plot. Another critic says:

Its ghastly horrors, and strained combinations like this, Signor Verdi revels, but sometimes without even such inspiration as evinces it, has made. In "La Forza" all is violence and elaboration. Hardly [illegible] be found from the first to the last [illegible] [illegible] of the same faded form of [illegible] [illegible] with some [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the man which have met the success of French opera [illegible], since they belong to the style of the country. History would have been content with his forefathers had it not been [illegible]. Signor Verdi is [illegible] to [illegible] as home [illegible]. There is considerable [illegible] in some of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There is Don Alvaro's [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Weber's [illegible] [illegible] phrases. But that the [illegible] [illegible] we are satisfied and even in this branch of his skill Signor Verdi [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] is successful. The [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Signor Verdi has [illegible]—the [illegible] with [illegible] chorus No. [illegible] Act 3. There is a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the music [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The Tarantella, No. [illegible] [illegible] but we could not easily name anything more commonplace than the gypsy's [illegible] song and chorus. One or two other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] hardly be mentioned [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in Nabucco, Ernani and Il Trovatore. There is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the dark and [illegible] forward in the bright [illegible] [illegible] different conditions of [illegible] and progress. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Verdi [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] of the few [illegible] [illegible] of Europe [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of false pose and decay. The performance at Her Majesty's Theatre is, in many respects, as good as could possibly be obtained for [illegible] [illegible] violent and so complicated. Mlle. Tietjens and Signor [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Signor Verdi's music, and [illegible] [illegible]. Mme. Trebelli Bettini gave the [illegible] [illegible] of Preziosilla the gypsy [illegible]—as she always [illegible] [illegible] the part is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] more than one passage. [illegible] [illegible] performance we have spoken. Mr. Tom Hohler and Herr Rokitansky were [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] had been taken to prepare the opera, and the public [illegible] it well. Whether the success is to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as has been seen.

HALLÉ'S MUSICAL UNION. The sixth Matinée (June 18) was made famous by the first performance since 1859 of Anton Rubinstein, "the greatest of living pianists" (in the opinion of the Director) and "composer of a vast collection of important works for the theatre and concert room." Vieuxtemps also took part, with Ries for second violin, Goffrie and [illegible] viola, and Jacquard violoncello, and, according to the Director, there never was anything so fine as their rendering of the following programme:

Quartet, B flat, No. 46 [illegible]	Haydn.

PHILHARMONIC. The seventh concert of the Old Society was one of the most interesting yet given. The selections were: Symphony No. [illegible] in E flat, Spohr. Prelude and Benediction from Beethoven's great Mass in D sung by Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. [illegible], Messrs. Morgan and Santley, with violin obbligato by Mr. Wagner. Scenes from Fingal [illegible] by Tietjens. Beethoven's [illegible] [illegible], the piano part by Mme. Arabella Goddard, and for Part Second, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night."

The third and fourth of Dr. Wylde's excellent New Philharmonic Concerts, in St. George's Hall, were as attractive as either of their predecessors. At the third we had Mendelssohn's earliest and [illegible] symphony—the one in C minor [illegible] [illegible] the age of [illegible] [illegible] composed under [illegible] [illegible]. Dr. Wylde had the good taste to perform the original [illegible] of the symphony instead of the one arranged from the Octet by Mendelssohn at the [illegible] of the Philharmonic Society. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Overture in [illegible] and Wagner's Ocean, each received a [illegible] remarkable [illegible]. Beethoven's [illegible] pianoforte concerto was played in his most finished manner by Mr. Hallé, who introduced in the first and last movements the composer's own cadenzas. Vocal music was contributed by the young and promising Miss [illegible] and Mlle. Pauline Lucca, the last of whom was compelled to repeat the "Jewel song" from Gounod's Faust.

At the fourth concert the symphony was that of Mendelssohn in A minor (the "Scotch") very finely played, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible] [illegible], one of the best of our English violinists, gave Spohr's so-called "Dramatic Concerto" with remarkable neatness and brilliancy of execution, and with unfaltering success. There was [illegible] [illegible] in this [illegible] varied programme—the other being Beethoven's [illegible] and [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Madame Arabella Goddard has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to put in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than that she played it [illegible] [illegible] brilliancy and deep [illegible] feeling and was [illegible] [illegible] recalled [illegible] [illegible] the orchestra [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] were Mayerbeer's [illegible] and highly dramatic [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Struensee and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Mr. T. H. [illegible], an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] distinguished musician and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at the end of the concert [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a master [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the symphonies [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Tennyson's account could hardly have been surprised at this [illegible] the contrary [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] must have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Dr. Wylde however has proved himself an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible]'s [illegible] [illegible]. The vocal music of the concert was contributed by Mlle. [illegible] and Signor Gassier—the first of whom was loudly applauded after her [illegible] delivery of the [illegible] of Agathe, from Weber's Der Freischütz—well known as [illegible] [illegible] Her Majesty's Theatre.

At the fifth and last concert, on Wednesday week, the symphony was Beethoven's No. [illegible], the concertos Hummel's in A [illegible] for pianoforte, played by Miss Kate Roberts (one of Dr. Wylde's most promising pupils) and Mendelssohn's for violin, by Herr A. [illegible]; the overtures were that of Signor Schira to his opera, Nicolo dei Lapi, and Weber's [illegible] Preciosa. The singers were Madame Trebelli-Bettini and Signor Morini, from Her Majesty's Theatre. Signor Schira's spirited, brilliant and favorable overture was finely played, and the composer loudly called forward at the end.—Musical World.

MR. HALLÉ'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS, in St. James's Hall, become more and more interesting as they proceed. The introduction at each of one of the sonatas of Schubert has proved a most interesting feature. Next to the sonatas of Beethoven, those of Schubert rank indisputably highest for originality and rich variety of invention. Schubert has only left ten such works, but each in its way is a masterpiece. At the fifth recital (yesterday week) Mr. Hallé played the sonata in A minor, Op. 143, which, like [illegible] [illegible], was not published till after the death of the composer—and which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to Mendelssohn, who doubtless would have preferred that every [illegible] [illegible] Schubert himself. This sonata [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and forcible in expression [illegible] finely played and thoroughly appreciated by Mr. Hallé's select audience. Another [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] series of "Recitals" is the introduction of [illegible] [illegible] for pianoforte and violoncello, the post of [illegible] being held by that [illegible] [illegible] Signor Piatti. The [illegible] of Beethoven for those instruments [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], the one on Friday week, being the second of Op. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] composed in the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible]. The last movement of which—an elaborately [illegible] fugue—is reckoned among the Beethoven puzzles; but, in the hands of two such players as Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti, it comes out with crystal-line clearness. The Beethoven sonatas being exhausted, the two by Mendelssohn are included at the sixth and seventh "Recitals" respectively.

Paris.

Nearly all the music [illegible] here has centered upon the Great Exposition; for instance: July 1st, the [illegible] [illegible] of Peace, a [illegible] [illegible] distribution of the prizes. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of "Peace," with six [illegible] bells and [illegible] of cannon.—July 4th. Great Exposition Concert, conducted by Hainl, with 150 orchestra players and 500 Chorus singers: the Ephigenie overture with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Hebry Gounod of Wagner's [illegible] Hymn to Peace," by [illegible] Chorus from Judas Maccabæus, the Peace Chorus by [illegible] [illegible], &c.—On the 9th and [illegible] [illegible] Concerts of the French Orpheonistes (men's singing societies.)—On the [illegible] International competition of male singing societies: 6000 singers, including 800 French societies, the "Polyhymnia" from Cologne, the "Legia" from Liege, the "Orfeo [illegible]" from [illegible], the "Tonic-sol-fa" from England, the "Cecilia" from Geneva, &c.—14th, grand competition of brass instruments: 3000 [illegible].—15th and 16th competition of Harmonie-musik; and on the 21st, International competition of 11 military corps.

This is the veritable [illegible] [illegible] by Rossini to his wonderful Hymn: a childish effort of his old age apparently, and which (by all accounts) was not impressive, and conducted [illegible] to prevent its being forgotten as soon as it was heard:

Passy [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

A contemporary states that M. Gounod has undertaken as the subject of his next opera the story [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of "Francesca da Rimini." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] are great, we [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the treatment of a subject [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of a [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] which are, so [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of it [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] written for the Opéra Comique. Then M. Gounod [illegible] [illegible] of Rome was clearly displayed in his "Mélodies," that he is a delicate master of what may be called Mendelssohn pathos (its deficit of a hearty spirit?) is proved in his readings of Schubert's songs, where the music (that is saying much) adds to the words a beauty equal to their own. The world would, indeed, have a good opera of Rubinstein's, along the more high flown illustrations of any episode in the Divine [illegible].—Athenæum.

HILDESHEIM. The Musical World (London) has the following letter:

J. S. Bach's Matthäus Passion was lately performed in St. Michael's Church, Hildesheim, with the most gratifying success. That such a performance was possible in a town no larger than ours [illegible] for the skill and energy of Herr Nick, who, for the last [illegible] years, has devoted himself, [illegible] here and worked [illegible] Vocal Association, and at [illegible] at last to a state of great effectiveness. Herr Nick was ably supported by his professional [illegible]. Mme. Joachim sang the [illegible] very finely. The [illegible] of the air in the second part, [illegible] being undertaken by [illegible] that Herr Joachim himself produced [illegible] effect. There was a [illegible] of this own. Herr Donner from Cassel, Herr [illegible] from Hanover, and Herr [illegible] of Weimar.—As a party after the concert, Herr Joachim [illegible] "May the book of the most [illegible] art which [illegible] have found in Hildesheim, [illegible] continue to extend its [illegible] matter?" [illegible] the non-German [illegible] informed that the German for "brook" is "Bach."

BERLIN.—The opera will open here in the beginning of August with Auber's Fra Diavolo. The principal character will be sustained by Herr Gran. —A monument [illegible] has been erected to the memory of Mlle. de Ahna, whose premature death was so great a loss to the art. The artists of the Royal Theatre organized a musical festival for the occasion.

GOTHA.—Spohr's oratorio of Die letzten Dinge was performed under the direction of Herr Wandersleb at the concert for the [illegible] Fund.

LEIPZIG.—A new opera, Faustina Hasse, by Herr Louis Schubert, of Dresden, is to be given here next season.

HALLE.—The Singakademie gave a performance of Handel's Alexander's Feast at the commencement of the present month.

The Coronation Mass of the Abbé Liszt, performed at Pesth the other day, says the Gazette Musicale, produced a great effect. It is written in a style of [illegible] from that of the Gran Mass. In it the [illegible] plays the most important part. A singularity is to be noticed in the "Credo," sung a plain song as in the Church of the Dominicans at Rome, and simply accompanied by the organ, which follows the voices a [illegible] harmony.

About Fugues.

An old contributor gives us to-day another of his very clear and methodical papers on the subject of Musical Form. For the most part he puts things in their right relations; but there is one point on which we think his remarks are likely to mislead. He calls the Fugue a "mere Art-form;" and by his development of the statement it appears that the word is meant to qualify equally the term Art and the term Form; that is, he denies that a Fugue has form and that it properly falls within the sphere of Art. We respectfully put in a few hints in plea for arrest of judgment.

1. Is the rank of a work of Art to be "measured by its pathos or expression" and that only? Can you not with a moment's thought recall a hundred of the choicest pieces of such artists as Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, &c., not characterized at all by pathos? Expression they of course have, but not in that sense. What shall we say of the Mendelssohn's Fairy Music? what of the Zauberflöte overture? what of a thousand exquisite things in hearing which heart, soul, imagination wander free, float in delicious reverie, forget the emotions of the hour, with all that is simply personal or dramatic, lose the sense of time and seem to realize eternity? Much of the purest, truest music simply sets the soul free, and gives play to an inner spiritual life, which is as much deeper than particular emotions, as these are deeper than cold formalism. It would be nearer to the fact to say that the measure of a work of Art, in Music as in other arts, is its spirit, its character, meaning, genius,—all summed up in the fullest sense of the word Beauty. Expression of course (if not defined by mere pathos or emotion) is an excellent criterion of genius, and worth in any Art. But how many persons fail to find expression in that which happens to express something more or other than they may have experienced! But you hardly into the Fugues (meaning as he merely wrote in the fugue style) if you feel no life, no quickening, and there, have I never occurs to you that Bach possibly had something deeper to express, some most secure experience, some inner one, somewhere than you in your most fanciful mood have felt the need of tones or words for? Can you not trust the mystical charm of beauty that which haunts in so many a piece of music of which it would be hard as anyone than able to try to say what I now mean to express? Why not own its power the almost as we do that of Nature, of the waves rolling in on the beach (there are fugues for you!) of the broad landscape, the [illegible] influences which takes possession of our souls, and yet we cannot analyze or understand them any better than a simple listener understands a Bach fugue, though it stir him to the depths of his soul and lift him above himself into the breath of higher life? To be sure one great secret of the charm of Nature is, that she sympathizes with all our soul's sweetest, grandest, most unutterable secrets, all our best moods and aspirations. Well, just so does true piece of music, in that form which we maintain to be the most spiritual of all, the Fugue, or at least a piece conceived and wrought out in the spirit of the fugue form, a Fugue which has genuine life like those of Bach, and not a mechanical ground one (for mechanical music one should not count in any kind of Art)—just so does such a Fugue, even though we cannot analyze its technical structure, seem to sympathize with the soul of the listener who is otherwise prepared and open to the influence as he is to that of Nature.

2. Much more is it, besides the spiritual susceptibility or inward support one has analyzed and studied, has learned to trace the leading theme, the secondary subject, throughout the tangled web, to recognize the cantus firmus, the rational thoughts and phrases, the effects of development, the close and rapid gathering of all the motives at the end &c. No poetic spot, finds Nature loses beauty by any study of which her poor faculties are capable; on the contrary the nearer we come to her the more we feel. And so it is with a fine Fugue that has genius in it. The fact that its structure is such that it is governed by stricter laws than other forms, that the melodic motives are short and few, does not preclude being also a great deal more than that, does not empty it of such live soul and genius as there may be in its author; nay, if he be master of the art as Bach was, it may become second nature to him, he will revel in it as a native language, pliant to his every mood, and the product will be as spontaneous as a snatch of song—to such a master. The first question, after all, is that of genius. The next is that of culture, mastery of tools, economy of means; and that leads us to consider

3. The Fugue as an Art form. According to Mr Mathews, "the Fugue [illegible] its correlation of periods, has no determinate form; it is a fantasy." But a fantasy as surely as it has genius, has form of some kind. If you cannot find it as any code of laws, it makes laws unto itself. Strange that what is objected to as being all law (mere counterpoint, skill and patience) should be suddenly so unclaimed! The Fugue, we venture to suggest, is the vital principle of musical form; and the great secret of all form, the very soul of it. Whatever music does not more or less imply the Fugue principle, though it need not be strict Fugue, is likely to be poor and shallow music. The Fugue is simply development, the logical unfolding of what is latent in a given one theme. It is of course what the spiral law of growth is in the plant. It has its correspondences in other arts; in nothing perhaps so strikingly as in those wonderful creations of Architecture, which are the farthest removed from mere mechanics and geometry, which speak most to the soul and the imagination and almost seem alive and growing years ago, moving upward as we look at them, the old Gothic Churches. There is the Fugue in visible solid form, the same persistence of detail, the same endless echoing and imitation of motives and partial motives, phrases, with quaint particulars, a thousand pinnacle arches, clustered columns, spires and ornaments all simply growing to a climax yet to the end still hinting further growth, still moving on the process of [illegible] never absolutely [illegible] finishing detail mechanically, actually, but ideally suggesting still the infinite, the unutterable in form. This suggestion of the Infinite is what we would call the expression of the Fugue. (But mind it must be a fugue of genius.) So too it has its counter-types, or shall we say its prototypes in Nature; in the waves rolling up the beach or the waves that run along a field of grain before the wind; in the tongues of flame losing themselves and reappearing as it all soars and seeks the sky.

Yes, we count the Fugue is the perfect type of unity in variety. It is Nature's own law, the true method of genius left to act, obeyed unconsciously by the inmost necessity of Art and of its own soul. True to nature genius could not do otherwise. It was simply letting germs, seed-thoughts (motives themes we call them technically) grow. To be bound always strictly to the Fugue form is pedantry; but not to know it, not to feel it, is not to imply it even in free composition, is to forsake the real boast of imagination. All the great composers, the real creators, whose works live forever,—Beethoven for instance, who seldom wrote fugues as such—working by a true instinct with Nature and the hidden laws of essential form or unity, all imply the Fugue; whatever they write they have its secret in their blood, in their hearts, the soul of all their method; only they are so familiar with it that they need not literally present it. It lay at the basis of their culture. No one is fairly master of the free forms until he is master of the Fugue. That is, wherever there is harmony, wherever there is more than one part, it is essential to true art that the parts move individually; that there be some centripetal tendency; now all counterpoint implies fugue at bottom.

4. And now we see why one never exhausts the interest of a good fugue. There may be mechanical dry fugues; but there are also [illegible] [illegible] one never gets hackneyed, never drops and permeates the soul like popular melodies when too much ventilated through street organs and the like. For it treats its theme, develops, serves it up as such [illegible] [illegible] perpetual recreation, and [illegible] itself; and so invests it with perennial youth and freshness; at one no more here you now than one the theme, the motive, echoed and repeated throughout the whole upward floating spire-like mass of a Strassburg or Cologne Cathedral. All [illegible] possible abuse of repetition is provided for and obviated in this structural development, this centripetal transfiguration [illegible] beyond reach of the curse of commonplace, so that it cannot spoil. Right healthy music are the fugues of Bach, and hearty too. And this brings us back again to expression.

5. If Fugues were merely "intellectual," wholly out of the sphere of feeling, sentiment, expression, they would all affect us very much alike. On the contrary they differ in character, in mood, as unmistakably as songs [illegible] or rondos, or sonatas. Take the "Well tempered Clavichord" alone; it furnishes a [illegible] of every sort. Some of its fugues are profoundly solemn and religious; some [illegible] [illegible] mood of calm and dreamy reverie; some [illegible] among melancholy; some buoyant and [illegible] [illegible] others leap like a fountain in the sunshine; here and there a fine fancy like enough for Mendelssohn; others are triumphant, bold, full of resolve. Some are impassioned, agitated movements; but in the most the soul possesses itself in a serene tranquillity. Had they not strong they are as a rule, and at the same time [illegible] and spiritual. Of course they bear the spirit of their maker,—those which are not made mechanically. Those were made [illegible] those [illegible] there [illegible] [illegible] follow of fancy, those imaginative in the fugues of Bach. Or take Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute;" is there no poetry no romance, more of the genial Mozart temper there? Why multiply examples?

"Yet" the subtlest science of music," you say, "is its expressiveness." Is not here emotion? And is [illegible] emotion, or rather the [illegible] the feeling the spirit, say the fervent heart [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Are intellectual emotions less pure, less real, less complete than simple emotions at least one [illegible] which so readily run out into shallow sentiments etc?

6. Here remark an unconscious confusion of ideas in the writer of "Musical Form," misled by his own terms. Because to write or understand a Fugue requires exercise of thought, all close technical [illegible] applied to its elements and form, (and so does a Sonata, or any other complex form), he becomes alarmed [illegible] the notion that the Fugue proposes to express thoughts, "ideas" (other than musical ones), thus entering into [illegible] rivalry with speech! That is quite another thing. We have seen instances of that foolish pretension on the part of free, non-contrapuntal, non-classical composers; but who ever heard of a "programme Fugue"? No, just here it is the Fugue, more than any other form or the purely musical sphere of music, less guilty of the sin of stepping [illegible] from that "higher plane" of music pure, having no end outside of itself no end but music, to try to do the work of other arts or languages; except in the case of vocal fugues, like Handel's choruses or Bach's, where there is a text to be illustrated; and there our analyst approves and counts them "real artworks."

The Orpheus Musical Society had their annual picnic at Fresh Pond on Monday last, and was well represented by its active and passive members and their ladies. The full Germania band furnished dance and [illegible] music [illegible] [illegible] with part songs by the Society. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Mr. Koch. The festivities were prolonged till about nine in the evening, the full moon illuminating the grove, aided by Chinese lanterns.

Northampton, Mass. A Festival Concert was given in this beautiful old town on the 11th inst. by the Northampton Choral Union, assisted by the East Hampton Musical Society and an Orchestra of [illegible] instruments, [illegible] the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Mr. T. W. Mattice was Director. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Cantata, "The First Walpurgis Night," with a printed synopsis [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] condensed from a description [illegible] this Journal a few years ago. We are told that the performance was [illegible] successful. Certainly it was a worthy and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] work of such importance. We understand that during the four years of its existence the [illegible] performances of Beethoven's Mass in C, Weber's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Handel and Haydn's "Seasons" "Spring," "The Hall[illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mendelssohn's Psalms, &c., [illegible] good material.

The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, including: "With verdure clad," by Miss [illegible] [illegible] Clarke; a flute solo by [illegible]; a Duet from Martha, Mrs. Mattice and Miss [illegible]; a German Ballad well [illegible] [illegible] by Mr. [illegible]; Cavatina from La Traviata; Male Chorus, "Battle Song of the Austrian Tenants," by [illegible], and Overture to Martha.

Pittsfield, Conn. We ask attention to Mr. Karl Klauser's advertisement for a lady teacher to assist him in the musical department of Miss Porter's School. The musical tone and character of the school stand high, and it must be not a small advantage to a lady rightly qualified to cooperate in the good work, and [illegible] with the influence of so earnest and true a musician as Mr. Klauser.—There are other good [illegible] of his to Art, which are [illegible] to call attention.

Bridgeport, Conn. The Steamer City of Paris, arriving in New York on the 13th inst., brought back Mr. Charles F. Daniels of this city.

Mr. Daniels who is well known in our [illegible] as an accomplished and thorough musician, has for the past two [illegible] been pursuing his studies in Europe under the direction of Stephen Heller.

Verdi's opera, Don Carlos, produced in England for the first time on the 4th inst., [illegible] [illegible] been [illegible] from the later productions of this composer. That it [illegible] [illegible] superior to his early work, I Lombardi, is indisputable; but we doubt whether Il Trovatore, La Traviata, or even Rigoletto will be eclipsed by Don Carlos. The [illegible] of the opera is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Verdi must have strong [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] producing we [illegible] not only [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which neither [illegible] [illegible] characters are [illegible] either for [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the public are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] light, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] whilst the curtain falls. In the composition of this opera, Signor Verdi has [illegible] more earnestly and worked more zealously than in any of his former works. That [illegible] has been as successful as he desired is open to doubt; for although when a great genius throws his whole energy and power into a composition, he [illegible] [illegible] be safely calculated with a composer like Verdi who has gained his fame by a few [illegible] for catching melodies, interspersed with spectacular vocal effects and noisy instrumentation, it often happens that his best and most lasting [illegible] are [illegible] [illegible] to which he has given least attention. The whole of the first act of the opera, as it stood in the original score, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so that the curtain rises upon what was the second act, after a [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] prelude; for, as usual in modern Italian operas, there is no overture. In this are the principal pieces are a [illegible] duet between Rodrigo and Don Carlos, in which the former urges his friend to assist the Flemings in resisting the oppression of the Spanish tyrant, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in a "[illegible]" ballad and song [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] duet between Don Carlos and the Queen, [illegible] given by [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] between the King and Rodrigo, in which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] of writing for which Verdi is so remarkable. The second act can boast a very excellent Trio in which Don Carlos makes [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Queen, and Rodrigo [illegible] the whole work, and [illegible] The finale of this act we have already [illegible] his former manner would have whispered to him was insolent and absurd.—London Musical Times.

The Songs of the Freedmen. Our readers may remember that about five years ago we published a letter from Miss McKim of Philadelphia (now the wife of Mr. W. P. Garrison), describing the songs which she had heard (and partly taken down) among the colored freed people of the Sea Islands. Much larger collections were afterwards made by Prof. Wm. F. Allen, of West Newton, and likewise, Mr. Chas. P. Ware of [illegible]. These three are now united, by common agreement, and have been very largely increased by accessions from all parts of the South. The bulk of [illegible] [illegible] the "spirituals," such as were furnished the Atlantic by Mr. Higginson, who has kindly turned these over to the persons named above that they may publish them, words and music, in one volume. The collection will be edited by Prof. Allen, who has written a preface of some length to illustrate the songs. Messrs. A. Simpson & Co., of the Agathynian Press, 60 Duane street, New York, intend to give the work their imprint (a guaranty of the highest style of typography), provided they meet with sufficient encouragement. The cost per volume will probably not exceed $1.75, and will be much less to those taking several copies. Orders may be sent to the firm with the above address. No one will question the urgency of preserving these unique productions of a highly musical race, and they will commend themselves for the enjoyment to all lovers of music, as well as to lovers of the curious.

The Nation of May 30th, alludes to the excellent project in these terms:

The proper folk-songs of this country should be sought, we suppose, among the aborigines, but for [illegible] of the [illegible] it is a pseud [illegible] for [illegible]. The [illegible] hand then [illegible] in a high degree, and it is [illegible] that we now [illegible] explored the [illegible] beautiful and quaint [illegible] of the Southern slaves. These secular songs, or what purported to be such, have in times past [illegible] all [illegible] "spirituals"—the genuine songs of the comparatively [illegible] [illegible] have only recently claimed attention. We are able to announce a collection, based on the Port Royal [illegible] and including the songs of as many Southern States as are obtainable, which will be published either in the course of the year or at the beginning of the next. The words and [illegible] will be carefully reproduced, and [illegible] the editors to make the volume complete in both respects. Any information relating to this subject will be very acceptable to them, and may be sent to Mr. W. P. Garrison, Box 1720, N. Y. Post-office.

FORTY YEARS AGO. While the memory of our "Cretan Concert" (Boston, Feb. 14, 1861) is yet fresh, it will be curious to read the following programme of a musical given in New York during the first Greek revolution. It has been fished out of obscurity by the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser. But the great singer who took part in it did not then suggest her great name. Thus it reads:

Oratorio for the benefit of the Greeks, by the New York [illegible] Society, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, 1821. Conductors, [illegible] — Leader, W. Taylor.— Organist, P. Bamiel.

Principal singers, [illegible] Mrs. Hackett, Mrs. Sharpe, Mrs. Drake, M. [illegible], and Mr. Hackett.

PART I.

Overture.	Handel.
Chorus. "I Am ye people."	Handel.
Song—Mr. [illegible]
Recitative and Air. [illegible]	Handel.
[illegible]

PART II.

Overture—[illegible]
Chorus. [illegible]
Recitative and Air—Mr. [illegible]
[illegible]
Song—[illegible]	Handel.
Recitative and Air [illegible]
Grand Chorus. Hallelujah—Handel.	Handel.

The orchestra consisted of 41 instruments, and the chorus of about 40 persons.

It will be seen from the above programme that Signorina Garcia, afterwards the famous MALIBRAN, sang at that concert. She was then residing in New York, with her sire (and soon with the operatic troupe brought by [illegible]). Her [illegible] was a great favorite with the public.

THE LOWER RHENISH FESTIVALS. An account of the forty-fourth, which occurred last month at Aix-la-Chapelle, was copied in our last. The following historical review of these Festivals is from the London [illegible] (England).

The originator of these meetings in Germany is said to have been Burgomaster Dieterici [illegible] who some fifty-seven years ago assembled together the musicians in his province and [illegible] "Niederrhein Musikfest," which was held at [illegible] in the year 1818. In 1818 Johann Schornstein, the musical director at Elberfeld, followed the example of Düsseldorf, collected together the musical forces there and in Düsseldorf, and gave a performance on a large scale in the former town, thus laying the foundation of the Rhenish festivals, the success of the Elberfeld one being so great that several of the most influential persons in the two towns took the matter in hand, and determined to give two grand concerts at Whitsuntide, which should take place in biennial alternation at Elberfeld and Düsseldorf. The organization of these concerts occasioned so much labor and trouble, that it was resolved to propose to a third neighboring town to take part in them, and an offer of co-operation was made to Cologne, which city at first declined the proposal. It was, therefore, at Elberfeld and at Düsseldorf where the two first festivals were held [illegible] Düsseldorf in 1821 [illegible] other works Handel's Messiah, Beethoven's Overture Leonora (probably No. 3) and his second Symphony—at Elberfeld in 1820 Handel's Samson and Beethoven's "Eroica" [illegible] a phrase under Burgmüller. Another were in the Düsseldorf programme and in 1822 Cologne [illegible] when the festival of 1821 was [illegible] under directorship [illegible] F. Schneider and Beethoven's C minor Symphony [illegible]. In the years 1823 and 1825 the same functions were conducted respectively at Düsseldorf and Elberfeld. In 1824 Friedrich Schneider's Gericht [illegible] to dance the feast of [illegible] Cologne, when the entire The [illegible] Beethoven's Fourth Symphony [illegible] Christus [illegible] were given. In the year 1825 the eighth festival [illegible] for the first time at Aix-la-Chapelle [illegible] two composers [illegible] Düsseldorf and Cologne. In consequence [illegible] Elberfeld withdrawal on the part of Elberfeld [illegible] support. The festival in 1826 was at Düsseldorf, under the direction of Spohr [illegible] and Ries,—the latter bringing out his oratorio, Last Judgment, and his [illegible] symphony in D major. In 1827, the year in which Beethoven died, the festival was [illegible] at Elberfeld. The C minor Symphony and [illegible] of the great Master [illegible] weighty music were given under direction of [illegible] [illegible] of Elberfeld. From the date of the [illegible] Aix-la-Chapelle gave in the [illegible] [illegible] from 1825 to [illegible] a series of [illegible] [illegible] festivals have occurred at [illegible] [illegible] Cologne. In 1829 at Cologne [illegible] Don Carlos and Nina of [illegible] Jephtha. At Aix, he [illegible] year [illegible] symphony in E and his [illegible] Der Sieg der Glaubens,—the "Eroica" was also given. In 1830 at Düsseldorf, Judas Maccabaeus [illegible] (with [illegible] a revision); the Mount of Olives, [illegible] was given. [illegible] conducting. At Cologne in 1832 Handel's Samson, Beethoven's symphony in A, [illegible] by Ries were performed. The festival of 1833 at Düsseldorf is [illegible] as having been conducted by Mendelssohn, then only in his twenty-fifth year. Handel's Israel was given. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony [illegible] overture Leonora, and a new overture by [illegible] conductor. It was on this occasion the [illegible] performance was [illegible] by Mendelssohn, who gave, as a supplementary concert, a performance on [illegible] of the "Fest" week, at which the [illegible] of the choruses and solos was repeated, and Weber's Oberon [illegible] played by Mendelssohn. [illegible] that [illegible] of the [illegible] were directed by the [illegible] composer, whose energy [illegible] great [illegible] to them. The following festivals are given under his direction—at Cologne in 1835, at Düsseldorf in 1836, when his [illegible] oratorio, St. Paul, at Cologne in 1838, when the "Lobgesang" was given, at Düsseldorf again in 1842, when the Laudate was [illegible], and lastly, the year before his death, at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1846 when Handel's Alexander's Feast [illegible] Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and a mass by Cherubini, were included in the programme. At Aix in 1847 [illegible] directed — in 1848 [illegible] 1851 Lindpaintner [illegible] conducted [illegible] 1851 [illegible] Ries. In 1857 Lachner and [illegible] Weitzmann of Munich. The other [illegible] have been directed by ordinary composers—such as Cologne in 1841 when Oratorio and Spontini directed [illegible] Düsseldorf in 1839, when Schumann conducted [illegible] symphony in D minor and [illegible] [illegible] 1853 [illegible] The latter [illegible] festivals of 1846 and 1853 and 1855 and [illegible] Cologne. The 1855 Düsseldorf [illegible] [illegible] and in 1856 were conducted by Otto Goldschmidt and [illegible], and have been together as [illegible] the 1855, rendered for ever memorable from the fact of Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt singing at them. The illustrious artist sang also at the memorable festival—at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1846.

Ristori in Comedy.

So much has been written upon the rival merits of Rachel and Ristori, and so much disinterested criticism has been called forth, that another line of "Instances of its comparison would seem unnecessary. There is one view of the subject, however, which has not been taken.

Nothing impressed me more on again seeing Ristori after an interval of eighteen years, than the immense superiority she displayed in melo-drama and high comedy over tragedy. The memory of her former self was so unfavorable to her present personations as the memory of Rachel.

It was my good fortune to hear Florence in 1849 before she had acquired her Paris reputation and night after night to enjoy her rendering of Scribe and Goldoni. The former suffered from translation though enough of his wit and esprit remained to make his plays very acceptable. Goldoni will by Ristori such an exponent, and those who only know him as one of the helps to the acquirement of the Italian language can form no idea of his merits. Ristori's arch humor, pathos and ease added to her natural beauty and high-bred air eminently fit her for genteel comedy. She did full justice to the beauty of her native tongue, and it was delightful to hear it flowing naturally from her lips and observe how every mood and costume became her.

She did not always confine herself to skilful authors, but whatever she attempted, was perfectly done. In one play particularly her triumph over a ridiculous plot was remarkable. A young lady of birth and fortune marries clandestinely an adventurer who proves to have been a confectioner! I forget the name of the playwright, though he deserves to be remembered for his originality and daring. Brigands have been considered fascinating for many years. Murderers are extremely popular. Music and language masters are dangerous. Ladies only aspire to murderers. Highwaymen and pickpockets have been idealized repeatedly and it is Bradden I am even obliged to a poem and lifted him up into a hero. But writers have not ascended from the ranks of tailors, hair-dressers or pastry cooks. Next to the daring of imagining such a plot was that of representing it, but it proved Ristori's power.

The easy grace and elegance of her appearance when she first entered in riding habit and hat, all plaid, was fascinating. Then came distrust, anxiety and the gradual awakening to a sense of her folly. Her loathing in spite of deceit and treachery and her final throwing herself at the feet of the "padre nobile" while pleading for her husband, were masterly. It was talent and a high order of talent, exerted in a poor cause.

In quitting her own peculiar walk Ristori has incurred the disadvantage of not being so well supported. The Italians are peculiarly calculated to represent light and ornamental emotions. The calm, and dignity of tragedy does not suit their mercurial natures. They are usually either stiff or exaggerated. I mean as compared with those comic delineations, for in all intellectual arts they are superior to the Anglo Saxon race.

The impression of Ristori's great superiority as an actress was so vivid that though on seeing Rachel two years after I acknowledged her wonderful powers, I fancied the Italian might rival her in tragedy, at the same time being convinced no one could surpass her. Therefore when the curtain rose last November at the Boston Theatre and we awaited her appearance in Judith, it was with an unusual interest. But the moment she appeared the high wrought expectation sank. The mere fluttering of the drapery, the hurried walk across the stage, the rapid words in which she announced the discovery of a spring to the perishing Israelites proved in a moment beyond doubt the superiority of Rachel. It was fine declamation, but the passion, the power, the classic attitudes of the French woman were not there.

Had we never seen Ristori in comedy nor Rachel in tragedy we should have been entirely delighted. As it was we were haunted by the wish that she had been faithful to high comedy for what does high comedy demand? Culture, grace, refinement, a bright, sympathetic mind, and high powers of understanding. No one can deny her greatness in tragedy, but she was greater in comedy.

Had she been faithful to her gift and specialty she would have been the acknowledged queen of that charming sort of acting and Rachel would have trod the stage some years longer, for there is no doubt her death was hastened by the poisoned shaft of envy.

Ristori can now lay claim to being the first tragic actress in the world, a proud supremacy which we know could not have been given her while Rachel lived, for there was that in the fiery nature of the Jewess which enabled her to accomplish what no woman with a calmer temperament can do. If she stole the fire from heaven, it consumed her. When patience had too to superhuman efforts, it ate her heart away.

There seems to me no more melancholy picture than Rachel forced to witness the innocent triumphs of her rival. We recall Prometheus, or the sick Napoleon at St. Helena; and these pangs must have been aggravated by the nature of the Parisian verdict. She knew she was the greatest in her art, and the most grief and jealousy at not being able to make others feel it, broke her proud spirit.

There never were two beings who more perfectly illustrated the difference between talent and genius than Ristori and Rachel.

THE FORTY-FOURTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE LOWER RHINE AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

The Festival began for me at the Central Railway Terminus, Cologne, where I met our respected old master Mendelssohn, who had braved the night journey from Leipzig in order that he might attend in some on the Leomenes festival. I enjoyed the pleasure of chatting away the time till then to Aix-la-Chapelle, and having fresh reminders of his indomitable interest in everything going on in art and life. The entrance into the bustle of our musical festivals has always something interesting about it, especially when one rushes all direct from the railway carriage into the concert room. I was received here with an agreeable "Ha! Ha!" but it was soon evident that this was not intended for my humble self, but for Dupleses, the beautiful, and I regarded it as an honor. In fact after Mlle. Rotteleum had seated the Director and the audience, I quickly heard myself surrounded by droves in and organ stimms. "Ah! Rhinethaler!" "Look, there is Capellmeister Reinthaler!" "And Wüllner?" "He's due to-day." "Tame with us at a Gurzy." "Why have you been able to leave Paris and the Exposition?" "You surely bring us to be found there except such music as is heard here." "Now there is such a host of enthusiastic Belgians. "Nous sommes à votre poste. Monsieur, comme tous les ans—l'année prochaine nous serons à Cologne, n'est-ce pas?" "I hope so, but a year, now-a-days, is a century. Who can tell what may happen?" I stand upon tiptoe in order to hail a look with the Cimarosa, who, under the name of Naumann, is now starring in Germany. Maria—Jupiter tonans—now leaves his place in the clouds to approach more mortals, while, with a light step, Remenyi is making his way through an Olympia full of Graces, leaning his Jessonda. The good-natured members of the Committee greet us most cordially. They seem in high spirits, and hear good reason to be so. The artists, also, make their appearance from Germany and England and France and Belgium and Italy—what horns among them no one can who for forty years attended these pleasant festivals and was, as it were, their life and soul. Professor Bishop Rochell! I once represented him in these columns (the reader will remember the circumstance) while he was on a visit to England. From the bourne which he has now gone to that he will return no more.

This distinguished man had many enemies, now that he is gone, people appreciate the great loss they have suffered by his death. What stores of acquirements and talents were buried with him in his grave. Where is the pen that could work so effectively as a medium between the historical interests of art and the public? His views of tests he never bent and he was for a very long audience to make his readers appreciate all he had heard and felt and what he saw. He also possessed the power of living in a new direction and extremely brilliant style and of thus seeming as if everything were ever in those who may only cared nothing about it. He never sat in a concert room to criticize. He allowed what he heard to work upon him and in the most advanced age possessed a keen susceptibility for fresh impressions—a susceptibility that is greatly needed by some even of the more youthful amongst us. Sometimes he may have been mistaken. But let the man of his conscience that this has never happened. He himself had a sense at least. His misapprehension has ag been seen and then exaggerated, in his passages, a funds left wide open to scarcasm, a Fronton, where the lure of showing one's wit, and the more recently the betting is considered the particular office of criticism. But what he thought he had in more praised, what he thought good he never censured. I gladly seize the opportunity of paying a slight tribute of gratitude to the man who, for a long period, stood by my side and afforded me the most disinterested aid in my various efforts and enterprises, and, if any one observe, with a smaller or larger addition of irony, that I, more than any other man, am especially bound to do so, I must heartily and unreservedly acknowledge the fact. I feel convinced, however, that ever more men—and, moreover, will—join me in these too few verses, [illegible] the virtue of living [illegible] is more given to us mortals [illegible] the Dead.

[illegible] fresh and invigorating, such [illegible] and [illegible] more [illegible] of the truly Beautiful. That what renders our Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine, if they are what they ought to be, and what, fortunately they mostly have been, such important features [illegible] is that [illegible] for [illegible] the highest possible amount of appreciation for the sublimest kinds of art by representing them in the most effective manner. So many persons, too, from so many quarters, co-operate in them with such self-sacrificing devotion, and such important application of their best strength and with such vigorous enthusiasm, that they are entitled to our deepest respect. It has often been remarked, but can never be remarked often enough what great services are rendered to the good cause by the members of the Festival Committee. Out of the enormous pains taken by them, of the long-continued and frequently laborious efforts necessary to prepare every thing to get together all the materials for erecting [illegible] one art [illegible] conception. Moreover I do not know where we shall find the genuine and warm love for art which exists in the hearts of the German people more plainly manifested than in the amateurs and the musicians who constitute the chorus and the orchestra. Such hard labor lasting the whole day, and accompanied by a continuous [illegible] possible only where real enthusiasm exists. The trifling remuneration which is all that can be offered the members of the orchestra is by no means to be compared with what is expected from them, and most fearlessly do I assert that such a state of things is possible with German musicians alone.

The official report returns the number of the chorus at 417 and 123 as the number of the members of the orchestra. As the hall is not extravagantly large but a tolerably roomy one, the exhibition of power was very grand. The chorus had been admirably got up (by Herr Tausch, the Music Director of the Town)—the sopranos sang with as much spirit as smartness. One beautiful high sounding [illegible] voices were once more heard to the greatest advantage—the soprano especially exerted all the fascination [illegible] sometimes overstep a little the defined line of beauty and the energy has become a certain kind of [illegible]—a weakness, [illegible] strength may be [illegible] dreamed a hundred [illegible] life that it has go to [illegible]—but, we should all ask a weakness only to be regretted. The remembrance of the [illegible] at our Festivals is [illegible]—the [illegible] of such hosts of select [illegible] to be found [illegible] numbers that [illegible] may be done with them—the softest movements, the most stormy attacks—the more the better! A continuity of tone like steel, [illegible] steady, pure, and sterling—and then again a gentle and ethereal [illegible] harmonies [illegible]. Also all are the first violins, the worthy companions of the crystal clear sopranos. Attached to the Concertmeister, Herren Wasegenmann and von Königslöw, of Aix-la-Chapelle and Cologne, we had, as, were a whole host of superior efficient fiddlers, as the [illegible]. The wind instrumentalists, too, were excellent—pure [illegible] and possessed of good tone, and it is a remarkable fact that much as the brass was called into requisition, scarcely the slightest mistake occurred in it. But the [illegible], which, indeed, is to be found in many of the most celebrated orchestras, and which consists in the fact that, from the heights they occupy, trombones, and trumpets bray down their tones rather too obstreperously, was not always avoided here.

The Committee had succeeded in obtaining such a vocal quartet as is seldom to be got together. Madame Harriers-Wippern, the sweet soprano, who unites the mildest and most harmonious voice with the most admirable training; Mlle. Caroline Hohenhausen, whose fine, full contralto appears to flow directly from a thoroughly musical soul; [illegible], the [illegible] tenor; and [illegible], with a baritone as soft and yet as sonorous. The eminent [illegible] whose delight it is to develop [illegible] or color the best [illegible] of one of [illegible] on the occasion to play off her [illegible], and [illegible] form of a grateful [illegible], to dispose of the available [illegible] of her voice—but [illegible], [illegible] compelled to fly before the energetic will and conscientious precautions of all the first [illegible].

And [illegible] as the director of the Festival. I cannot help fearing that I shall be laughed at by one side, and somewhat sarcastic [illegible] if I praise him—but [illegible] do so for all that. At least, I will express the pleasure one feels on seeing at the conductor's desk a man with knowledge and with will, who knows what he wants, and is able to carry it out. With him we have no nuances at [illegible] as [illegible] and are to [illegible] no [illegible] phrases which advance nothing. On the one hand, the confident [illegible] "I understand what I am about"—on the other the no less necessary [illegible] "He understands what he is about"—and every thing goes off lightly, as though [illegible] and of its own accord because it is [illegible] that it must do so.

The second director of the Festival, my younger friend Ferdinand Breunung, at any rate, I may congratulate upon the [illegible] he achieved, and praise the sterling and sound talent which enabled him to be of such benefit to the Festival. In what a masterly manner he had conducted the preparatory rehearsals was [illegible] by the grand rehearsals. Without the thorough and conscientious preparation, nothing of the above, I would have been impossible even for St. Cecilia herself to have done any thing. That Breunung is one of the first organists of Germany is one of the [illegible] and [illegible] to his execution of the organ part, admirably arranged by himself for Judas Maccabæus. The pieces which fell to his lot to conduct [illegible] extraordinarily difficult—but he acquitted himself with perfect certainty and discretion. Dorn, the universal genius, too, [illegible] on the third day he [illegible] a [illegible] of cymbals capable of [illegible] the most [illegible] and striking.

The programme was a perfect galaxy of masterworks. Bach and Handel, and Gluck, Beethoven and Cherubini, Mendelssohn and Schumann, followed each other in a most harmonious order. [illegible] I therefore hold my tongue. I cannot however refrain from citing a few lines from a letter which Felix Mendelssohn wrote to me on the 15th July, 1835

"You will have already heard I was at the Musical Festival in Cologne. Every thing went off well; the organ produced a fine effect in Handel and still better in Bach. [illegible] one of his [illegible] double chorus [illegible] In my opinion we have [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] new and [illegible] I [illegible] in [illegible] the organ part, for an [illegible] in Beethoven, Handel and Bach, we know beforehand what there is [illegible] even as it is, how something else must be added to it!"

In Mendelssohn, also, I myself we knew beforehand what there is—and the more interesting and significant here [illegible] becomes [illegible].

The first day brought such a [illegible] performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and as a kind of prelude, the Orchestra-Suite in D major by J. S. Bach. Of the first movement of which the latter is composed the second called an Air, produced, probably, the most pleasing impression. It consists of a broad, gentle strain, which was assigned by the composer to a solo violin. The great Bach who, when he did not play his music himself, was, in all likelihood, but very seldom favorably impressed by the mode in which it was executed, would have become a little surprised, had he heard this solo performed by a whole host of fiddlers together, as was the case here. In the other movements, also, the strength [illegible] and the trumpets, which have a great [illegible] to [illegible] as numerous. But I cannot help saying that the public were not particularly moved by the work and it was impossible to be angry with them for it. When now-a-days an audience, and more especially a Musical Festival audience, begin to wave, people expect something else than a [illegible] a Gavotte, a Bourrée, and a Louvre [illegible] greatest excellence, can continue and ought to continue—and the comprehension of the [illegible] polyphony to be found in even the smallest compositions of Bach, is naturally not given to everyone. We musicians were, really delighted, but we formed only an inconsiderable minority. It was a very different thing with Judas Maccabæus one of the loveliest and most popular works of Handel. Judas Maccabæus was written in a few weeks during the summer of 1746, for Handel [illegible] his greatest oratorios upon paper in a [illegible] short time. It was produced for the first time on the 1st April, 1747 in Covent Garden Theatre, London. Dr. Thomas Morell a clergyman, was the author of the words. There is a tradition that Frederick, Prince of Wales, the father of George III suggested the subject, to celebrate [illegible] of his brother the Duke of Cumberland over the unfortunate Charles Edward [illegible] at the battle of Culloden (16th April 1746). But it is scarcely possible to see any points of resemblance, when the subject is, in the one case, the bold uprising of the poor small Jewish nation and in the other the final overthrow of her enemy, [illegible] haughty England. Be that, however, as it may, of all Handel's oratorios, Judas Maccabæus is that one which enjoyed the greatest success during the composer's life, and was most frequently performed. English writers attribute a portion of this success to the great partiality shown for the work by the Jews, who, "in other advancement of income generally, took a more especial interest in a work that sang a [illegible] the heroic courage of their forefathers." The book of Maccabæus is nothing more nor less than—what such books usually are. Anything approaching even a rational conception of the grandeur [illegible] to which the Maccabees had managed to work up their people is altogether out of the question. Songs devoted in turn to lamentation, hope, martial courage, and the celebration of victory with a continual reference to the power of Jehovah, follow one another in due order, and the whole range of emotions from despair to the highest pitch of jubilance is presented to us twice in succession. Did we not feel as the recitatives certain sentiments, such as Arm, arm ye brave, [illegible] hear together with the [illegible] a [illegible] is a [illegible] prominent element. The oratorio might [illegible] as well to any warlike enterprise of the Jews as to those undertaken by the Maccabees. But at the end there comes Eupolemus, the Jewish ambassador at Rome, and offers on the part of the Senate friendship and protection (what was afterwards called a Wittelsbach) and these [illegible] now cast a shadow upon all the joy of victory appearing we could think of nothing in the world but Handel's magnificent music. In this, more than in any other of his oratorios, the choruses constitute the [illegible]. The deep earnestness of [illegible] the heroic energy of martial valor and the [illegible] feeling of triumph [illegible] Handel's [illegible] melodies, and [illegible] no means requires a musical education [illegible] but simply an open ear and heart to be carried away by this magnificence. Prominent among the vocal pieces are the duets, which introduce some of the finest choruses. None of the airs stood on an equal elevation with them. Still Frau Harriers-Wippern and Mlle. [illegible] obtained thunders of applause for their masterly rendering of them, as well as of the duets. [illegible] proved himself to be the same as ever, and when Niemann burst forth with the words "Blast die Trompete, erhebt das Feldgeschrei," we could almost fancy that the roll of music in his hand had changed to a sword. The chorus, by the "[illegible]," sung in a style full of martial courage. "Wir folgen dir zum Siege," while the trumpets joined in with their blare, as though they would have blown down the walls of Jericho. But the greatest enthusiasm was that evoked by the tabulated choral song, "Sehet, er kommt mit Preis gekrönt" (which is to be found, also, in Joshua) —it had to be repeated.

It is well known that none of Handel's oratorios can be produced without omitting some things and supplying others, however strongly we may stand up for historical truth. Even the great composer himself arranged his works differently for the different performances of them, according to the quality and number of the [illegible] at his disposal, and employed the organ, and the [illegible], though the parts for these instruments are sometimes not found at [illegible] and sometimes merely suggested, [illegible]. There [illegible] great diversity of opinion as to how Handel's oratorios ought to be arranged now-a-days. That certain only of the solo pieces should be selected is a point on which all impartial and competent judges are unanimous, and the blind admirers of Handel will only be injuring their idol and himself in whatever they succeed in producing [illegible] of the latter without any curtailment. Leaving out of consideration the fact that even many of the airs are really insignificant, the singers of the present day are placed in a strange position with regard to them, a position [illegible] in no way to be explained by stating it to be that of the Israelites as opposed to the [illegible] style. The solo [illegible] the singers no [illegible] the original [illegible] Handel's operatic airs and [illegible] written in precisely the same style. But a very large number of Handel's solo songs are [illegible] pieces, and [illegible] with whatever [illegible] connected with [illegible], speaking [illegible] the element of fashion [illegible]. Even were it the present day (we may regret the fact but so it is) we have really singers who are able to master the [illegible] and [illegible] to these long [illegible] passages, we should compensate them and the performances generally were we to compel them [illegible] the passages in question [illegible], which [illegible] the case, the [illegible] are most closely connected with the [illegible] the whole action of the oratorio. In the first case moreover, [illegible] curtailment will always be preferable to the absurd [illegible] of what, [illegible] should appear spontaneously produced. We are [illegible] to cut out a great deal in the [illegible] of Shakespeare and of Schiller [illegible] to fit them for theatrical representation, and the [illegible] connection [illegible] one of Handel's oratorios is very far from being such as [illegible] those works.

At the performance, this year at Aix-la-Chapelle great reserve was [illegible] both as regards the [illegible] of the [illegible], and the addition of certain wind instruments for the choruses. The [illegible] were all [illegible] on the [illegible] with which, according to the [illegible] and [illegible], the [illegible] and the [illegible] should properly have been united. [illegible] the performance of the work were [illegible] would be, and when thus combined with the [illegible], have always some [illegible] about them, and it was well done [illegible] to [illegible]. To most of the choruses [illegible], if not all, the organ was added—and the [illegible] of sound created by the latter [illegible] composed [illegible] the choruses and [illegible], was not particularly great as well as the choruses, though it frequently contributed [illegible] to the beauty of the general effect. With regard to its employment in the solos and duets, there are one or two points to be remarked, and these are of a contrary purport. In this instance a great deal is to be said against its too frequent introduction. Above all else, there is the monotony of its sound, which becomes doubly objectionable when contrasted with the exceedingly delicate effects of light and shade required in vocal solos. Then on the present occasion there was also the great distance at which the organist was placed. This made a perfectly exact accompaniment extremely difficult—I should have said impossible, had not [illegible] rendered it possible. But we ought not to feel the difficulty of anything when its perfection is to be sought in the most placid [illegible]. The soft registers employed by [illegible] seemed to come from some higher regions, which they, in fact, did—but there was still something abrupt about them. The greatest difficulty was in adapting the organ accompaniments to the quicker tempi—while, from their [illegible], they were [illegible] appropriate and characteristic in calmly devout pieces. Taken all in all, there was, in the [illegible] of everyone among us, too much of a good thing.

But what course ought to be pursued with Handel's instrumentation, which is so sparse and [illegible] [illegible] the historic party [illegible] to add the point [illegible] the organ only [illegible] ought [illegible]. I only [illegible] be employed [illegible] the vocal solos also? [illegible] to write [illegible] parts for the wind instruments, and [illegible] introduce a few brass [illegible] the orchestra, when everything in the original [illegible] strength and power? [illegible] then in every [illegible] we ought to select what is adapted to the [illegible], and the particular circumstances [illegible] the performance takes place and, [illegible] the additions of wanton arrogance as much as the [illegible] of [illegible]. The [illegible] levity [illegible] not [illegible] performances of musical master-pieces (not those of Handel [illegible]) may probably be regarded as [illegible]—but let us not [illegible] the opposite [illegible] make the [illegible] way to the latter. Fortunately, however, Handel stands firm [illegible] also strength [illegible] the various experiments he has been tried on here, from those at Sydenham to those of the smallest German [illegible]—the fact is nothing can kill him.

The First Debut of Henriette Sontag.

Translated from the Gartenlaube.

With his lodgings [illegible] on the table before him, his finely-formed pipe in his mouth, sat Herr Holbein, Manager of the Prague Theatre, [illegible] [illegible] of his forehead and [illegible] upon his brow. Indeed, the position of manager [illegible] was one [illegible] along [illegible] with [illegible] of his [illegible]. "A Prima Donna! A kingdom for a Prima Donna!" cried the poor troubled man. [illegible] at present no prima [illegible] in place of her own [illegible] sick and he knew not how [illegible] forward. The celebrated tenor singer Gerstacker, the father of the renowned [illegible]—who was [illegible] had so delighted the public with his [illegible] voice and [illegible] style that [illegible] of this [illegible] ever he was eagerly [illegible] for to appear [illegible]. Now without one [illegible] the place of the invalid soprano, this of course was [illegible] impossible. As it was expected of him to [illegible] the [illegible] was a wonderful [illegible] Herr Holbein [illegible] and the [illegible] knew [illegible] [illegible] at the door: his friend, the Capellmeister and Opera director Herr Friebenau, entered and he first sound meeting but not was [illegible]

"It is well that you have come [illegible] help me, stand by me. A kingdom for a soprano singer [illegible] in [illegible]."

"[illegible] give me the kingdom and then I will furnish the singer," was the laughing reply. "But what is the role?"

[illegible] Holbein bid [illegible] sing Jean of Paris. [illegible] is not [illegible] everything is ready for the representation: the only [illegible] wanting is the Princess of Navarre."

"Only the Princess of Navarre! Why I should say something was wanting then" said Friebenau, playfully, when looking up at the other's sorry face, he continued, still smiling, but consolingly, too, "Hold up your head, Holbein! I will revive the wanting role. I will provide you with a most [illegible] princess. I have one among my scholars."

"Who, dear, who is this pearl?"

"Pearl! Sontag's pretty little daughter. She is a little star, full of wisdom and talent—full of understanding and enthusiasm. She is just studying with me the role of the Princess of Navarre. So then, in five days—too long? Why, man, you are unreasonable? Well then, in three days you can give the opera; that is, if Gerstacker will sing with the little one, for she is young—very young, indeed."

"And you think she will succeed—she will not disgrace us?"

"She! Disgrace us! Certainly not."

"Then it is decided. Your word is enough for me. Thank God, there is a load gone from my heart!" And the happy manager sprung joyfully up, while the Capellmeister took a speedy leave, and hastened off to his pupil.

At the house door he was met by the [illegible], Henriette's voice, and the old teacher's heart glowed with pleasure at finding his favorite pupil at her studies so early in the morning, and when she was not expecting him either. Softly he opened her door and [illegible] with [illegible] glowing, she was sitting at the piano, most eagerly looking [illegible] with enthusiasm when she sang a passage over and over [illegible] she failed perfect. At last when she had [illegible] a phrase of the most extremely difficult [illegible] with astonishing skill and sweetness, [illegible] could restrain himself no longer, but heartily clapping his hands he cried:

"You are a [illegible] girl, Hennie! and in three days you shall appear as the Princess in John of Paris."

The young girl who had sprung quickly up, red and glowing with [illegible] and [illegible], turned towards her teacher now fell back in affright, at [illegible] news, unable to speak a word, plainly showing her fear by her expressive face and clear blue eyes.

"My dear child, keep up your courage," said Friebenau soothingly, when he saw how standing there so pale and trembling. "Do you think I would have said you could sing the Princess if I had not been sure of it? And will you not do credit to your old friend [illegible] should be so proud of you?"

A [illegible] of joy thrilled through the charming form of the young girl. The roses bloomed once more on the cheek that had been as pale as the rose of [illegible] youth, almost [illegible] her eyes beamed with courage and enthusiasm, the whole face was [illegible] as though transfigured by [illegible] and with a firm voice, Henriette said:

"You have said, master, that I can do it, you shall not be brought to shame! I shall be ready in three days to appear as the Princess of Navarre."

"God bless you, my child!"

"Do you know that Gerstacker is going to sing 'John of Paris' to-morrow?" cried one passer-by to another. "I am hurrying off to get tickets. They say there is a large crowd around the box."

"But the first singer is sick: who is going to give the Princess?"

"Little Sontag, the daughter of the actress?"

"She! Why it is not long since she was playing the roles of children—she was always a fine child but she must be very young."

These and similar expressions might be heard a [illegible] the day before the representation, and on the following evening [illegible] the house, more than crowded, [illegible] the [illegible] to [illegible] wanted the curious eyes of hearing the [illegible] "John of Paris." As the Gerstacker appeared and played and sang so that it was a pleasure to hear him, and he was met by [illegible] of enthusiastic applause. Now and [illegible] each other, "Poor little Henriette—poor child [illegible] that she should make her debut with so great an actor!"

And now the approach of the Princess was announced. All eyes were turned towards the door, [illegible] which those [illegible] appeared one of purest and loveliest [illegible] that have ever been seen upon the stage. Two years later when Henriette Sontag again appeared in public a [illegible] flower and grown up [illegible] that was now combined such grace, loveliness and [illegible] that all hearts were irresistibly drawn towards the being that looked more like an angel than anything else. And when John, overcome by the sight of the noble dame, sings:

Lovely looks as a flower,
Tender goodness in her eye,

"And in every feature proved [illegible] [illegible] by these [illegible]"

—the eyes of the assembled audience were bent upon the young girl, standing there as the embodiment of these words, and the murmur of satisfaction grew more and more perceptible.

With true womanly modesty, yet with noble self-confidence and [illegible], the prima donna advanced, and the first notes pealed forth from her rosy lips with a clearness, a power, ardent fullness, that possessed the power of spreading throughout the now excited audience the influence of the scene. [illegible] a great [illegible] the [illegible] of her [illegible] [illegible] yet brighter light than before when the [illegible] [illegible] a whole course of [illegible] [illegible] the old Capell [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of her [illegible] [illegible] the dignity of her bearing [illegible] his delight. The old man [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that his noble [illegible] [illegible] be the signal, as it was, for a burst of the most rapturous applause that has ever yet been bestowed upon so [illegible] a candidate. This universal burst of applause at first not only surprised but confused the [illegible] as [illegible] for one moment her voice trembled; but she bravely reconquered her emotion, and then, encouraged [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] some [illegible] with [illegible] more [illegible] [illegible], clearness and freshness, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a [illegible] of new and [illegible] [illegible]—so that the Capellmeister was forced to hold his breath in amazement [illegible].

With what [illegible] [illegible] from this moment the [illegible] was won, and [illegible] the young [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of an [illegible], and the great Capellmeister had to be content to share the triumph of the evening with a young debutante.

Henriette was received behind the scenes at the end of the first act by her delighted teacher and her deeply moved mother.

"I knew that my brave girl would not disgrace me, but I scarcely thought she would make her old teacher so proud!" said the old man. "That was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] with joy. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to her [illegible]. 'Listen, Father [illegible] [illegible] have [illegible] [illegible] of glory and honor, as I when they [illegible] [illegible] upon [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of your old teacher that [illegible] in the quiet grave!"

Deeply affected, the master silently took the honored hand [illegible]. And now both the sod [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

In the second act the [illegible] [illegible] sang [illegible] great [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—for the [illegible] [illegible] Henriette [illegible] [illegible] the audience grew [illegible] [illegible] in their [illegible]—and it was not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] with a joyful [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] young [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] of the highly [illegible] [illegible]—for never had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—the [illegible].

Thus ended the first and altogether unexpected [illegible] appearance of the youthful singer. [illegible] [illegible] ever [illegible] with greater [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Now the [illegible] [illegible] her [illegible]—[illegible] her rich [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of Henriette Sontag will [illegible]. May it long be honored!

Mr. [illegible] [illegible] of "[illegible]" was given on Wednesday [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Duchess of [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible], Mrs. [illegible] taking the second soprano. [illegible] [illegible] to the leading [illegible] of the National Church, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] and with which [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] and privilege. Mrs. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Cambridge University Concerts, when the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Hospital [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]," the [illegible] public owe the very fine performance of last [illegible].

Thirty years ago or more, when the Amateur Choral Society of Exeter Hall first commenced its labors, the professional element was [illegible] [illegible] to the progress of the new institution. "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]," said the late Tom Cooke to John [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] outlived Tom Cooke, and were we [illegible] [illegible] Old John, we might [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] St. Cecilia and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], "[illegible] [illegible] an angel down."

The orchestra on Wednesday was a very brilliant affair. A [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—[illegible] Chapel Royal [illegible] "St. Paul" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There is no necessity to go on blundering in [illegible] and injustice for the sake of an [illegible] [illegible].

The band on Wednesday was that of Covent Garden—[illegible] good and true, and who can play. The composer [illegible] conducted. The hall was well filled, [illegible] [illegible] hundred [illegible] present [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of the Society [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the evening.

As it is the fashion now to notice the performers with the performance before saying a word of music, we [illegible] our brief remarks with the singing of The [illegible] of [illegible]. At the first public night of the Exeter Hall Society Mr. George [illegible] [illegible] during. Mrs. Shaw, then Miss Postans, made her first appearance, and so frightened was the debutante that she lost both head and voice; and we well recollect [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in Covent Garden, a popular [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible], and [illegible] the Garden [illegible] by throwing her music at the head of the conductor and running off the boards. Her [illegible] is a sweet, [illegible], and natural way—with a pure and [illegible] tone of voice—at first somewhat veiled by the timidity of position. After the duet with Mr. [illegible], for which the [illegible] of repetition were [illegible] be [illegible], her voice became [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] given. In the former portion of the oratorio her [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it was [illegible] to [illegible] peculiar circumstances, but the applause [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible], and in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] passage the [illegible] of the composer and the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] on the [illegible] the [illegible], [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and there was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Mrs. [illegible]'s singing is marked by great accuracy and good taste, with here and there a just expression of powerful declamation. Her solo and her quartet [illegible] were given [illegible].

Mr. [illegible] is well known as a great performer on the piano, and successful composer for that instrument. The [illegible] given on Wednesday is [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of ordinary hands. He has much improved the work [illegible] [illegible] production and will no doubt be called upon for [illegible] and increased exertion.

American Art at the Exposition.

The London Athenæum speaks slightingly of the paintings sent by American artists to the Paris Exposition. We quote:

The [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] of this great [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Art of the United States of America, which may be described under two heads: [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] French [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of the highest importance when we are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. With this class rank the large, [illegible] and [illegible] landscapes of Mr. [illegible], "The [illegible] [illegible]," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] achieving a [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible]'s "The Rocky Mountains," and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]'s Mount Jefferson, New Hampshire.

There are [illegible] [illegible] pictures of the [illegible] sort, as [illegible] on a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—a bright landscape showing a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] is the [illegible] [illegible] of the United States [illegible] [illegible] in landscape, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] French art of the best and [illegible] of Messrs. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Nevertheless [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of these pictures [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of their [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] landscape is [illegible].

in his picture of desolation and merciless ravage, Virginia in 1863—two wrecked houses in a wilderness, a river flowing through a waste. Mr. Whitridge's Coast of Rhode Island is exceptional to the rule; it is here, and is an original manner rendered finely, but rather faintly, the figure of waves on the shore. The Pride of the Valley, by Mr A. P. Gray, reminds one of the superior pictures of Rippingille in its sentiment, which slightly pertains to a remarkable daughter and distressed parents. It has much better drawing than our countrymen could impart to a picture.

Mr D. Huntington's Republican Court in the Time of Washington is a large production, rather the chief in respect to the simplicity of its author since who has settled at the primitive ideas of art. That is rather a collection of formerly-erected frames and portraits without ... though [illegible] and ... than a picture in the true sense of the term. Nevertheless, being honest, it is worth a legion of flashy French sportsmanlike pictures, and an aura of its counterparts among ourselves. We look upon this quaint and Quakerish example as the sole valuable specimen of native here. United States figure painting on these walls, and we confess that the severe and unemphatic [illegible] ... his ... with his ability. Mr. Huntington is evidently thorough. In ... hands, here is the way of power. So far as he goes he is happy. Generally the defect ... this countryman appears in wanting in art ... beyond its necessary office of representing matters, and seeing them merely pictorially. Mr Mignot shows a sense of more than this in his Sunrise of the Susquehanna; this is to us ... a Frenchman than anything else. There is a peculiar but showy quality in Mr W. Homer's Confederate Prisoners at the Front.

Art Culture in Boston.

(From the Boston Daily Advertiser, July 30.)

We have the pleasure to announce that the sum of $10,000 has been presented by the Boston Athenæum, by the will of a gentleman recently deceased, for the purpose of enlarging its fine-arts department.

This timely donation furnishes an occasion for considering the state of the art interest in this city, and the various projects which are already under consideration for supplying the same. During the past twenty years the city has, in suburbs, had a made increase in its population and wealth, and a taste and expenditure for costly works of art there has been ... a more marked increase. Ten valuable pictures are now purchased by our citizens, where one of equal value was bought twenty years ago. Has there been a corresponding increase in the number and the reputation of resident artists, of the means of educating our students, and of the capacity of galleries for the exhibition of the choicest productions of the pencil and the chisel? Most assuredly not. It is notorious that when a Boston artist acquires a national reputation, he removes to New York, and takes a studio in the painters' dynasty in Tenth street, or finds his residence in Florence or Rome. There have been no increased facilities for studying art in Boston. Sixteen accomplished teachers is at the ... of New York, and ... a whose fullest ... for Europe. If we except the exhibition rooms of ... dealers, there has been no enlargement of the space for exhibitions since the present galleries of the Athenæum were opened, nearly twenty years ago. Indeed the ... a ready loss. In one of the large exhibition rooms of the Athenæum was taken for books several years ago, and it is understood that the necessity there is ... to be devoted to the same purpose. The whole building will soon be required for books. Something must therefore be done, and without delay, or Boston will lose, if it has not lost already, the prestige it once enjoyed of being the seat of art, as well as of letters.

What is needed in Boston is not simply new exhibition rooms, but a School of Art which shall provide suitable ... for students under a corps of professional teachers, in which ... lectures shall be ... given. Several such schools have recently been established in Philadelphia, and some of the western cities, but ... none for art students can be found here. In New Haven a School of Art has just been opened in one of the departments of the college and a building ... named expressly for the purpose—one of ... occupying the first story and ... galleries, with ... lights, ... second story—has been erected at an expense of $175,000. The entire cost was paid by one gentleman, Mr Augustus R. Street, who has since died, but who thus built for himself a monument more enduring than brass. The exhibition ... with the choicest specimens of ... and foreign art. Where is the solid man of Boston who will do the same thing for his own city?

Some years ago the project was canvassed of establishing a free art gallery; but it met with little encouragement on account of the great outlay of capital required. As the plan did not embrace a school of art, it seemed hardly adapted to the requirements of the present day; and it may well be questioned whether the time has yet come for erecting a large free art gallery in this city. The friends of the measure also discovered that the chief patrons of art among us were already interested in the Athenæum, and deemed it desirable to secure the ... of ... rather than to found a new enterprise.

The trustees of the Athenæum, it is understood, have under consideration the enlargement of its fine-arts department. At the annual meeting of the proprietors in January last a special committee was appointed to consider the subject, and this committee reported at a subsequent meeting, submitting a plan for erecting new galleries on an adjacent estate on Tremont place, which the Athenæum owns. This ... was ... to replace the apartments already taken, and which it proposed to take, for library purposes, but it would not meet the future wants of the institution, or the art interests of the city. Such was the feeling on the part of the committee and all the proprietors who before the plan was submitted ... any recommendation. There seems to be little probability of its being carried out.

The questions therefore return: how shall the objects we have considered be accomplished, and who shall do it? In replying to these questions we beg to suggest that a new and spacious building is needed which shall combine the two features of a School of Art and new exhibition galleries. The building should be an architectural ornament to the city. No site for such a building is available in the immediate vicinity of the Athenæum. The new land on the Back Bay, which is soon to be the centre of population, would be an appropriate location. A lot of land on the corner of St James and Dartmouth streets, containing more than two acres, and around which on all sides by open avenues, has already been given to the city, and is, by the terms of the deed, dedicated expressly to the purposes of art, or as a public square. Upon this lot the city has expended during the past year in filling, $22,000, as appears from the following extract from the Auditor's Report, page 39:—

"PUBLIC SQUARE. Filling a lot of land on St. James street, opposite Huntington square, containing 91,000 square feet. This land was given to the city of Boston by the Boston Water Power Company, in accordance with the terms of an agreement between the State of Massachusetts, the Boston Water Power Company and the City of Boston dated ... 1866, and was to be used either for ... the ... of art, or as a public square, $22,000."

The money to erect the building and establish the Art School must be the free will offering of our citizens.

We would make one further suggestion: that the new enterprise be carried on through the agency of the Boston Athenæum. This corporation is composed of about eight hundred of our wealthiest and most influential citizens, and has a capital invested in its securities, library and works of art, of the nominal value of $300,000, but of a real value of near a million dollars. All this property is held devoted to the objects of literature and art. The trustees ... no compensation for their services, and the proprietors no dividends. The finances of the institution have never been better managed. It has the confidence such as a new institution could not have, of our wealthiest citizens. The plan proposed is entirely within the scope of the purposes for which the institution was founded, and which it has maintained, the art interests of the city for so many years. Gentlemen of special qualifications and leisure are appointed to ... its fine arts committee. The finances of this department have always been kept distinct from the general funds, and have never been appropriated to other purposes. Every admission fee and every ... paid for a catalogue, ... to-day. An art exhibition is not, as many suppose, a money-making enterprise. Four-fifths of the gross receipts of the Athenæum gallery are ... expended in ... and ... and ... on hand for ... a new purpose not ... as to be added to the ... fund. If every account was kept ... and the use of capital ... the exhibitions would show a balance on the wrong side of the treasurer's ledger. The public, therefore, for many years have enjoyed the annual exhibitions of the Athenæum at the expense of the capital of that institution.

It may be said that the Athenæum is a private corporation, and that the plan proposed could be better carried out by separate organization. If the Athenæum were a corporation for money-making purposes, like the Boston Gas Light Company or the Fifty Associates, the objection would be a valid one. But is it possible to conceive of a corporation conducted on a more unselfish basis, or where the responsibility is divided among a larger and more influential class of citizens than is the Athenæum?

By carrying out the plan proposed through the agency of the Athenæum, the new galleries would start with the valuable collections it now possesses, and with the sympathy and confidence of its munificent benefactors.

The first object, however, is to secure the funds required, and when this is accomplished, the ... ... which we have ... will readily adjust themselves to that most fact. Let us hope that the liberal donation we have announced foreshadows the speedy endowment of an art institution which shall maintain the ancient reputation of the city of Boston.

Music Abroad.

PESTH.—According to report the Abbé Liszt will give a series of nine concerts here in November, when, in addition to a number of his own works, he will include in the programmes Beethoven's Seventh and Ninth Symphonies.

WEIMAR.—On the 28th August will be celebrated the eight-hundredth anniversary of the Wartburg. It is proposed to give a performance under the direction of the composer himself of the Abbé Liszt's oratorio, Die heilige Elisabeth, at the celebrated old fortress of the Thuringian Landgraves, of the "Minnesinger" and, though last not least, of Luther himself.

BADEN-BADEN.—With the exception of three Quartet Soirées given by the Florentine society, including Herr Jean Becker and colleagues who have ... given ... to a small but ... select public, there have been as yet no concerts of any importance at the Conversationshaus. Mme. Pauline Viardot Garcia, however, has lately again resumed her Sunday Matinées at which all the leading artists and the principal amateurs enjoy free admission. The Queen of ... and the Grand Duchess of Baden have been to several of the Matinées.—The Theatre was opened a few days since by the company from the Royal Opera-house, Stuttgart, who proposed giving three performances.—The Italian opera season will commence on the 8th August, and extend on to the 24th September. The artists engaged are: Madame Vitali, Grossi, Signori Nicolini, Della Sedie, Zucchini and Agnesi. Among the works performed will be Crispino e la Comare, Fra ... L'Elisir d'Amore, Linda di Chamounix, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, and Faust (by M. Gounod).

ENGLISH SINGERS IN PARIS.—The close of the Tonic Sol-fa Association of London responded to the challenge sent out some ... months ago by the ... ... to ... offered a prize of £200 to the choir (of any nation) which should gain the highest place in a competition in Paris. The competition came off on Monday the 1st, and the presentation of prizes, which took place on the day following, is thus recorded by Le Figaro:—"By two o'clock all the singers had assembled at the Palais of Industry, the two great choirs being seated in the centre at the foot of the steps leading to the throne. At three the Emperor arrived accompanied by the Empress and ... ... Mathilde. As soon as the Imperial ... had been sung the banners of all the competing choirs were carried in procession before their Majesties, being lowered as they passed the throne, as is done in ... When the banners had passed the prizes were given. The Emperor gave the special prize which had been decreed to the English Tonic Sol-fa Association to a young English girl who very much moved and ... ... The two ... competitors ... sung the pieces which had gained them the prizes ... and ... their Majesties then left." It should be added that ... prize was given to ... from ... in the North of France. It seems that the ... of the ... of ... the prize was ... on account of those being ladies' voices among them, but their singing was of such a high order (these were the judges' words) that they had a special prize, a prize of 'opéra', given them at ... ... It consisted of a gold ... medal, a ... ... worth ... ... Mr ... the band ... conductor, received also another gold medal, and the Society of Orphéonistes presented him with their decoration of honor.

DRESDEN.—Herr Clemens will give three concerts here at the beginning of September. His great ...

will be Mlle. Carlotta Patti's [illegible], Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Jaell, Popper, and Rosenhain.—The management of the Theatre Royal displayed great activity during the latter half of last month. The following operas figured in the bills: Le Prophète, La Part du Diable, L'Éclair, Faust (Gounod's), Il Trovatore, Figaro, Martha, and Guillaume Tell.

DARMSTADT.—A concert was given here lately for the purpose of erecting a monument in memory of the celebrated Abbé Vogler, the master of Weber, Meyerbeer, Carl M. von Weber and many others. The members of the Cologne Association for Male Voices, [illegible] of [illegible], [illegible] played several of [illegible] compositions, with the [illegible] attraction on this occasion. The net receipts amounted to some 3,000 florins.

London.

The Saturday Review—like most of the London journals which [illegible] of the Orchestra [illegible] Rubinstein the Russian Pianist, and [illegible] with the closing concert of the Philharmonic series for [illegible] music of the Future—to-wit, the Troubadour overture and a Concerto by Rubinstein.

If an immoderate amount of boisterous cacophony is music, then the overture to Troubadour is music; otherwise not. M. Rubinstein's overture (Ballard) is even worse. The [illegible] of Herr Wagner [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] M. Rubinstein's [illegible] nothing of the kind. There is no apparent reason why any portion of it should be where it is [illegible] [illegible]. All the [illegible] is a [illegible]—[illegible], and [illegible] in [illegible] but [illegible] beginning to end the [illegible] improvisation [illegible] M. Rubinstein [illegible] claim to the [illegible]. The first was in 1842 when he was [illegible] as a [illegible] but [illegible] chance against a greater prodigy who came to London, a [illegible] year-old gifted and much regretted Charles Filtsch. For [illegible] years afterwards nothing was heard of M. Rubinstein [illegible] in 1858 he undertook a second professional journey to England. The [illegible] of his boyhood had scarcely been carried out [illegible] his playing though marked by extraordinary [illegible] was by no means a model [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] "virtuosity." Now nine years [illegible] he has favored the country with [illegible] performances [illegible] of the last Philharmonic Concert can be accepted as a criterion [illegible] rather [illegible] a pianist. Playing [illegible] however [illegible] his [illegible] has seldom been heard. [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] Rubinstein clearly belongs to the school of Abbé Liszt, but he surpasses all the disciples of that gifted though eccentric [illegible] in [illegible] his model. Beethoven's symphony in C minor [illegible] symphony in D minor of Professor Sterndale Bennett, now completed by the addition of a movement in D major (Romanza per le ondini), separating the minuetto from the rondo finale, were the [illegible] orchestral features on this occasion. Grateful as is the new movement of Professor Bennett's symphony we cannot [illegible] movement. [illegible] the work [illegible] left [illegible] mood, or a more developed movement [illegible] slow movement [illegible] added. At best the new romanza [illegible] pretty [illegible]. The symphony however, contains a [illegible] was admired as before (in 1864 and 1865) the movement, which in [illegible] was encored, and the composer was [illegible] at the end. [illegible] Professor Bennett [illegible] gifted [illegible] his art [illegible] approaching indifference and we can only look upon [illegible] movement [illegible] as [illegible] phenomenal. The singers on this occasion were Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Nilsson, and Mr. Santley. An extraordinary sensation was caused by Mlle. Nilsson's really wonderful execution of the aria [illegible] from Die Zauberflöte [illegible] the song in C minor and E flat instead of D minor and F as Mozart wrote it, was one of those [illegible] in the usual [illegible] career. She was compelled to repeat the whole, and now the operatic world will be anxiously [illegible] to her [illegible] of Il Flauto Magico at Her Majesty's Theatre with Mlle. Nilsson as Astrifiammante.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Monday His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of all the Turkeys [and] a number of the Christians in Crete] visited this great establishment in State. For a description of the ceremony the reader may refer to any of our morning contemporaries (including the Morning Advertiser). The entertainment consisted of the first three acts of Masaniello, with the usual cast. Signori Naudin and Graziani were encored in the duet of the second act.

On Tuesday and Thursday Romeo e Giulietta was given for the third and fourth times.

Last night the opera was La Favorita. To-night Roméo for the fifth time.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Monday night the opera was Faust; on Tuesday night (owing to the fête in honor of the Sultan at the Crystal Palace) there was no performance.

On Wednesday Don Giovanni was repeated, and on Thursday Norma.

To-night La Traviata. Il Flauto Magico will be given with Mlle. Nilsson as the Queen of Night, on Tuesday next, and on Thursday Cherubini's Medea, with Tietjens.—Musical World, July 20.

They have also musically entertained the Sultan at the Crystal Palace. The Musical World says:

One of the great events of the day was the gift made by the Sultan in his munificence of the sum of £1000. The Crystal Palace was opened with a variety of objects, but what it chiefly exults by is music. This is a[n] [illegible] festival, [illegible] every entertainment in which it is [illegible] to attract large numbers at high prices, the chief and [illegible] grand majority [illegible] the only attraction offered is a concert in the performance of an oratorio. The Crystal Palace is nothing if not musical. Its athletic shows such as they are are entirely in connection with music [illegible] to get a true idea of the munificence of our Eastern visitors we must remember that the Sultan, and the Viceroy of Egypt have between them given to the Crystal Palace nearly three times what the British Parliament, after much hesitation and with much grumbling, has agreed to give annually towards the support of a National Musical Academy.

BOSTON, AUGUST 3, 1867.

The Annual School Festival.

The Seventy-fourth Annual Festival (ninth of the Musical Festivals) of the Boston Public Schools was held, as usual, in the Music Hall on Tuesday afternoon, July 23. To describe the beauty of the scene would be to repeat words and images which have in past years only fallen too far short of the occasion. Twelve hundred girls and boys, the former charmingly but simply dressed, all with faces full of youth, intelligence and promise, again rose tier upon tier on both wings of the Great Organ, and these were culled from all the schools as the best specimens of the vocal culture which has become more and more an element in our free school education. The number is necessarily limited by the capacity of the stage and the whole arrangement of seats, the almost choreographic unity in variety of movement with which these young companies are quietly and quickly marshalled into their places, the system of rehearsal in separate schools and finally en masse had been studied out and wrought out so thoroughly and wisely once for all by the first author of the idea and his co-workers of the School Committee and the teachers, that the machine moves now almost of itself. It is true there were some discouraging obstacles to contend with this year. An opposition, almost hostile to the Festival, betraying half concealed hostility to the whole policy of teaching music in the schools, had sprung up in a portion of the Committee, and although the better faith and wisdom of the majority prevailed, it is yet no wonder that, in such a state of suspense, the usual musical preparations in the schools was delayed until the question could be finally settled and in fact almost to the last moment. Meanwhile Dr. UPHAM, the leading advocate and organizer of the Festivals from the first, had gone abroad, and the Festival Committee only a few weeks ago appealed to one of their number, Mr. F. H. UNDERWOOD, who, in spite of most exacting duties in another sphere, took the matter in hand with discreet energy, and, with the prompt co-operation of Mr. ZERRAHN, the Conductor of the Festival, and of Mr. SHARLAND, who has been for several years making the children in all the Grammar Schools masters of quite a repertoire of good songs and choruses in one, two and three parts, soon got all the questions of programme and arrangements settled and the cheerful and cur[ing] business of rehearsal fairly on train. The result was a Festival no wise inferior to any in past years, while certainly we are safe in saying it showed important progress, as it was bound to do after another year of trial and of constant improving upon the system of music teaching as a regular part of the school exercises. The modest but invaluable labors of Mr. MASON in the Primary Schools, and of Mr. MASON in all the schools, the former teaching the rudiments of song by rote and note to the youngest children, the latter disciplining the voice into wholesome and expressive habits, tell most convincingly on the mass singing, both in the precision and pure intonation thereof and in the collective quality of tone. A larger and more musical volume of tone comes out and [illegible] every year with more piquancy and skill, while there is at the same time a higher average of musical feeling and perception recognizable in the twelve hundred.

The scene, as we have said, was enchanting. The Hall was most tastefully decorated with pots and baskets of flowers and some depended from the ceiling; people were as eager as ever for admission and as delighted with what they saw and heard; and there was a general feeling of thankfulness that the beautiful custom had not been ruthlessly sacrificed to a cavilling, uneasy love of change. The spoiler lays his hand upon too many things, destroys the fine trees in our streets and squares, disfigures our delightful Public Garden with huge, wrought iron road bridges (of no sort of use) and the sweet sylvan lawns of the Common with stiff new paths; let him not meddle with the Children's Festival, enough that he spoils the playground!—The selection of Music too was uncommonly good: a mingling of the simple, grave and stately with the bright, graceful and attractive. The only fault was the old fatality of too much speech-making—often as superfluous as the bridge aforesaid over the duck pond in the Garden. There was one live hearty speech, which went to the hearts of children and all, that by the Rev. Phillips Brooks of Philadelphia; and it was short, but even that was unnecessary in presence of the greater eloquence of the occasion and the faces and the voices of those children. The rest of the speaking was mostly for form's sake, well meant sound and sensible in matter, but not needed there and then. Is it intended for the children? They cannot listen. For the outer audience? They come to see and hear the children. There was one announcement however in the address of the Chairman which inasmuch as the music will only be followed as hitherto, by the presents, to the continued bouquets to the "medal scholars," was peculiarly pertinent to the occasion, and must have been grateful to all right-minded persons. It was to the effect, that the medal system is henceforth abolished; the love of excellence for its own sake, a generous ambition in the pursuit thereof, and no longer the mean ambition to outstrip rivals, is the motive that shall now inspire the pupil; this will make nobler men and women, and broader, sounder scholars, if not such glib and showy smatterers as before.

After an Organ prelude by Mr. [illegible], who was organist of the day, a fine and sonorous old German Choral: "Was Gott thut das ist wohlgethan" (What God does, that is right well done), was sung by the whole 1200 in unison, the organ supplying Bach's harmony. This was the favorite Choral of the late King of Prussia, and we cannot forget how impressively it sounded on that clear, cold January day at Potsdam, at his funeral, played by the trombone bands in the procession, each moving at a [illegible] different harmony and finally as we came away how our ears were greeted by the same tune [illegible] down from the sky as it were, transfigured in a four-part contrapuntal harmony from the [illegible] church where Frederick the Great is buried. The children sang it well, in the good intonation and all together such a [illegible] that it was inspiring. But there was too great uniformity of loudness for the best effect; though this is better than to attempt light and shade at the risk of timid and narrow intonation. The best (a crown of spectacle) would have been the [illegible] of a verse in unison by all, with a verse by a select choir in Bach's four part harmony unaccompanied.

Next came the Invocation by the Chaplain, and the Chairman's address, and then a three-part Song: "Our Native Land," by Abt, fresh and pleasing, and the chorus: "Once the bl[illegible]" from Mr. Kreissmann's Opera: "[illegible]," which was sung last year but with better effect this time both of voices and orchestra, the [illegible] of the buoyant major strain with the solemn hymn made a [illegible] impression.

After another address from [illegible] came the most charming and artistic of the musical selections, that fresh pure spring chorus from Rossini's "William Tell," sung in three parts by the pupils of the Girls' High and Normal School. The exquisitely figured and suggestive prelude and accompaniment were finely rendered by the orchestra, the voices sounded pure and [illegible] and sweetly blended, and the whole went well [illegible] and delicacy and good light and shade. These had been under Mr. ZERRAHN's personal training. An hour spent in that school room [illegible] a [illegible] was convinced [illegible] taught there [illegible]. The young ladies part [illegible] with their teacher [illegible] other [illegible] to conductor, &c., claim his whole time with sincere regret; fortunate for themselves, however, and for [illegible] the schools, that there is so competent a gentleman as Mr. LOCKE [illegible] to succeed him in the good work.

"The Quiet Night," a sweet and tranquil three-part song by Abt, sung by the whole; another address, and then the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass (so called) sung with great life and energy by full chorus, with orchestra and organ, the instruments of course supplying the fourth part to the vocal harmony brought the musical feast proper to an inspiring close. The address and presentation of bouquets by his Honor, the Mayor, the band playing the meanwhile, and the singing of Old Hundred by "the whole congregation," remained for those who had not already enjoyed their fill.—We think we shall hear no more of abolishing the Musical School Festival!

Obituary.

Music in Boston mourns one of its truest friends and most cultivated amateurs in Mr. GEORGE PARTRIDGE. Suddenly cut off in the prime of a useful happy life, his parting words lie more than over-full, not only to the home which he made beautiful, now left so desolate [illegible] had the privilege to know him. A native of Bremen, from one of those German families in which Music and Art are so sincerely cherished, he came at an early age to this country, married a Boston lady of superior culture, and after a short residence in Milwaukee, settled in this city, where he had become widely known and a valued part of the best social life. A man of singular refinement, cheerful, unpretending, modest, kind, full of thoughtfulness for others, ever [illegible] to courteous tributes he attached all with whom he came in contact. Repeatedly have we heard the remark: We never felt so much the death of one we knew so little. The [illegible] of good [illegible] his sympathetic presence. He was an [illegible] of all our public efforts [illegible] the true dignity of Art. [illegible] years the leading spirit in the amateur orchestral society [illegible] "Mozart Club," and a useful member of the Symphony Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association. He was a good amateur violinist, and many a classical quartet, trio &c. has been enjoyed at his house. Every instance of artistic faith and purpose found encouragement in him.

Beautiful as well as very sad was the burial scene at Forest Hills last Tuesday. Hosts of friends were there to pay the last parting tribute of affection; among them a delegation of his Harvard Musical associates, a number of our leading musical artists, and the members of the "Orpheus," who sang solemn music at the grave. The birds, too, sang, and sweetest smells [illegible] of grass and flowers breathed hope and sweetness all around filling the very air with heavenly assurance, [illegible] were [illegible] themselves all that was mortal of a life in harmony with theirs.

"THE HARMONY." The Commencement music was as bad as usual. That is to say [illegible] inappropriate. We make no criticism on the band employed, but we do respectfully suggest that a more suitable [illegible] be in harmony with an academic, calm, refined occasion. When we walk in the procession of the alumni, [illegible] from the venerable [illegible] through [illegible] classic shades, it is simply [illegible] to hear the [illegible] march from [illegible] "Faust" brayed out by coarse brass [illegible]. In the Church, after prayers and literary addresses, the same boisterous [illegible] harmony is still more aggravating because so unescapable within walls; and then at the dinner table and festival, the Phi Beta Kappa [illegible] have the fine influences of such [illegible] thoughts [illegible] prompting, there [illegible] the part of Mr. [illegible] the shape of speech or poem, suddenly and coarsely broken in upon by these ferocious blasts of tubas and trombones, [illegible] by way of overture with all the [illegible] of Der Freyschütz fiercely served up and sentenced [illegible] an interminable potpourri, [illegible] down from the Symposium of the Gods into the dry [illegible] whose memory [illegible]

Verily [illegible] where so much is far better than any but the right kind of music. Better heard without music, than with music that is loud and rough and [illegible] out of place. Swing [illegible] music will suggest itself particularly here. It is too much the custom of our people at festivals, dramatic performances, &c., to fill up all the intervals with music, without the least regard to fitness. After an act of Hamlet has taken full possession of your mind, out bursts a noisy clattering polka, or a coarse march, or a piece of sensation noise [illegible] from the orchestra; in German theatres we found it pleasanter with no music between the acts, unless it were musical illustrations added to the play by kindred genius, like Beethoven's "Egmont," or Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," opportunely because the train of thought and feeling was not rudely broken, or if there was need of [illegible] there was a chance to talk with neighbors undisturbed by [illegible] noise. Time and our own [illegible] are not a [illegible] justify such [illegible]. We do it because it is the [illegible] and customary thing to do; we take for granted that we need it when we should be better off without it.

Speaking of another Festival we have complained of too much speaking; we have cause often to complain of too much music. Music in a place where [illegible] it were better there were [illegible]. The truth is, [illegible] done too much by [illegible] as a secondary thing to some other more [illegible] circumstance [illegible] "conventional relic." Music to be enjoyable, must be principal, and claim attention on its own account by as good a right as sermon, speech or poem. How [illegible] Commencement days at Cambridge would seem to be the very occasion for introducing a reform in [illegible] custom now "more honored in the breach than in the observance" where taste, refinement [illegible] should preside over all else, a [illegible] to take the [illegible]. Why resort for the annual [illegible] of those days precisely to one would for a [illegible] parade in the streets?

Cannot some gentler kind of music more in the spirit of the hour be easily provided? At the dinner, for instance, [illegible] speech [illegible] the point that we need the still, [illegible] and more subtle language of pure tones, why shall not the Muse respond as art, equally [illegible] with local [illegible] and sympathetic instinct, in the shape of a chorus [illegible] of vocal harmony or quartet of strings [illegible] (of course brief) selection from one of the masters of poets [illegible] (and Harvard has such among her own [illegible]) An orchestra, of course would be the perfect thing, but perhaps out of the question [illegible] on account of the expense. At all events, a beginning in the right direction may be made negatively by simply dropping out the music that is so disturbing, [illegible] more [illegible] to the [illegible] and the [illegible] of [illegible] coming. At the dinner we have referred to we think every guest felt relieved when the musicians, [illegible] their [illegible] shouldered their heavy instruments and [illegible] free and happy; now we could escape ourselves to the spirit of the hour and go in for a good time without a fog!

ERRATA.—The article "About Fugues," in our last, owing to an [illegible] in the [illegible] of the correction of [illegible] to more [illegible] quarters, came out pretty thickly strewn with errors of the press. Thus "[illegible] (for unalterable) [illegible]," "[illegible] (for [illegible])," "[illegible]," "[illegible]," [illegible] ——it should be added "seem (for seen) all his genial Mozart" &c. &c.

MR. H. L. BATEMAN has announced the engagements which he has made during his late visit to Europe, from which we may [illegible] that the coming season will offer an astonishing novel as well as interesting in comic opera. Mr. Bateman has engaged an entire French company, including the orchestra and chorus, for the reproduction of Offenbach's operas — "La Belle Hélène," "Orphée aux Enfers," "Barbe Bleue," and others, including "The Grand Duchess," now running at the Variétés in Paris, and pronounced the greatest success of the season. Mr. Bateman's prima donna is Mlle. Tostée, a pupil of the conservatoire and an eminent woman, who is at present starring at Bordeaux. The other members of the company are excellent artists, and enjoy a creditable reputation in Paris. The costumes to be worn in the new opera will be exact [illegible] of those now worn at the Variétés, and are to be made by the same parties. In all the minor details for the representation of these operas, Mr. Bateman has been as thorough in his preparations as on the more [illegible] [illegible] to expense [illegible].

Quite as interesting as the above is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be announcements [illegible] the coming season. [illegible] is a series of [illegible] concerts [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] known [illegible] to be given at Music Hall, the first performance occurring some time in January. The rest of these series will [illegible]. The [illegible] will [illegible] consist of English opera, [illegible] [illegible] a composer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] will be [illegible] by vocalists of Boston prepared for the task by competent [illegible]. In addition to the best resident talent, [illegible] artists of reputation who will be specially engaged, will be employed in these concerts. — Eve. Gazette, July 31.

Les Orphéonistes. The whole of France is organized into choral unions or orphéons. They [illegible] all sorts of names — sometimes they are orphéons, sometimes more choral [illegible], a circle or club — sometimes [illegible] — sometimes friends. One can [illegible] the Sons of Apollo, another the Children of the [illegible], [illegible] the Hope of Paris, the Lyre of [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] of some other place. Time was when the orphéons, who consist mainly of [illegible] [illegible], no more than to sing the simple choruses of the [illegible] school. Now they can attack any [illegible] [illegible] works of the greatest masters. As a matter of fact, what they [illegible] are the [illegible] [illegible] of French masters — Halévy, Adolphe Adam, Ambroise Thomas, Gounod, Félicien David, and Laurent de Rillé. It is quite a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] upon the choice of music [illegible] [illegible] choral [illegible], which are to be represented in Paris by eight thousand voices, all [illegible] the prize. The [illegible] to break them up into batches, and to hand each batch [illegible] a separate [illegible].

Minstrelsy as it was. Elegant musical young men are apt, be glad that they did not live four hundred and eleven years ago. That is how the King [illegible] applied the agreed phrase to [illegible] band: "The King to all, etc. Know ye that whereas Walter Haliday, Robert Marshall, William Wykes, and John Clifford [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for a [illegible] of our [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the ways of all [illegible] and the [illegible], want a [illegible] in their [illegible] for our [illegible] approved [illegible] youth, and [illegible] to take [illegible] wherever they can be found [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in their natural limbs, and well taught in the art of Minstrelsy and [illegible] [illegible] to our service at our wages. And we command you that you [illegible] diligently as the persons and do them, and carry them out as the form aforesaid." With you [illegible] it was in those days. If [illegible] a horse or a [illegible] [illegible] was a strait for the king he had [illegible] [illegible] — Athenæum.

Cherubini's Manners. M. Jules Janin tells this anecdote: Once upon a time there was in that Paris, forgetful of [illegible] [illegible] a corporal, a man, an ingenious professor, affectionate artist. Cherubini, the musician [illegible] delighted [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] touched by Heaven. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he hardly carried [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a school which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he had opened at his own expense. His [illegible] of those [illegible] children with more than paternal [illegible]. To the hungry child he gave food, and he gave clothes to the [illegible] [illegible]. He loved [illegible] and [illegible] with these [illegible], who often lacked [illegible] gratitude, and respect for him. Among Choron's scholars [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] especially who kept [illegible] [illegible]. One of them was [illegible] [illegible] who became Duprez, and he [illegible] [illegible] the world and the great Rachel. He loved her one winter's day [illegible] at the street a [illegible] [illegible] into herself and [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he [illegible] her [illegible] at school. He [illegible] of [illegible] a [illegible] of her. She, directed by her genius, quitted the lyric drama for the [illegible] tragedy of our old poets. In [illegible] she became Rachel and had [illegible] from triumph to triumph, carrying with her all Paris, and perpetually bring[ing] [illegible] enchantment and success. At the height of this immense joy she thought she should like to play her great part, "Hermione," at the Grand Opera, and [illegible] that very theatre where her old comrade, Gilbert Duprez, kept the strong attentive and charmed by the inspiration of Rossini and Guillaume Tell. To hear was to obey this eloquent woman. So she played at the benefit of that respectable and worthy [illegible], whose career was suddenly interrupted at the very time his voice was strongest and most beautiful. [illegible] this night there was a crowd at the Grand Opera. "Hermione" carried [illegible] and triumphant, perfectly at home in this immense space. She herself alone was able to supply the place of the orchestra and chorus. She became [illegible] by her own passion. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] you [illegible] have [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was one of the most [illegible] [illegible] perhaps it was the most [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of all her life. She retired from the stage amid an [illegible] applause, [illegible] [illegible] you [illegible] her [illegible] to the drawing-room where [illegible] a daughter [illegible] [illegible] the royal mantle. She then closed her eyes [illegible] [illegible] her heart beat [illegible] [illegible]. "Why, how now I [illegible] a [illegible]!" When at [illegible] the name to [illegible] she caught a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of that great [illegible] filled with [illegible] of the [illegible] of Choron, her great master. This was, indeed, the [illegible] good natured glance [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he [illegible] [illegible]. She has been [illegible] [illegible] a half faded crown [illegible] the crown [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "Now all to Rachel's drawing-room was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible]. [illegible] as the [illegible] chamber [illegible] [illegible] at all [illegible], such a [illegible]. The crown on old Choron's brow was placed there by his [illegible] Gilbert Duprez, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at his gentle master after the evening of success of his [illegible] [illegible] Guillaume Tell. Sic transit! "Twas the [illegible] [illegible]. Duprez [illegible] it as the first [illegible] of [illegible] glory. At the sight [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] Mlle. Rachel [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it but with [illegible] [illegible]. In a second she was [illegible] back to her tender years [illegible] La Cité [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] the benefactress and the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. She [illegible] Duprez a [illegible] [illegible] her own [illegible] to her. She began to [illegible] it. Just at the moment the door of the drawing-room, in which Duprez seemed to [illegible] [illegible], opened. The most beautiful [illegible] of the ballet, before entering on the stage, brought to Mlle. Rachel the flowers and crowns thrown to her and which filled the stage. She said at [illegible] with a [illegible] [illegible], "They are yours, and I [illegible] you [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who threw them to you." Then cheered, and [illegible], [illegible] [illegible], the beautiful flowers, [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible]. Mlle. Rachel kept only one crown. It was braided in the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. When at last she [illegible] to [illegible] home [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], took possession of the crown [illegible]. Duprez himself had [illegible] [illegible] before placed on [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] still [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Choron's head with her own [illegible] [illegible]. As Duprez was dressing for the stage next day, he admired [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The very same day Mlle. Rachel [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] were tempted to make a [illegible] [illegible] of all sorts of [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] them [illegible] a royal [illegible] [illegible]: "I beg your pardon, gentlemen, but not one of [illegible] shall [illegible] a crown of [illegible] placed by Duprez, the singer, on the brow of our master Choron."

Say the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Paris Exhibition for a [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] — [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible] enables the performer to produce all the chromatic notes and [illegible] play [illegible] any key without the change of crooks.

The museum of the Paris Conservatoire has lately been enriched with two singular instruments. One of these [illegible] a portative [illegible] [illegible] constructed in China about the [illegible] century — in other words when organs were unknown here or in Europe; [illegible] one was used at Compiègne for the first time in 757. The other instrument is a [illegible] made for Marie Antoinette in 1790 by Pascal Taskin. This clavecin is remarkable for the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and what is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the unfortunate queen. — London Orchestra.

Towards the East.

IN MEMORY OF GEORGE LEPPITCHER [illegible]

Towards the East, with song and light
The earth with one ease [illegible] life,
Looking towards the Fatherland
We hear him in our Forest Hills.

We wreathe a lily blossom fair and sweet,
The Viol which is silent now
And lingering gaze through falling tears
Upon thee calm and holy brow.

Oh friend beloved only the form
Which held thy soul the earth receives,
While here 'mid tender songs we strew
The grave with flowers and summer leaves.

For thou art not withdrawn and when Beloved and gifted ones once more
Strike the deep chords thy spirit loved,
Each o'er a vast, pathetic score,

Then a little [illegible] or when the gleam
Of winter fires thy home shall light,
Unto thy loved ones gathered there
Thy soul shall come on Christmas night.

No last farewell we breathe to thee,
We look towards the East again,
The Morning and the Fatherland,
And say "Oh friend, Auf Wiedersehn."

Gounod's Romeo and Juliet.

BY HERMANN STARCKE.

(Translated for this Journal from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Leipzig.)

Every time there is a new opera brought out in Paris, we cannot resist the disagreeable impression which the [illegible] shows and so upon us. There are not [illegible] cultivated people who have come to hear the new work and form an opinion about it. It is a public which seems not capable of judging and which, without having heard a note of the work, brings with it an opinion ready made. Accordingly the first measures of the overture seem to be more dangerous than the most dangerous production of a circus rider. One can compare a composer who writes an opera in three or five acts and has it performed on a Parisian stage to the owner of a house, who is obliged to make as many jumps as there are stories to his house. First act: first story—a slight sprain: one can recover from it; second act: second story—a broken arm or an injury to the spine, all curable; third act: third story—if the unlucky man comes off this time without fatal damage, it must be miraculous; and a rocket is not rarer in these days. Gounod has just ventured upon five such leaps and broken neither arm nor leg; on the contrary he perhaps never was so safe as he is now. After seeing this new work of Gounod several times and reading through the score attentively, we cannot keep protesting against the [illegible] criticism which has received such an extravagant enthusiasm, an enthusiasm that seems to put wholly in the shade the effect of masterworks, like the "Tell," the "Hamlet," the "Domino Commodato," the "Tartuffe," the "Iphigenia" and "Alceste," the "Don Juan" and "Fidelio," &c., before which the most high-souled fanaticism has bowed to the dust. According to the Parisian critics nothing beautiful is left except the "Romeo" of Gounod. Is not the greatest testimony which they can give of themselves to fall into this tone of unmeasured eulogy about Gounod's work (which certainly contains much to be [illegible]). The most glowing enthusiasm must have come and receive before it can pass for judgment.

Allow us here to leave the Gounod question, for a moment, and state some particulars in regard to Shakespeare's drama, which perhaps are not yet generally known. That owes at proper origin to two Italian writers. In the first place, Girolamo della Corte published a work, similar to Shakespeare's, called "The Lovers of Verona." The same material was afterwards treated by the Italian poet Luigi da Porto. Later still Shakespeare created his immortal work, in which at all events he made use of the above named authors. Girolamo della Corte relates the tragical affair between the Montagues and Capulets families as historical; he even indicates the burial ground where Romeo and Juliet are supposed to lie buried and describes up to exactly a somewhat elevated place near Verona on which a convent may be found to-day. At Shakespeare's time there existed an English translation of Luigi's work by Arthur Brooke. This very probably served Shakespeare as the source, without his binding himself closely to his handling of the material. According to Luigi da Porto, Juliet awakes just as Romeo has drunk the poison: then follows between the lovers a great scene, rich in lyrical and dramatical beauties. Quite differently is the palace scene related by Girolamo della Corte. Romeo dies of the poison before seeing the awakening of Juliet. She, instead of ending her life with the dagger, swoons away in the [illegible] which seems her at the sight of the dead body of her husband. This act with the poet is full of the finest moments and the noblest poetic thoughts. A not less effect on scene is that, where Girolamo represents the first meeting of the lovers. Shakespeare, without directly translating, has treated it in almost entirely the same way. Purely and alone the work of his genius is the Balcony Scene, which is found neither in Girolamo's nor in Luigi's drama and which never yet has found its counterpart in ancient or in modern poets. The like of that could only Shakespeare's genius create.

Like nature with her ever lovely charms, this drama has tempted many musical heads to reproduce it. Already in the year 1793 the pianist Steibelt wrote a sort of melodrama "Romeo and Juliet," the principal part was intended for a once celebrated singer, Mlle. Sara. It was performed that same year in Paris on the Théâtre Feydeau and the success stimulated many musicians to further attempts. Three years later appeared in Milan the Opera "Giulietta e Romeo" by Zingarelli, which was chiefly a affair for the three Italian singers, the soprano Crescentini, the tenor Bonelli and Mlle. [illegible] (aunt of Giulia Grisi.) In the same city for the same theatre, and availing himself at all events of Zingarelli's score, Vaccai, in 1825, also composed a "Giulietta e Romeo," of which an aria (Andante "Ah, se tu dormi") has maintained itself to this day although the composer is forgotten by the public and musicians. Finally in 1830, Bellini's "I Montecchi e Capuletti" was produced at the theatre in Venice. It was chiefly the two sisters Giulietta and Giulia Grisi who for a long time sang this work and helped to give it a lasting success. Hector Berlioz is, so far as we know the only one who as a musician in his great dramatic Symphony has soared up to Shakespeare. [!] His score alone has shown itself capable to express Shakespeare's world of thought and render back in music the sublime expressions which the great poet calls forth within us on the stage.

Now as to this latest reproduction of the Shakespearean drama, the first thing to be said by way of preface is, that such people as Messrs. Carré and Jules Barbier are not capable of furnishing a text not unworthy of the original in any the least. They have shown as long since as the "Faust" and "Mignon" dramas, which they have dragged down to downright farce. But also with regard to Gounod's score one must confess, if he takes there for a trace, that something essentially different was expected, and that this work is nothing but a simple confirmation of the prophetic idea of J. J. Rousseau. He and Voltaire, both of whom have written immortal pages upon the French lyric and dramatic opera and have unquestionably had a controlling influence on its development, predicted simultaneously the [illegible] of the opera. Who else but they must answer for [illegible] of Gounod's work appears so weak and faulty! To say the plain truth the fault lies with the "little church-bell."—In the old churches there is a little bell attached to the organ, which is put in connection with the officiating priest, who has to lead the choir and of which the object is to warn the organist while he is playing of the entrance of the verses. Now as soon as this little bell rings, the unhappy organist is obliged to break off his improvisation and drop the theme which he has just begun. Unpleasant as this may be, the proceeding is necessary for the church service requires in a certain respect quite as much precision as the putting of an opera upon the stage. The officiant determines the course of the church scene as he pleases and sees fit, and the organist is pledged to submit to his arrangements, and is paid for that. If the bell sounds too early, then, for better or for worse, he must terminate the spinning out of his improvisation and try to effect a transition into the required chord as quick as possible. If on the contrary he has to wait too long for the bell, then he is obliged to lengthen out the filling per fas et nefas. For there he sits his hands upon the keys, he fell upon the pedal and his eyes fixed on the unsuccessful bell and he attempers all possible things, a famous comes into his head and feet abruptly curtailed octaves, unmeant chords, passages which any gushing. In the anguish of his heart he often calls in the aid of the great pedal to make the finale as impressive as possible by means of ear-thunder!—If a composer has the misfortune to write an opera for a Parisian theatre, he must follow the innumerable whims of the theatre director. The author is no longer master of his work. The director says to him in the most courteous manner: "I wish to have this or that dropt out, and that or this scene lengthened some ten to thirty minutes so as to bring in some kind of a ballet or effect of decoration." Then the modest and the only way for the composer is to comply with the given orders, if he have any intention, under such circumstances, of having his work put upon the stage. He can stay quietly at home during the rehearsals—the director takes care of all the rest.—One has only to see and hear the new Gounod opera and he will find this confirmed.

Most of the Imperial theatres, of which the French are as proud as ever were the Roman people of their name, are continually bringing out older as well as newer works according to the most arbitrary notions. A chief requirement before all things is the Ballet. Even Shakespeare they have not failed to bless therewith. In "Romeo and Juliet," as in every other work, the action is continually interrupted and suspended at the moment when it is growing most interesting, by a ballet or some sort of decoration effect. The way of introducing this is extremely simple. If the principal characters are merry, the ballet takes part in their pleasures; if they are sad, you wish to divert them and—you dance.—We see a holy manner that it is customary at Court and in great houses to dance when one is in bad humor and disposed to weep; but on the stage they dance and sing and leap while the fate of the principal persons is being decided behind the scenes. Preachers, soldiers, pages, duels dance; there is dancing at funerals—in short they dance à propos de tout, as the French express themselves.—O Shakespeare, what has been made out of thy "Romeo?" What is left, by the Parisian workmen, of the tone of the comic humor of Juliet's nurse, what of Capulet's tenderness—and of his anger?—What has become of that enchanting of all love the balcony scene? Where is the humor of Mercutio and the dreamy fancy of Friar Laurence? Out of Romeo they have made a student, who gives his grisette a rendezvous in the garden of the Luxembourg.—Indignantly we ask these French butchers and garblers, who has authorized them to call these job-work "Romeo and Juliet"? why have they not named it "Alfred and Rosalie," or "Lischen and Fritzchen?"—We have now a Shakespeare "Romeo," and another by MM. Carré and Barbier; a "Faust" from the same they and another from Goethe's; a Goethe's "Mignon," and a character by the above named workmen, to which they have given the same name. The Venus of Milo and the masterworks of Michel Angelo are hurled from their pedestals into the dust, and here and there a desperate urchin has the audacity to play with an arm or leg that has been broken off!

Compared to these melancholy experiences all the text workers, Gounod's music in certain moments certainly stands considerably higher. The best and most valuable piece in his opera is the introduction, which he calls Ouverture-Prologue, yet this designation seems unfounded, inasmuch as the chorus it contains relates the tragical end of the drama; the whole should much rather therefore have been called Ouverture-Epilogue. The music of this short introduction is beautiful and more bold of the brave. But here Mozart's Don Juan has considerably influenced the composer. The Opera itself begins with a Polka-Mazurka, worthy of being danced at Kroll's establishment in Berlin. To the melody the chorus sings: "L'heure s'envole," &c. The following air "Ah quelle est belle," is worth more and has grace and nobleness in its melody. But its good impression is again completely obliterated by the following number, which seems strange indeed, and to which is appended the noisy humming song of the Capulets "Allons jeunes gens." The whole of the last part betrays and is also descent from the Mozart and Haydn Masters; but here the instance lacks the peculiar accent.—The ballad "Queen Mab" is built upon motives, if not very orchestral effects, which produce rather a bizarre than an original impression. It one will call to mind Berlioz's orchestral movement, he will find at once the difference between the two compositions. With Berlioz one sees and feels Shakespeare at the very first bars. That is Queen Mab, a the nutshell, drawn by "little atomies," with spider's webs for traces; here a fairy atmosphere floats round us. Gounod's Queen Mab on the contrary makes the impression of a clumsy power, which disturbs and plagues us in our sleep. This ballad is followed by a pretty phrase: "Il nous faut," which is attached to Schorno of the friends of Romeo: "Vous êtes prises vos," two numbers of apt and tasteful invention, the only objection to which is, that they have been too much shortened and passages marked out without enough regard to the musical sense. After these, Carvalho (Juliet) has brought before the public a vocal waltz: "Je veux vivre dans le rêve," which transports us to the Cafés Chantants of the Champs Elysées; there appears a Duo: "Ange adorable," sung by Michot (Romeo) and Mme. Carvalho, which is as cold and big as the icebergs and gives us various matter for reflection. Well may one ask here: Where is that fire of passionate love, which ends so tragically? It might be called a duo of automatons. The first Finale is just as poor and empty as the first opening of the act. Yet, taken together this Act is the best of all the here and there one finds a good musical phrase, passage, scene and mood. The answer, what this Act finds with the Parisian public, is due to the effect so happily chosen for that public: Mazurka, Menuet and Waltz.

The Second Act begins with another very feeble number, namely "L'amour, l'amour!," upon many happy moments in which there continually follows phrases cold and saying nothing. In the Balcony Scene, the tenor (Michot) does not give enough heed to his voice; he does not trouble himself at all about Juliet's reputation and seems to think he is not compromising her if he does sing like Verdi's Troubadour in the third act. The chorus of the patrol: Personne, personne, &c., has a well marked rhythm, although the leaven on the chorus is not new. The following Duo, a failure at the outset, shapes itself a little more interestingly as it goes on. But the two lovers the whole time appear sleepy, heavy, icy cold. What delight the soft ear would have caused to all concerned, had he only pulled the little bell here in the second act!

If we speak of the Trio-Quartet of the Third Act, it is to accuse it of being an imitation of the Trio in the fifth act of the Huguenots. Compare the following Finale with La Fille du Regiment and with the "Blessing of the Poniards" in the Huguenots, and you will find not too much resemblance, especially in the latter which, so far as Gounod has not transported us by his scenes into the Middle Ages, that the "Daughter of the Regiment" in point of rhythm does not stand a great way off. The Duo in the Fourth Act is certainly the weakest and best part of tenore in the whole, yet it owes the impression it makes more to the charming personnes of the voices, than to the intrinsic value of the theme itself. All the rest of this Duo is massively and most airy; every Concert-listener may with it. Most especially in the Allegro does the composer appear on a level with the great poet; the sense, like the situation, is passionally and pathetically beautiful; and if Gounod had written nothing else but this, he would have proved that he possesses a great genius. Also in the following Quartet we find a very beautiful part, sung by Capoul. The Romance of Friar Laurence, where he foretells describes the effect of the narcotic, is a complete failure. Now follows a March, played upon the so-called new Sax instruments, which is kept in a sonorous, broad style but reminds us of a walk that we have heard before; besides, it utterly lacks the character of a wedding march. Of the whole chorus there is nothing further to be said, except that you find therein a deal of noise without sense. The fourth Act, again, ends cold and devoid of interest, and at the moment when Juliet is supposed to be dead, the chorus of some 300 persons indulge itself after a long and tedious declamation, in shouting out the two words, "Juste ciel!"—and the curtain falls. Here would have been the moment for the composer to introduce a musical generation, like that of the immortal poet. But the introduction to the Fifth Act vanishes completely, and this is a sign of Gounod's dramatic weakness; for after the Italian composer had created the fine number: "Ombra adorata aspetta" even Halévy in his Guido et Ginevra was able to offer something considerably finer than Gounod.

We have endeavored, in the above remarks, to give a general exposition of the worth of the last opera of Gounod. Here and there only musical beauties show themselves, and these not seldom with the imitation of other masterworks; only after the word of the composer they are skilfully disguised under the trompe-l'oeil of a well-invented and carefully elaborated instrumentation.

THE FORTY-FOURTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE LOWER RHINE AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

With a work like Beethoven's C minor Symphony it must be evident to everyone that no explanation, however poetical, can cover a line for instrumental music of the highest class. How many performances have people attempted to [illegible] to this Titanic production! We may take the most important events from human life and from history, but everything appears petty in comparison; and, if we indulge in reflection, or pure thought, in order to draw from these sublime melodies a logical chain, it is just as though we were to pour water upon fire. The deliverance of the soul from what is common is the only programme of all true instrumental music; it is as noble as it is endless. The spirited performance of the symphony, which commenced the second evening, was one of the most brilliant points of the Festival. The public was most profoundly moved, and it was long before the [illegible] waves of applause were calmed. The spirit of Beethoven floated over the conductor and the orchestra.

After the deep impression produced by the symphony, the "Kyrie" and the "Gloria" from Cherubini's Mass in D minor had a hard task to maintain their ground, and the selection of these pieces cannot be considered a happy one. The D minor Mass is deficient in some of those qualities which often distinguish Cherubini so highly. It is anything but concise, and is [illegible] not the result of a mighty flow of thought so much as of reflective and artistic elaboration. Calculated for a small, but choice orchestra, it sounds, at least in many places, against being executed by large masses, which speak, rather than being out of it increased prominence to individuality. This is a pity because some of the works performed had made such large demands upon the contemplative [illegible] of the [illegible]. The pieces, too (under Ferdinand Hiller's direction) were admirably, and the soloists, among whom was, by the way, Herr [illegible], the tenor of Aix-la-Chapelle, did their best in the difficult concerted music. But the general impression was not so [illegible] though much pleasure of the highest appreciation were heard from the lips of many accomplished amateurs. Especial applause was, on the other hand, awarded to Schumann's passionate Genoveva overture. Brenning was the Conductor. The orchestra played it with verve, I might almost say personal devotion to their task, so that the execution of the whole was not merely fiery and full of expression, but, despite its many perilous details, altogether blameless.

The scenes from Gluck's Orpheus are among the most important ever produced in the domain of dramatico-declamatory music. They afforded Mlle. Bettelheim ample opportunity for display.

The young artist already celebrated, began her career as a pianist. It is no harm for a future prima donna to be conversant with Bach and Beethoven and [illegible] the [illegible] had gone through a course of [illegible]. Profound musical intelligence is manifested by Mlle. Bettelheim in every bar she sings. Her voice, extending over more than two octaves, is compact, possesses rare fulness and still rarer equality of tone. Mlle. Bettelheim had previously shown in Judas Maccabæus how varied were her conception and vocal art. With a feeling full of grace she had given the air "Die Freiheit [illegible]" while in the prayer at the beginning of Part Three she expressed perfectly the high purity of a devout spirit. With reverable and joyous devotion she had sung at all the rehearsals, and done almost too much. Her performance in Orpheus proved that she was not less capable of the most profound expression and romantic to grasp and render the most delicate effects of light and shade in Gluck's recitatives. Yet, [illegible] of a cold, [illegible] not completely under control—her alto executed double a [illegible] and listen this [illegible] for the great art by which the soul reveal everything with an organ not quite compliant to her will. Whatever else there may be no process for photographing a voice, and whether we [illegible], we are compelled to have recourse to phrases more or less empty in order to convey the slightest notion of it. But then photography [illegible] many [illegible] of another kind, and [illegible] reminds us how remembers them, as a fact which most certainly many of those present in the concert room at Aix-la-Chapelle recollected and turned to account.

The second evening was brought to a close by Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht, one of his most genial and original compositions, and, generally, a work that is unique of its sort. It was a real piece of good fortune that Goethe's poem, sparkling with life, and so magnificently constructed, both from a dramatic and a musical point of view, should have been left for Mendelssohn to treat, after being public property for half a century at the least. Among the things [illegible] with difficulty in the world are the right [illegible] for the right husband for a young girl and the right poem for a composer. And although there have always been [illegible] to meet and set them, the composers, the [illegible] have a [illegible] for the greatest amount of difficulty. It opera, Mendelssohn never succeeded in meeting with such a libretto as he required, and it is certain that it is owing to [illegible] circumstance that we are [illegible] by a work worthy to be ranked with Die Zauberflöte, Fidelio and Der Freischütz. In the Walpurgis-Nacht, however, he found a subject to satisfy his best inclination, the joy of Spring and the free air of Harvest, the fantastic element, and the light of the heart, which are [illegible] every [illegible]. But yet, however "the high symbolical [illegible] which Goethe's aims for [illegible] that it [illegible] us afresh every time we hear it eternally youthful work but the joyous, [illegible] this enthusiasm that glows, [illegible] clearly in it." That same joyous enthusiasm [illegible] the Conductor and those under him, and procured us a performance sparkling with life. Mlle. Bettelheim [illegible] part of [illegible] old woman from among the people"—and no one felt angry that she represented the old woman only [illegible]. Niemann sang the air of the Druid with a [illegible] which [illegible], and even the [illegible] "Christian watch" [illegible] at least the [illegible] to have [illegible] the circumstances. The part of the Druid is one of Hill's best efforts; he is completely master of it, vocally and intellectually.—It was [illegible] a truly elevated frame of mind that we left the place where the Festival was held. Brentano exclaims Goethe not! "Who can rob thee of thy light?"

Religion in Germany

NEW ENGLAND AND GERMANY COMPARED.—THE GERMAN SABBATH.—DUTY OF THE PULPIT.—[illegible]

[Correspondence of the [illegible].]

LEIPSIC, July 11th, 1867.

Mr. Dickson, in his work upon America, after speaking of the propensity of New Englanders to run to religion in a strong drink, confesses himself at a loss[?] [illegible] for the [illegible] other [illegible] and harmless amusements. [illegible] a Northerner [illegible] further [illegible] that, as we [illegible] from our lives all other amusements, enjoyments and recreations, religion becomes actually the only outlet left us, and we must find our amusement, recreations, pleasures and quarrels in it to some extent.

The Germans, frightened at the [illegible] degeneration of the early reformers, have [illegible] all manner of belief and founded all [illegible] from which most of [illegible]. At least [illegible] they seem to have ended on a body upon the broad ground of rational [illegible] which to come fresh from the [illegible] of New England seems refreshing and delightful. They [illegible] not go to [illegible] or [illegible], a [illegible] and [illegible] Sabbath after [illegible] with a [illegible] through some religious experience. A man is [illegible] a religious [illegible] as there [illegible] heaven does to do [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] German feels the power and [illegible] of God [illegible] Christ but cannot satisfy [illegible]. Is it [illegible] a faith. If this county [illegible] outward [illegible] his [illegible] what he is a Christian no matter what [illegible] be. He does his own [illegible] of [illegible] and unconquered by doctrines and creeds. Why does he need them? Natural religion is founded on man's instinctive, free, undefined worship of an idea, whether that ideal be God or not. It is founded on the love and humanity of man to man, and what more does one need for his religion than this manual? We have prescribed rules and regulations, with which our spirits are bound from infancy, and free, unspotted truth, begged of fewer simple rites and harassed, is crushed under the heel of public opinion. What man with us ever stand out against our various sects and creeds without having directed against him the opprobrium of the whole community? What man is not forced, in self-defence and in order to maintain his position in society, to adopt the religion of his community?

I stand [illegible] a broad, common ground of worship, [illegible] right men, which [illegible] shadow of [illegible] by [illegible] and often by hatred. If a member of one society [illegible] his friends are common worshippers, finds himself unable to accept all the doctrines, he is no longer a Christian and a brother [illegible] and is an outsider to another society. How many are the secrets unfolding [illegible] from [illegible] to accept a belief [illegible] never [illegible]. How [illegible] show but [illegible] are forced into a system which they do not understand and from which when once in and as many [illegible] they dare not recede? Who [illegible] backsliding consequent hypocrisy and striving to keep up appearances which are only mockery? How much misery [illegible] pretence of religion. [illegible] behind the [illegible]. It is the constant struggle between the demands of the soul for a true, open, honest expression of belief, and the restraint of [illegible] of public opinion. If [illegible] small circle [illegible] how much of [illegible] throughout the land! The Germans seem to have passed out of their narrow path of belief or perhaps they as a body were born to it. It [illegible] directly appeal to the German mind. They choose to worship God with the simple faculties which he has given them rather than plunge into a dreary region of doubt and clutching at it with one hand and some church doctrine with the other hide them [illegible] into heaven. Take their Sabbath for example. They stand on the broad ground that the day was made for man, and not man for the day. Their poorer [illegible] and [illegible] recreation to [illegible] and not lead them to worship a more [illegible] the Almighty God. Very many of them go to morning church before [illegible] in the morning [illegible] afternoon [illegible] a German [illegible] family of the most New England [illegible] Christian that I have seen, yet he sees no harm in a [illegible] walk or a visit to the [illegible]. "The [illegible] I devote to my God," [illegible] "the afternoon and evenings to me and enjoyment, for the [illegible] and rest of the week." This is the general mind of the people. [illegible] and promenades are full and the gardens crowded. Strong people are seen, [illegible] in [illegible] shops, [illegible] of their whole family for a walk, or listening under the trees of the beer-garden, children and all, listening to music.

Now who is this you [illegible]? Is it any better than compelling little children to attend two sermons and a Sunday school, or shutting them up with a [illegible] to read and a heart to learn? Is there a single New England [illegible] who does not look back upon [illegible] Sabbaths with the most lively horror? Is there one who would not have taken a [illegible] if he could have kept from his Sunday [illegible] on school till [illegible] Monday morning? Is it probable [illegible] the [illegible] that he [illegible] in the [illegible] any [illegible] love or reverence could possibly find in any one [illegible] an amount of horror and disgust which is felt for the day. In Germany the shops are closed, not because it is wrong to open them but because the Sabbath is for rest and quiet enjoyment. For this reason the museums and art galleries are all open, and few the [illegible] who have [illegible] all the week may have an opportunity of [illegible] themselves in those works of art which are the pride of their land. How could [illegible] after [illegible] in [illegible] a Sunday through the museums? [illegible] Germany. [illegible] and the same people [illegible] galleries, because the English [illegible] religious [illegible] any [illegible] except on the [illegible] of open shops and [illegible] galleries upon the Sabbath. A [illegible] which of the two calls is preferable, the people [illegible] or [illegible] pleasure [illegible] the [illegible] of them they [illegible].

I [illegible] many [illegible] of the very few [illegible] Germany, even among the [illegible]. [illegible] brought up in the strictest manner [illegible] in the city and engages in business. He resolves for some time the [illegible] to enjoy in a rational manner the only day which he can call his own. Finally he allows himself to be persuaded to take a walk, or visit a social concert, impelled thereto by his cares and labors of the week.

But these slight derelictions of duty not enough, he has passed the Rubicon; he has transgressed the circle in which he was reared and he [illegible] looks on at this with horrid eyes upon a Sabbath breaker. What is the result? He finds at first the man of [illegible] has not [illegible] committed any heinous crime, but the church [illegible] still [illegible] goes on from bad to worse, [illegible]. Had he been left to himself, in all probability [illegible] would have consented to going to church in the morning and [illegible] in the afternoon. Look at German students. Among the hundreds whom I am continually [illegible] one of the most [illegible] whose [illegible] the New England standard [illegible] whose lives are [illegible]? With an [illegible] You [illegible] in every Sunday [illegible] he shall [illegible] and think of the [illegible] cities. [illegible] between the church and the [illegible].

By [illegible] the people [illegible] of one [illegible]. Every child is baptised [illegible] beyond this is free. [illegible] may be. [illegible] and [illegible] as members of churches, [illegible]. It is [illegible] to see [illegible] church [illegible]. [illegible] "I attend church [illegible] the Almighty and [illegible] I believe [illegible] every day in my life I [illegible] myself a Christian." There is no [illegible] of the articles of faith of the church to which he belonged. A [illegible] I [illegible] man. I had also [illegible] church. He [illegible] "I profess a religion of my own" he said. "I love and so worship my God and who shall deny me the name of Christian or refuse me the privilege of worship with my fellow men?"

This would sound strangely at home, but why is it not the true Christian doctrine after all? The German [illegible] every [illegible] to be accountable to God and not to [illegible] members of [illegible] and that [illegible] between [illegible] of different [illegible] because church members and church-goers, [illegible] members of one Christian brotherhood, a universal church. There are many [illegible] but they do not [illegible] one another. [illegible] God [illegible] set of church documents and be a true Christian without passing through the [illegible]. Why should [illegible] religion, [illegible] and [illegible] towards [illegible]. Then all the narrowness and [illegible] would be done away. [illegible] judging our fellow creatures [illegible] belong to God alone [illegible] of religious [illegible] great [illegible] of our country on the road to freedom and happiness.

Contest of Military Bands at the Exposition.

Paris, July 22, 1867.

The Imperial Commission have had a rather golden day and a rather brilliant success in the "European concourse of military bands" held this afternoon in the Palais de l'Industrie. For this great [illegible] competition four prizes had been offered in the form of a number of gold medals worth 5000 francs, 3000 and 2000 francs respectively. Ten bands entered the list, and Austria, Baden, Prussia, Belgium, Spain, Holland, France and Russia sent their choicest musicians to uphold their national honor on this occasion. The beauty of the weather and the fame of the meeting drew together an enormous crowd, and long before the doors were opened an immense queue extended from every entrance, till they all mingled together confusedly in the distance. The vast hall [illegible] placed there for the first of July and its appearance was very impressive. In half an hour from the time of the first entries every seat, and not only that, but every standing-place, was occupied, and I presume full [illegible],000 spectators were present. The stone [illegible] and the [illegible], the galleries and the broad [illegible] were crowded with a dense mass of people who [illegible] up and down the vast building as far as the eye could reach. No [illegible] could [illegible] a grander scene in which to display the utmost [illegible]. The [illegible] Commissioner, [illegible] tickets to every person who applied and [illegible] reserved capacity had [illegible] to make [illegible] the [illegible] of their finding any accommodation in the centre.

At [illegible] past one before they [illegible] the doors and when [illegible] present [illegible] of the [illegible] and crowded [illegible] to arrive. One by one they entered the great [illegible] and passing over the [illegible] marched the whole length of the building to the places assigned them. The [illegible] Baden came first. These were followed by the Prussians, a noble body of men and [illegible] in both [illegible], numbering no less than [illegible] performers. As they strode along in their blue uniforms [illegible] with their Prussian helmets bearing a long crimson horsehair crest, they were hailed with [illegible] and cheers. Not only from the [illegible] but from a multitude of Germans in the [illegible] came [illegible] and [illegible] of "Die Preussen! Die Preussen!" accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs and repeated bravos. They were followed by the Austrians in a [illegible] showy uniform of white, blue and gold, whose reception was hardly [illegible]. In fact, notwithstanding [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] were cheered and [illegible] and applause were never [illegible]. The [illegible] were the Russians, a sturdy and stalwart body [illegible] with [illegible] seconds and heavy tread they moved steadily forward [illegible] military order in their [illegible]. The [illegible] was the most showy of all [illegible] the [illegible] orange [illegible] scarlet [illegible]. They were [illegible] young men, of [illegible] complexion, [illegible] health and [illegible] expression was rather [illegible]. The [illegible] of [illegible] their appearance did not seem to affect them in the least.

The preliminary arrangements having been finally completed, the Baden band first ascended the stage which had been erected near the centre [illegible] of the hall and directly in front of the stand occupied by the judges, and began the first opus of [illegible]. But they quickly came to a [illegible] for [illegible] the Palace of Industry [illegible]. [illegible] for a concert room, [illegible] the Great [illegible] for the [illegible] was well [illegible]. [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] and [illegible] They were [illegible] "I [illegible] to be [illegible] of the [illegible] they [illegible]. Those [illegible] "[illegible] pas possible" and [illegible] every [illegible] from those who [illegible] the band [illegible] the German [illegible]. Again they began and again the [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] the great [illegible] of people. [illegible] the one half of those present [illegible] hear [illegible]. But these [illegible] and the [illegible] gradually [illegible] At [illegible]. During the rest of the [illegible] having [illegible] nothing [illegible] and showed they had [illegible] philosophy to make the best of their ill luck. Those that could hear listened with an attention [illegible] while those most remote [illegible] their [illegible] to the already uncomfortable multitude around the stage. They gradually overflowed the reserved [illegible] and [illegible] them, [illegible] that they [illegible] surrounded them they trampled under feet, and it was with great difficulty that the sergents de ville could prevent them from invading the seats of the musicians.

The [illegible] was followed by the "Overture to Oberon," which every band was required to give in addition to a [illegible] of its own selection as a common test of the capacity of all. At its close, which was [illegible] accompanied by [illegible] applause, [illegible] the people were by no means niggards of their approval — the Baden descended from the platform and their places were taken by the Spaniards. These belonged to the first regiment of engineers and conducted [illegible]. They were the [illegible] of [illegible] both [illegible] and personal appearance. I think I never saw more [illegible] looking men and [illegible] they were [illegible] of bad taste. They played [illegible] and [illegible] was not ill done, which is all that can be said in their praise. At half past two the Prussians mounted the stand. They were [illegible] of the other performers, with the exception of the [illegible] may be accounted for by the fact that they were selected from [illegible] among the Bands of the Guard and the regiment of the Emperor Francis. This fact, combined with their great [illegible] tended to make their music widely heard and more effective. Their piece was well selected and consisted of [illegible] from Le Prophète of Meyerbeer. To those who [illegible] the exquisite [illegible] of the [illegible] and the true musical sympathy [illegible] with which every performer interpreted the [illegible] of the great composer. The solos were given with [illegible] delicacy and [illegible] that [illegible] the audience [illegible] of delight. They could hardly await the [illegible] before [illegible] satisfaction. The "Overture to Oberon" was rendered with the same power. There was a vigor and confidence in the [illegible] that always mark [illegible] musical talent and taste, while the more delicate [illegible] of harmony [illegible] of momentary [illegible]. This whole performance [illegible] nearly three quarters of an hour and to those who heard it [illegible] that they will never forget. At its close the music which had [illegible] as powerful to "shake the dome," or equally [illegible] love, received [illegible] the very roof [illegible] and which did not cease till the Austrian company had fairly begun to perform their part in the great [illegible].

I know not if it was by design, though it probably was, that the Prussians and Austrians were [illegible] on this occasion, but it is the fact. They entered together [illegible] were side by side, and the latter played directly after the former. The Austrians were [illegible] that belonged to the regiment of the [illegible]. They were [illegible] in appearance, and [illegible] of them were but twenty years of age. They were [illegible] looking fellows, with light [illegible] complexions, [illegible] and altogether appeared [illegible] well in their showy [illegible] of white and blue. They performed the overture to "William Tell" and [illegible] credit. It is [illegible] and effective piece [illegible] of those [illegible] nice sense of harmony [illegible] that musical [illegible] light and shade, which [illegible]. The [illegible] were fully equal in [illegible] correct [illegible] rendering. I never heard it [illegible] well done. The difference between them and [illegible] was easily perceptible either in point of style [illegible] of expression or delicacy of feeling. The audience [illegible] silence only [illegible] approval [illegible] the last [illegible] tremendous [illegible]. Then again [illegible] they [illegible] from [illegible] made the [illegible] and [illegible] beyond [illegible] is indescribable. Why [illegible] in words that [illegible] but [illegible] which [illegible] their [illegible] with the triumphs of the great [illegible] warm our souls as the lute of genius? "There's a beggary in the love that can be reckoned!" and there's [illegible] beggary in the words that can be [illegible] down in winged words, and in clearest [illegible] along the dull formality of types. Their [illegible] remains in our hearts, and will ever sound in our ears across the waste of time, but we cannot impart them to others.

At half past three the Belgian band began their share of the day's labors by playing [illegible] upon "William Tell." Their performance, though good, was not particularly impressive. They were succeeded by their [illegible] brethren from Bavaria, who belong to the first royal regiment of infantry. As their late Bavarian King is well known [illegible] of Wagner above every other [illegible] composer, it is not to be wondered at that they played a selection from one of the works of that composer. It was the Introduction and [illegible] chorus of Lohengrin, and was played extremely well. The audience were not, however, sorry to see them make way for the musical representatives from Holland, who numbered 56 and who [illegible] from France. [illegible] their hearers and thus gave great delight to the [illegible] and more [illegible] portion who, as the musical [illegible] that one [illegible] heart from every street organ, was [illegible] again to their [illegible], [illegible] a somewhat successful accompaniment, a regular [illegible]. [illegible] with an Irish applause, a large share thereof being an expression of boyish relief on the part of the real lovers of music present, that their [illegible] finished.

And now public expectation was on tiptoe at the approach of the [illegible] and [illegible] the real triumph of the day. Those of your readers who have heard the [illegible] music of the Garde de Paris [illegible] Tuileries [illegible] will not be surprised that much was expected of them [illegible]. They played the Clover of [illegible], and thus with [illegible] appreciation of [illegible] and [illegible] I hardly [illegible] possible that wood and brass [illegible] of wood and brass. [illegible] the faint murmurs of [illegible] and [illegible] with [illegible] sounds of melody [illegible] every [illegible] the [illegible] before. It is on an occasion like this that one appreciates the enjoyment of which God has made the human mind capable [illegible] presence of genius. For a moment after the notes had died away, the [illegible] and never was there a more [illegible] and universal applause bestowed upon any [illegible] of [illegible] I will not try to describe it, but it was all that the [illegible] imagination can conceive.

The Russian band had previously been placed between that of the Garde de Paris and that of the Guides de la garde impériale who were to play the [illegible]. They had chosen somewhat [illegible] the overture of [illegible] by [illegible]. It is a [illegible] of popular [illegible] brought [illegible] with the [illegible] that had preceded it. The [illegible] but hardly equalled [illegible] French. Nevertheless they [illegible] were placed so high, and their efforts were well received. The people cheered them to the echo, and when they [illegible] could [illegible] that they were well pleased though [illegible] of [illegible] single [illegible] field [illegible].

The [illegible] came forward at half past five and played [illegible] from the Carnaval de Venise. [illegible] in the midst of the [illegible] I could not understand. [illegible] they played with [illegible] and [illegible]. This, I presume, [illegible] and [illegible] concerts every evening in the garden before the Palais de l'Industrie, [illegible] for the [illegible] some agreeable [illegible] for all [illegible] of [illegible] of France. As the [illegible] of the evening came upon the [illegible] slowly towards the west, [illegible] forth [illegible] of [illegible] in harmony with the scene. Broad bands of light descended upon the people through the open windows under the dome. The pendant [illegible] of the great colored silk down to the end of the hall, blue and yellow, purple and orange, [illegible] with a brilliancy [illegible] for the eye. The huge [illegible] from the [illegible] to the [illegible] it [illegible] benediction. And still the [illegible] in their rich uniforms of scarlet and gold played on, and we listened in solemn silence to the harmonious [illegible]. Weary, hot and [illegible] standing for six hours, as many had done, yet they were not proof against the [illegible] and [illegible] by a feeling of [illegible] listened as one man. It was a fitting close to a ceremonial so grand, that so [illegible] should accompany one of the great and [illegible] operations of Nature, that melody so [illegible] should [illegible] the sun to his rest.

The enormous multitude were long in quitting the building. Nowadays as are [illegible] 20,000 persons cannot leave any space with rapidity. Many remained to hear the final award of the prizes. The [illegible] of these was [illegible] issued, for the judges [illegible] long—nearly an hour—before [illegible] at their decision. There was, probably, but little doubt in their own minds, as in that of the audience, that the Garde de Paris richly deserved the first prize and the only one. But it seems to have been decided from the [illegible] and [illegible] that no [illegible] should be [illegible]. From this [illegible] difficulties and give [illegible] satisfaction, three first prizes were bestowed upon the Garde de Paris, the Austrian and the Prussian bands respectively, and three second prizes upon those of Russia, Holland, and the Garde [illegible]. [illegible] very [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] and reminded one of Artemus Ward's method of dealing, with a similar [illegible] when he made all his officers generals. The [illegible] the whole thing is, [illegible] and as far as the [illegible] concerned all parties [illegible] as they did before. [illegible] bands [illegible] "three first prizes" [illegible] and we strangers [illegible] the [illegible] of the present [illegible] an delicious an entertainment, have every reason to be thankful.

Theatre Orchestras.

The [illegible] of most of our theatres being about to begin, it [illegible] not be out of place to [illegible] the [illegible] portion of their [illegible] could be [illegible] to make it a source of [illegible] to those who [illegible] cannot attend [illegible] performances of a higher class.

As many of our readers [illegible] perhaps no clear conception of the number and [illegible] of the instruments the [illegible] of an orchestra they [illegible] a [illegible] organization consisting of wind and string instruments. [illegible] of [illegible] who could [illegible] turn this [illegible] by [illegible] on [illegible] bills, "Overture [illegible] Full Orchestra," which [illegible] orchestra almost consists of from nine to twelve musicians.

The proper rendering of any orchestra music [illegible] the following [illegible] [illegible] violins, [illegible] violas, [illegible], [illegible], 2 flutes, [illegible], [illegible] 2 horns, [illegible] trumpets, [illegible] trombones, [illegible] and drums [illegible]. Total [illegible] musicians.

[illegible] for a theatre orchestra large [illegible], some music requiring additional [illegible] could not be performed if [illegible] were not given to other instruments of [illegible]. This [illegible] the instruments [illegible] important passages of their [illegible]. Although not [illegible] the [illegible] but of the [illegible] are generally made by German and French [illegible], and the passages for instruments not in the orchestra are marked by smaller notes in the part of [illegible] by the greatest care [illegible]. Some of these [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] by skilled musicians.

[illegible] very few of our theatre orchestras have more than from ten to twelve musicians, and consequently these arrangements must be still further reduced, [illegible] the [illegible]. Such small bands have generally [illegible] quartet, one flute, one clarinet, one trumpet, one [illegible], one trombone and one [illegible]. [illegible] of our theatre [illegible] to improve their orchestras of horns and violoncello, those most important of harmony-expressing instruments. The effect produced by such a combination may be guessed at from the absolute fact that the proper arrangement of the poorest kind of music requires, besides the latter instruments, two clarinets and two oboes. Without these the performance of "[illegible]" music becomes an impossibility, no matter if leader and band be good or bad. A good musician never accepts an [illegible] in such an orchestra, but under the spur of absolute necessity and at the risk of his artistic dignity.

The requirements of the English melodrama necessitate very frequently the presence of the [illegible] the orchestra during the progress of the play. This consists only [illegible] of the [illegible] yet suffering [illegible], of the [illegible] early English [illegible] must be [illegible] by what the managers [illegible] as the [illegible] "characteristic music." It used to be formerly a matter of no little pride for a leader to be the fortunate possessor of a large collection of such small pieces, numbered and labelled: "Slow music," "mysterious music," "dreamy music," "[illegible]," "creeping [illegible]," "triumphant [illegible] music," "[illegible] music," "[illegible] music," "[illegible]," "[illegible]," "[illegible]," "wild music," "angel and demon music," etc., all to be used at the fitting moment. In one instance within our recollection, the "creeping murderer's music" was, through a [illegible] mistake, played at the [illegible] of Marguerite, while, on [illegible] Gounod's Waltz occurred [illegible] the dying groans of Juliet.

It is good [illegible] to say that our good theatre leaders can and do write appropriate music where it is required. But [illegible] the greater number cannot do so, and have no choice left but to borrow the needed music [illegible] appears of [illegible].

Once leader and band engaged, the managers ordinarily [illegible] the scientific music played between the acts, [illegible] to play nothing but pieces already too familiar to the public by the art of the organ-grinder, forgetting entirely, that the public, from the [illegible] not [illegible] of good and bad music.

We have often wondered [illegible] might almost [illegible] of [illegible]. Whenever good music is performed there are few but appreciate and applaud it. Even small orchestras have [illegible] Haydn's and Mozart's symphonies [illegible] of [illegible]. There is no earthly reason why a fragment of a Quartet, Sonata or Overture [illegible] not be given occasionally. Several [illegible] and German masters, such as [illegible] and others have written [illegible] for the express purpose to be played between the acts. [illegible] to be [illegible] why not select from Strauss and Lanner, at least well written dance music, rather than [illegible] the public taste by a hodge-podge [illegible] of sixty operas and other [illegible] of these [illegible] the [illegible] connection with the one that [illegible] music.

An intelligent manager might, instead of [illegible] to encourage his orchestra in the right direction, [illegible] two equally well-directed theatres, the [illegible] certainly [illegible] the one where the [illegible] of good music is more [illegible].

Does not the public at the concerts of the Camera [illegible] between poor and good bands, poor and good music? Does [illegible] audience [illegible] whenever a good piece of music is performed show at least that its beautiful [illegible] fail to [illegible] as is the use of the painter, the sculptor, [illegible] or architect? Do the managers think their public less intelligent? If so, we believe they are mistaken.

1. There is no reason why, if music is needed at all in our theatres, good music and [illegible] orchestra should not be given.

2. To present under the name of orchestra, a small number than from [illegible] to [illegible] pieces is an insult to the intelligence of the public and should be [illegible].

3. To degrade good [illegible] to the level and numbers of a common [illegible] band shows that the manager does not believe in the progress of culture, and is consequently unfit for his duties.

4. To compel the musicians to play [illegible] is [illegible] among them is unworthy of a well-conducted theatre that is desirous of the patronage of the [illegible].

A reform in music in our own [illegible] is sadly needed, and the more [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] done to them every evening to the popular taste, we have [illegible] but one Symphonic Concerts [illegible] Chamber Concerts, of beyond the reach of most of our theatre goers.—Boston Transcript.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" (of which we give in another place a German's thoughtful criticism, after hearing it in Paris), has met with success in London. Of the way in which it was done, here is the Athenæum's account:

It may be stated as unfortunate that the "cuts" necessary to reduce M. Gounod's "Romeo" within reasonable limits, have necessitated omissions by which the balance of the composition is destroyed. The choral prologue behind the curtain, which forms part of the prelude or overture, has been suppressed. We forgive this by a choice regret ... the ballet music, and even Juliet's great air before the drinking the potion; but we must regret that the recitative of the concerted finale of the third act, should have been found requisite, still more, that the nuptial march and Epithalamium in the fourth act, have been taken away. It falls out that a large amount of solidity and contrast is inevitably lost, and that after the first act, the opera is virtually reduced to a dialogue, with a few snatches of song for the subordinate characters, a few morsels of chorus and one concerted piece—that of the brawl. It is true that Juliet's caprice and Romeo's passions are expressed with a finish of detail beyond the reach of any one save M. Gounod; but the profuse waste of monologue and recitative, most richly accompanied present on the audience. Of the duets, that of the balcony scene is the best. The charm of the nocturne in [illegible] quarters cannot prevent loss in representation than we had expected. Its perpetual modulations and ... wearying the ear. We should fear that the habit of [illegible] ... ing these was become as chronic with M. Gounod, did we not recollect the delicious freshness and simplicity of the first two acts of the opera which preceded "Romeo,"—"Mireille."

What is curious is the ... formation of a peculiarity which cannot be called M. Gounod's sole property, with the use already pointed out. Has he possible to follow this "Romeo" without being aware of the many traces of Meyerbeer-ism which it contains. The thinly singing broken recitative rhythm ... be found, a style of which ... perhaps, the opening chorus of "Robert," has not been heard by Meyerbeer's ... escape a vein. There is no positive plagiarism in the sense of quarrel between the tonics ... but in colour was anticipated in the Fables Chorus scene in "Les Huguenots."

M. Gounod's music gains essentially by being produced on the stage. So artfully are the orchestral renditions of his harmony distributed throughout the score, that (where heard) they pass unnoticed, even as did Chopin's bare chords and progressions, when Chopin's own enchanting hands touched the pianoforte. Among many lovely passages, the best, is the symphony before the tomb of Juliet—a funeral march for youth and beauty without ... comparable ... for an analogous effect had he wished ... "Romeo." The counterfeit of his beautiful prelude (not to praise at random) was the most exquisite performance we recollect in England—unique in its combination of pathos, accent and charm of tone. Yet the same public that applauded in this ... the tawdry and essentially inexpressive Benedict prelude to "L'Africaine" let the movement pass with frigid indifference. The opening and close of the second act must not be passed over as in M. Gounod's best manner.

Every resource that the Royal Italian Opera possesses has been brought to bear on the production of "Romeo." Mlle. Patti's Juliet leaves little to be desired. The part is a winning one, but the lady who has to sustain it, the first after Madame Miolan-Carvalho, does so at no common disadvantage, since every one agrees that her Juliet is among the most transcendent exhibitions of Art, and the subtlest ever passing within among Art, which the opera stage has seen. Mlle. Patti is charming in the opening scenes of the boyish girlish Juliet, yet admirably graceful, her girlish timidity yielding by degrees to the power of "the mighty conqueror" and merging in an unpassioned tenderness, an implicit trust, and a firm resolution to do, as Love, and (if need were) to die, rather than for one instant to be false to the one absorbing interest which has possessed itself of her entire being. Every note of the music is exemplified out by her to perfection. Her voice, besides being in her in younger than it was during her first seasons in England, where it seemed to have a certain phenomenon tone, as belonging to an organ yet naturally worked and developed. She has deservedly raised herself higher than she has till now stood, by this performance which in fact, so far as the principal Artists are concerned, is essentially the ... of the opera. Signor Mario is a picturesque Romeo. His is the bearing which befits the son of a noble house. The stage has had ... as he. As a picturesque his Romeo will presently pair off with his Faust, since we his first taking up a part, he is habitually apt to be uncertain in its effects; but the indication of the real character is throughout evident; and in the grand scenes he is intense yet delicate as a whisper, with a shade of extravagance. It is not his fault, still less ours, that the faults of the

that we must speak of his acting before his singing. Signor Cotogni is bright and skilful as Mercutio, and gives the difficult song of "Queen Mab" (the mere charm of which lies in the airy trickery of its accompaniment) with brilliancy. Signor Tagliafico ... Friar Laurence, has a noble bass voice, and an effective stage presence; but his part has been so shorn, cut as to deprive him of every opportunity of making an effect. M. Petit, as Tybalt, is clever but hard; his voice is not of peculiar quality. Signor Neri-Baraldi is Tybalt. The page Stephano, is Mlle. Nau, who he may described, without hyperbole as a miniature copy of what her mother was.

The Nature and Object of Artistic Instruction.

(From the German of Riehl's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

WE distinguish, in every work of art, its spiritual purport and the material element in and through which that reveals itself. Both, however, are blended into one undivided whole so that the work of art cannot be said to be in one part material and in another spiritual. It is the spirit alone which has collected the material and it is present in and penetrates the whole of this material so far as it reveals itself in the work of art; while on the other hand, every portion of the material renders it ... only for that purpose, and in that sense for and in which, the spiritual idea reveals itself in the entire work. The Pastoral Symphony does not consist,—first of a number of sounds, melodies, harmonies, &c., &c., and then of the idea of rural life; but both constitute one whole; these ideas of rural life have called into being and have embodied themselves in just these melodies and harmonies.

As the spiritual and material elements in a work of art are one and inseparable, so is the act of artistic creation the whole man is present as an undivided and inseparable creative being with his senses, his feelings, and clear perception, with his will and his action with the whole amount of his past experience and acquisitions, as, kindled by the electric spark of creative love, they flash up and flow together into the form of the new work. It is this circumstance which shrouds in such deep mystery the origin and production of a work of art. Whence came that spiritual idea which the artist reveals? We may indeed show how it became accessible to him. In that Pastoral Symphony to which we have before alluded, there are many representations of scenes of nature and rural life, the ideas of which must have been moving in the mind of Beethoven. But these ideas he had been formed by personal impressions long before the work of Art was conceived and executed; they were familiar and clear to many other musicians besides Beethoven, who, nevertheless, did not feel themselves called to embody them as a work of art.

A special and altogether personal inclination was required, in addition to these ideas; and it was necessary that this inclination should be fired to that peculiar spiritual and sensuous ardor which is called inspiration, and that it should become active, through that peculiar power which we have designated by the term "creative love." And, besides all this, it was necessary that the artist should be in the complete possession of the power of formation; that is to say, that he should be acquainted with, and have full command over, all those combinations of sounds and instruments which constitute the practical part of musical composition, and which are as indispensable to the composer as language is to the poet.

I have here considered art in its highest phase, as creative art. Representative art, and even mere artistic understanding, are however of the same nature. Artistic understanding and representation are impossible without natural capabilities and acquirements of different kinds. I must be generally susceptible for art; I must have become capable of understanding the language of the particular work which I wish to study and perform; I must have so cultivated my mind as to be able to raise myself to the height of its idea; and lastly by practice have acquired sufficient external skill for its proper execution. But with all these natural gifts and preparatory acquirements, both the conception and performance of the work of art are imperfect and void of real life, without the presence of that electric spark which flashes up with the impetuosity and incomprehensibility of an original power at the moment that the creative spirit in the work of art comes into inspiring contact with my sympathetic mind.

Now the difference between Art instruction and other branches of tuition is plain, and the nature of its task lies clearly before us. The task of every other branch is limited inasmuch as it occupies itself with a special and therefore limited capability of the learner. It conveys to his mind something not previously known, and provides for the prosecution of study as it exercises his faculties in some more or less partial direction for the acquirement of certain descriptions of practical skill. Grammar conveys to the student the material of language (words) and shows him the laws according to which it may be multiplied and in its ... combined. It engages merely the understanding and memory of the learner whose other capabilities and entire personality have nothing to do with its special task. The understanding and memory of the teacher and the understanding and memory of the pupil, are the only things brought into action. The same is the case with every kind of technical training. Insight aided by experience and reflection—say more attention and a natural turn for a thing are all that are required by the instructor, and that are to be awakened and developed in the learner: all the other qualities, the soul as man as such, remain outside the field of training.

This, as the above retrospective glance at the nature of Art has shown us, does not suffice for an artistic development. It is not the possession of any or several special qualifications which makes a man an artist, or susceptible to art; but the entire man with all his powers combined constitutes the entire principle of art. Artistic instruction, therefore, can be neither of a purely mechanical, nor a purely intellectual nature, nor can it be confined to some special form of mental activity.

In Art, sense and soul are one. Artistic instruction, consequently, cannot be either mere training or mere doctrine, the development of any particular kind of mental activity. It must be Education. It must lay hold of and educate the entire man; that is to say, it must draw him upward from a state of insufficiency to that position of sufficiency which artistic life and activity demand.

There is still another sense in which artistic instruction must be education. Doctrine, properly so called, concerns itself with the peculiarities of the learner only in so far as to take notice of his aptness for an especial subject; which enables him, by an intelligent and methodical proceeding, to acquire with greater facility and certainty. For the rest, the individuality of the learner is to it a matter of perfect indifference: there is not one kind of mathematics or philosophy for some and a second kind for others.

In artistic instruction the case is different. It is true there is [illegible] but one Art and one law of Art for all. But every artistic act, after all, receives its last form and expression from the individuality of the artist out of whose nature and momentary condition it arises with electric and demoniac power. The spirit of Art is universal, as that of Humanity; but every one of its acts is strictly individual. It is I, and I alone, in my present condition in whom this form which they call one work of Art, springs into life; and this form is not a [illegible] but is not a universal, but a strictly individual entity. Consequently all artistic instruction must again be directed upon the individual person of the learner; it cannot assume: Art to "some one or the other" but it has to bring up, to educate this particular person for artistic activity, with a faithful preservation of all his individual peculiarities.

And now all ye that have the soul take it to heart—above all ye, my fellow laborers in the paths of tuition—recognize what our calling demands from us! The educator must himself be an educated man: not merely a trained, but a really educated man in his whole nature and [illegible] in a state of high culture and elevated ideas. The noble good in the educator as in Art itself. The whole soul in the person of the teacher addresses the whole soul in the pupil. The teacher knows, through the power of his self-consciousness, that all the artistically productive is no more than the immediate expression of the individuality, that it [illegible] and its effects so long as [illegible] but what is peculiar to himself. He must therefore hold inviolate the person and individuality of his pupil, who, like himself, can only operate and produce according to the peculiarity of his organization. Let not these two be called, teacher and pupil: they are master and youth standing towards each other in the spiritual relation of paternity and of sonhood. He who feels not this in himself, who enters upon the office devoted, cold and void of affection, to him, either art itself is foreign or unknown and forms of gain have been the motive to the profession,—misconception alone has led him to his path. What makes the master and youth, is not merely the mutual pursuit of the love for the art (for this is not wanting in any instruction) it is independent of that consideration,—personal love.

Each beholds in the other the companion and chosen assistant in the mutual vocation, in which his individuality is more important the more fully it is preserved. As a series of columns supports the portico of the temple, so youthful and mature artists proceed together to the service of the sanctuary, all bearers of the idea which manifests itself in the union.

This is the soul and life of education for Art. Rather than education, however, it should be called artistic teaching; for this reason, that its object is only one branch of human development, while the term education implies the general development of the human soul, of which all special teaching and the various branches of education are component parts. It is in this sense that the problem of Art education, or art teaching, is to be understood. Man approaches man, a whole to a whole, the preceding artist to his successor, in close unity of mind and artistic consciousness, each recognizing in the acknowledgement of his individuality the ground and root from which alone original Art works can be raised. (To be continued.)

Boston Music Hall. We have seen a Circular signed by the Directors of the Music Hall Association, and addressed to the stockholders, warning them "that an effort is being made to purchase their stock, by parties interested (as the Directors believe) in [illegible] of the property or converting it to some use not contemplated by the original subscribers to the Stock;" and earnestly advising them not to part with their shares.

We wish that this may prove to be a false alarm. But how well known that, though the Hall was built for Music and though most of its stock was undoubtedly subscribed for at the outset by music-lovers who sought no return for their money beyond the satisfaction of seeing a noble Music Hall erected in our city which should be sacred to Art forever, yet a considerable portion of the stock (say two-thirds) fell into the hands of commercial people who only sought a profitable investment, and who were and are disposed to murmur so long as they get no dividends. Now what more likely than that some speculators—the same for instance who have managed to get control of the Boston Theatre—should be on the watch to pick up shares enough to league with the disaffected ones, try to convene the original founders and turn the Music Hall into a great factory or carpet warerooms, or whatever will pay best!

The need of a great Music Hall was felt here during the visit of Jenny Lind, and a plan was started in the course of all the ah Academy of Music. But that failed, and the project was revived in January 1851, at the annual meeting of the Harvard Musical Association, where a committee was raised to procure plans, select and purchase a site and raise a subscription stock. The cost of land and building was about $[illegible],000,—real estate and labor being at that time very low. A mortgage was given for $50,000, and the remaining $100,000 was put into shares of $100 each. These were disposed of readily within [illegible] days. About one fourth of the whole was taken by members of the Harvard Musical society, warm friends of music taking from 1 to 100 shares each. But a very large proportion was subscribed for in small sums by musicians and members of musical societies, according to their means. And all this was purely and simply that Boston might have a good place for good music.

Fourteen years the expenses of the Hall exceeded its income. For seven years past, since the Organ was bought, the income has been good, but, instead of dividends, that profit has been applied to the reduction of the debt and to improvements.

Would it not be worth more money for other uses? say the mercantile stockholders. If we surrender it to the greedy maw of trade, for instance? If we deal with it simply as property, and with no reference to the purpose for which it was built? Very likely. But Boston needs it for a Music Hall, for a temple of Art and all aesthetic festivals, far more than she needs an acre or two more added to the vast wilderness of trade. Think what we owe to the Music Hall! What memories of Symphony and Oratorio and great Festivals, what celebrations, School Festivals, floral exhibitions, harmonizing and inspiring influences of all kinds! What can we do without it? Where shall the Muse find refuge? Where is there a place for such another Hall? It would be suicidal policy to let it go. It would be flinging away the artistic progress of fifteen years; it would seriously disorganize, if not derange the aesthetic social culture.

Now these facts have only to be made known to the music-loving people of Boston: they have only to be made aware of the danger and they will certainly rally to the defence of an institution which every patriotic citizen must regard as proudly as one of the sacred palladiums of our city and the Harvard Music class who now hold stock must not, will not part with it. But we have made these statements in the hope that the question may present itself seriously to all friends of Art, with the many more there, both in [illegible] and duty to get some of the Music Hall stock into their own hands, that ere long it may be wholly owned by those who mean to keep it sacred to the interest of Music and of Art. Let an effort be organized to absorb the scattered stock, by all means to absorb the non-music stock and make it all one [illegible] and homogeneous. Then it will be impossible ever to divert the Hall from its true aims.

"But it already has been so diverted" some will say. It has been let, over and again, for uses wholly unartistic! The temporary [illegible] with what reason? Purely for the sake of revenue for Art. The disaffected stockholders had to be conciliated. Income must be had: expenses must be met somehow. It is not better that there should be such music half the time, if it only will pay for a band for good music the rest of the time? The evil, the mistake all the time is Art: but Art is still so poor that she must let out some of her apartments sometimes, or else have her house sold over her head. Patience, and it will come right in the end. Art will yet occupy the whole.

Correct. We copied in our last a piece from the German Gartenlaube, entitled "The Art debut of Henriette Sontag." We took the piece, properly as we found it in other papers, and should of course have given credit also for the translation had we then known, as we do now, that it originally appeared in the New York Leader over the signature Franz [illegible].

We forget from what paper we clipped the following, but we believe the compliment which it contains to be deserved:—

Personal. No one would have expected from the epithets which the telegraph coupled the name, that the recipient of the degree of Doctor of Music, bestowed by Yale College at the late commencement, was Prof. James [illegible] of Hartford Conn., who teaches many of our amateurs and students. The honor was entirely unexpected, and came as a spontaneous and merited acknowledgement of the services of a gentleman who has done probably more than any other musician to extend a cultivated musical taste in Connecticut.

An American Soprano, Miss Jenny Busk, who has achieved distinction in Europe, and was educated (as Jehovah) at the Leipzig Conservatory, is expected to arrive in the country in October and make her debut in New York.

EXPOSITION [illegible]. In Le Ménestrel for July 21 we find the "Official List of Rewards" to exhibitors of Class X, which includes Musical Instruments and Publications. These are classed in the following order:

1. Decorations, under which head occur four names only, as follows:

MERKLIN, knight of the Legion of Honor (Organs). France.

SCHIEDMAYER, knight of Legion of Honor (associate who the honor? [illegible]). France.

CHICKERING, knight of Legion of Honor. (Pianos.) United States.

Then are named as hors concours (out of the competition), they being themselves members of the awarding Jury:

SCHIEDMAYER (J. and P.), Stuttgart (J. Schiedmayer, member of the Jury). Pianos and Harmoniums.

CAVAILLÉ-COLL, Paris (member of the Jury). Organs.

DEBAIN (A. F.), Paris. (Associate on the Jury.) Harmoniums.

ERARD (Mme. Ve.), Paris. (Schaeffer associate on the Jury.) Pianos.

HERZ (Henri), Paris. (Associate on the Jury.) Pianos.

PLEYEL-WOLFF & Co., Paris. (Wolff on the Jury.) Pianos.

VUILLAUME (J. B.), Paris. (Associate on the Jury.) Instruments with a bow.

2. Grand Prize. Only one.

SAX (A. J.), Paris. Brass Instruments.

3. Gold Medals. Seven names.

BROADWOOD & SONS, London. Pianos.

STEINWAY & SONS, New York. Pianos.

CHICKERING & SONS, New York. Pianos.

SOCIÉTÉ ANONYME (Merklin-Schütze & Co.) By the manufacture of great Organs. France and Belgium.

ALEXANDRE père et fils, Paris. Organs.

TRIEBERT (F.), Paris. Wind Instruments of Wood.

STREICHER (J. B.) & SON, Vienna. Pianos.

4. Silver Medals. A list of some 20 awards, including 14 for Pianos, 1 for Organs, 3 for Harmoniums (one from the United States, Messrs. Mason & Hamlin). Also some for stringed and wind instruments, editions of musical works, &c.

5. Bronze Medals. 17 awards: 16 for Pianos, 3 for Organs, 4 for Harmoniums, &c., &c. Two from America: J. GEMÜNDER, New York, for Violins, &c.; L. SCHREIBER, New York, for Brass Instruments.

6. Honorable Mention. A long list; none from the United States.

There were also some fifty Bronze Medals and Honorable Mentions awarded to skilled workmen, employed in various piano and other manufactories in France.

It will be seen from the above that the Decorations are classed as the highest grade of honor, next comes the Grand Prize, awarded only to M. Sax, and third in grade is the Gold Medal. The piano making house of Erard placed itself out of the competition by the fact that one of its members (M. Schaeffer) was on the Jury; but is this gentleman as well as on Mr. Chickering was bestowed the Cross of the Legion of Honor: why is this by way of recognizing these two as at the head of the makers of Pianos? The French have long regarded the Erard as the Grand Piano of all the world beyond comparison; by this act now they welcome the Chickering to an equal place beside the object of their own pride.

TURN-FEST AND CONCERT.—Besides the usual Organ concerts, the only music of the week has been in connection with the German Turners' Fest. The Boston Turnverein had invited their brethren from other cities of the Commonwealth, and three days in the beginning of the week were spent in gymnastic exercises, prize exhibitions, picnics, music and all the wholesome, brotherly Teutonic ways of having a good time. The sight of them, in their neat and easy linen costume, marching through the streets, all strong and blooming with health, was refreshing. The last day (Tuesday) was spent in the Music Hall; the day was given to a prize gymnastic exhibition, the evening to the concert and distributing of prizes. Much how intellectual the character of the principal pieces, we copy from the Advertiser:

The evening concert in Music Hall at quarter past eight o'clock was so appropriate finale to the Turnfest. It was given by the Boston Turnverein, in honor of their fellow members of the Boston Turnfest, and was a splendid ovational one. The attendance was quite large, and the audience very appreciative and enthusiastic. The programme was as follows:

1. Overture, "Freischütz," Weber; Germania Band. 2. Chor [illegible]. 3. [illegible] Mendelssohn; Orpheus Musical Society. 4. Organ fugue [illegible]; Bach; Master E. Clarke. 5. Adagio from [illegible] Germania Band. 7. [illegible] J. T. Kidderpham. 8. Waltz, [illegible] Germania Band.

Pyramid Exhibition and Distribution of Prizes.

1. Overture, [illegible] Beethoven; Germania Band. 2. [illegible] Orpheus Musical Society. 3. Organ, "Improvisation," Master E. Clarke. 4. "The [illegible]" [illegible] Mendelssohn; [illegible]. 5. [illegible] Germania Band.

The singing by the Orpheus Musical Society was of the highest order, and from the enthusiasm displayed with which it was received, Mr. Kreissmann was heartily received in his solo. The Boston Turners acquitted themselves well in their pyramidal formations, and many of the designs were quite effective. While they were on the floor the distribution of prizes took place. Mr. C. Lawrence called upon the various successful competitors, who were escorted to the platform, where they received their prizes and the applause of their friends. Mr. Schöll, who gained the first prize, was crowned with a laurel wreath. The following is a list of the successful prizemen:—

General Gymnastic Exercises. First prize—[illegible] Schöll, of Boston; second prize, [illegible]; third prize, [illegible]. [illegible] prize—[illegible] of Boston. [illegible] of Worcester.

High Running. First prize—[illegible] of Worcester; second prize—[illegible] Weber of Springfield.

Long Jumping.—Prize—[illegible] of Worcester.

Foot Race.—Prize—[illegible] Landgraf of Providence.

Rifle Shooting.—First prize—[illegible]

Diplomas were also presented with the first diplomas for general gymnastic excellence. Complimentary mention was made of L. Lawrence of Springfield, and F. R. Hartzer of Boston for gymnastic exercises, and of M. Hecker of Worcester in connection with the foot race. The jumping foot race and rifle shooting took place at Wood Pond on Monday.

With the concert the Turnfest was closed; and thus was ended an occasion of much pleasure and gratification, unmarred by a single disagreeable fact one for which our German citizens so deserve can be held responsible. The impressions which they have left are most favorable to them, and all will be glad to again welcome the Turners of Boston district to this city when the time for another festival arrives, or when any Turnverein desires to visit the "City of Notions" on its own responsibility.

FESTIVAL IN KEENE, N. H. The Cheshire County Musical Convention commences a five-days Festival (their third) at 2 o'clock next Monday. The Conductors are Messrs. Carl Zerrahn and W. O. Perkins; the solo singers, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. Jennie Kempton (recently returned from Europe), Mr. James Whitney, Mr. M. W. Whitney and Mr. D. C. Saunders (Bass; and humorous vocalist). For accompaniments, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and Mrs. M. D. Shepard, pianist. Of course there is a new collection of psalmody to be sung from and Apostrophised, this time it is called the "Church Bell;" but the singers have also laid out other and higher work for themselves, namely Haydn's "Spring," from the Seasons; Mendelssohn's 42d Psalm, and Rossini's Stabat Mater, with the last is in striking contrast to the Puritan psalm tunes.

Crete.

A happy island in the Ægean blue
To Hellas severed, with a voice of streams;
Elysium glistening with immortal dew—
A shadowed land of dreams.

Mysterious blossoms alternately bloomed
Where lonely surges moaned about the shore,
On cooler heights the sacred oil [illegible] gloomed
Around a temple's door.

And maiden Maia crowned above the waves,
Her pure brow lifted to the glowing sea,
And kept the secret of her winding caves,
God-haunted every one.

No more the Naiad slips a pearly arm
Through wreathing coral blossoms to the air
Nor Eos, waking in eternal charm,
Unveils her radiant hair.

Fair Aphrodite's rosy curves of grace,
The wooing cadence of her [illegible] voice,
No more [illegible] imperial face
Bewilder with a choice;

But all the heights re-echo dying cries,
The vines flare in volcanoes of fire
And where the sea reflects the reddened skies,
The beacon the [illegible] spire,

Down with the torrents dash the swords of men,
A ceaseless struggle writhes along the sand,
The Greek and Moslem grapple in the glen
Through all the homeless land.

A land of graves, an open grave it lies
With silent faces white upon the steep
With women crosses trailed where their eyes—
Wide eyes that cannot weep.

No pause for sorrow in the weary night,
When crouching foes forbid the broken wall,
And, ghastly marbles in the moon's clear light,
The children lie so pale.

All woes of death, all agonies of loss
In shapeless horrors front the Summer's smile,
And wilder shouts where high the crescents toss,
Ring down the dark defile.

Charge the foes of that nation
Come again!
Shrieks amid your fathers' bones—
Heroes of men!
But! they falter—they shall fly!
Sphakiotes,
Glances [illegible] victory!
At their throats!

We will fight while one remains!
Sons of Crete,
We will make our dying oaths!
Where the [illegible]
Brimmed our cups with purple blood—
Drink of [illegible]
Moslem veins
Pour for us a warrior flood!

They have crossed the [illegible] coast!
Let's [illegible] us a prayer!
Send the Turks to his race,
Learning [illegible]
From our daggers our despair!

Would ye grasp
At the bayonets as sheep?
Ye have said!
Crete [illegible]
When for Crete's beloved sake
We are dead!

The Nature and Object of Artistic Instruction.*

II.

THE TASK OF THE TEACHER DETERMINED BY THE NATURE OF ART.

How stationed more closely is what way is this problem to be solved? Instruction leads to the pupil desire, knowledge, and ability; but not sufficient for the task which is no other than to participate in the art according to the standard of the day. What is deficient, instruction should complete and render perfect. For this purpose, it must make the art known according to its various aspects and developments, must examine into the various capabilities and attainments of the pupil, and must arrive at a clear perception of his wants in regard to the development of his mind, and what should be imparted to him.

That the young student may grow to be a successful servant of art in the attendance of his nature must, in the first place, be preserved and the separate capabilities and dispositions of his mind completed or strengthened when necessary. Instruction must enlighten and fortify the consciousness, charm and engage the feelings, awaken or inspire the [illegible], impart knowledge and improve the memory, sharpen and elevate the mind and the aptitude of the organs. All this must instruction separately and carefully accomplish, although we know the artistic act is neither in the consciousness nor in the feeling nor in any other single faculty, but has its origin in the unity and completeness of all. So too it must divide the body of a work of Art into sentences, melodies, harmonies, tones, words; although it knows that a work of art is nothing single, nothing merely material, but is the duality of idea and accomplishment.

Here then we touch the point where the conception of teaching diverges from the path of art. And with intrinsic necessity. For instruction is not art. It should equip, prepare one for it and lead to it. Preparation however demands a prominent view and classification of the object, and a selection and adoption of the means. The teaching process begins with dismemberment under the prospect and in anticipation of a future recombination and fusion. The artistic process begins with the unity of all co-operating powers; it is from the electric influence that, with the suddenness and indivisibility of lightning, the idea of a work of art, and its perfect form, flashes on the mind. This indeed is the essence of the condition of an artistic act, and therein teaching does not extend. She is neither has nor gives it: it is its opposite. That which instruction immediately and in the first place conveys, can be no real work of art—the spontaneous creation from the mind of the living native artist. For upon a homesteadly it operates, it first robs him of his own free self-confidence, confines and disturbs in him, though its admission from without, that oneness of all his powers from which alone the work of art, considered as creation, representation, or conception, springs.

This is the point at which the secret repugnance to instruction [illegible], (and every kind of instruction employs coercion, inasmuch as it requires something or other contrary to the will of the learner) manifests itself even in the best pupil, by no means their reason. By him, instruction is recognized as a more or less necessary assistance. But freedom of mind spontaneous springing from the immediate impulse of his own individuality and ruling frame of thought,—that which he feels, with the most intense self-consciousness, as the condition of artistic action; that which has not emanated purely from himself he feels not as his own work. From the struggle of the ideas with the stubborn material,—the torment, any almost [illegible] — in ardor and heat of the work—all that lies between the first unpremeditation and its final completion which every true artist knows,—from all this he does not desire to be emancipated. Without it, he feels that art were mere play, as the artist God, who has only to pronounce "Let it be!" and give the result no further care.

Such is the antithesis, the schism. And it is unavoidable where instruction is indispensable; the more needful and more searching the instruction becomes, with the growth of art in purport and development the stronger the antagonism. In the beginning we looked upon artistic practice and instruction, or rather unity and learning from dictation, as undistinguishable: the two were one and at peace. Now what a way from national songs, which pass from mouth to mouth, up to the choruses and finales of our operas and oratorios; from the harp of the bard up to the many-headed host of our orchestras; from the human voice of the poets of nature—even an Aeschylus or Pindar, who believed that beyond the country lay only barbarous and Cimmerian darkness, up to the view of a Shakespeare or a Goethe commanding the whole globe with the movements of centuries. Here no single individual's power suffices for our equipment; the individual worth finds himself in a perilous isolation. Instruction must prepare the way, must form a path; for who would not otherwise soon lose himself in error, must necessarily seek her guiding hand, and in a few months' retirement and perseverance try to gain the treasure of experience and discernment that centuries have amassed with untold toil, and which now no one can dispense with, since he has entered into the artistic life and consciousness of the age.

This antithesis, this schism, is neither to be disclaimed nor put down. So it has to the nature of art and of instruction. It is incumbent on us teachers to mitigate the pressure, to reconcile the difference and make it harmless.

This we can do if in all the necessary subdivision and detail of instruction we maintain a clear recollection and feeling of the mutual fitness and unity which are essential to art. Where we practise skill, the spirit must be present; the practice itself must show the artistic mood and purpose. It must be pervaded by the breath of the feeling to which it seeks to lend a clear expression. When we make a study in the former kind, our mind expand with a feeling of life; be inspired by a spirit already see the form which he thought shall perfect and transfigure. We [illegible] conclude with our first maxim—as whole men and artists approach the pupil as a whole man, opening and dedicating himself to Art, as one becoming an artist, and keep awake and strong in him, as in ourselves the sense of individuality and of artistic character as the one powerful and pure incentive. This feeling however is as far from any vanity as Art itself. It is no other than the inward sense that we also, as from nature all are equipped men, are open to the wholesome influence of Art—that we have already felt it that we may secure it to ourselves the more abundantly, the more decidedly and purely we devote ourselves to it.

In these considerations the recognition of the art [illegible], a [illegible] is inconceivable. But this does not supersede the first duty to stand it whereever it is possible and as soon as possible, not deciding nor obliterating anything in the mind of the pupil, or in his artistic efforts, which does not appear absolutely to require it.

Instruction has been its best, when it has connected itself most intimately with the artist's life, with all its peculiar and natural, just as the former life of the artist unconsciously flows into the course of his present actions. Then instruction advances as the equal sister and companion of art. As the life of the artist with all its purposes and means, flows together as the art of art so this genuine instruction pours the past experiences, the requirements of art into the spirit of the artist, who is called to stand upon the pinnacle of life. He deceives himself in the extent, to whom this appears only as the "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal," to decoy others and set himself off to advantage.

The all-important thing is, that this principle be strictly carried out through all the individual branches of educational practice, and with all individuals who entrust themselves to our teaching.

The words "Wer Liebe bringt, wird manchen Blumen bringen, wer viel s[illegible] reflection von dem Haus," might have figured in the bills as the motto of the charming miscellaneous concert, somewhat [illegible] character of the third day. We had two overtures (Beethoven's [illegible] pieces, three airs, and Gade[illegible] [illegible] additions), fourteen songs at the piano, but [illegible] the thermometer may have mounted in the Hall, it was exceeded by the [illegible] with the temperature of the public reached its enthusiasm. Perfect hurricanes of applause were the natural result.

The proceedings commenced with an overture by Fétis, the celebrated and venerable head of the Brussels Conservatory. This distinguished man had been invited to conduct his work himself, and it is a great pity that an accident prevented him from doing so. Many persons would, undoubtedly, have been pleased to pay the tribute of grateful respect due from them to the master who, during so many years, has done so much for our art. I leave to scholars the task of properly appreciating the services rendered by Fétis to the history and science of music—but even the most [illegible] cannot help acknowledging his exertions in propagating the comprehension of our German art both in France and Belgium. The Revue Musicale, founded by him about forty years ago, at first did good in the [illegible] to a deeper conception of instrumental music in France, and at the Concerts of the Conservatory at Brussels, which were got up and conducted by him, the symphonies of Beethoven were first opened in the wonderful production of Beethoven's genius. [illegible] Concerts historiques [illegible] gave for the principal towns of France and Belgium, the feeling for an unprejudiced appreciation of [illegible] epochs in art [illegible] spread, and whatever has been done of the same kind since then here and there in Germany and is now being carried out as a supplement to the Exposition in Paris, owes its origin to these concerts. Fétis's numerous compositions, as well as the Festival Hall, appeared by the way to be very much out of tune for they manifested but little sympathy for the work of their prophet.

Mme. Harriers-Wippern sang the lovely air as it is called in Germany from Don Juan, the grand scena from Der Freischütz and two songs "In der Ferne," and "Das Vöglein im Walde," by Taubert. Mme. Harriers is one of the first singers in Germany. Her voice possesses a truly ringing charm, which has nothing full of strength, with no exaggerated or forced sentiment, brilliant, and has [illegible] about a [illegible] boldness. An agreeable and noble bearing, a sprightly presence, are all she does. Her rendering of Agathe's air [illegible] carried her hearers away—it was as genuine in its purity as fiery in the ecstasy of love. When she sang the "Vöglein im Walde" some thought of Zerlina, "I is the lark" while others marvelled at Juliet with the nightingale—but it was really the countess of Ahlefeldt Wippern, Royal Chamber-Singer from Berlin.

In three songs by Schumann "Waldesgespräch," "Ich grolle nicht" and "Die Frühlingsnacht," Niemann displayed the whole power of his tremendous organization. His rendering of "Ich grolle nicht" more especially was electrical to his hearers. As he stood before them while the full deep tones escaped from his breast, and all the agony of a broken heart burst forth from each word, and the restrained reproach and the lament of a double misery of treason towards love [illegible] stronger and stronger, sharper and sharper into the hearts of all those who were listening to him on the [illegible] a "Bravo"—the audience might well have broken themselves in applause from the moment when to the [illegible] of a fearful tragedy for which there is no solution save suicide. "That is not merely singing," I heard some one remark. To speak the truth, I would not point you to any young ladies and [illegible] sweet souls are not in a [illegible] of this style. But if a standard of more ordinary accomplishments, laudable as they are, must not be applied to [illegible] and vocality so as to [illegible]. The audience done us by [illegible] with all [illegible] of violence we can accept with a thankful heart.

After Niemann had thus filled his audience with "delightful horror" Mlle. [illegible] who followed with one or two songs, were enabled to prove, most satisfactorily, that the sympathetical y compliance [illegible] of a pleasing manner may enchant the ear even after the strongest excitement. Niemann had been obliged to repeat his last performance—he added to his song by Beethoven "Adelaide" which pleased uncommonly thanks to its agreeable melodic treatment.

With the word "Fanny," Mlle. Bettelheim began her air—the same than well known air from Mozart's Tito. Was there a complaint allusion in this? I scarcely think it. Still so it is—she departs—Hymen snatches her from Apollo and the Muses, or, to express myself in homely German, she marries and retires from the stage, and it was in Aix-la-Chapelle that she appeared for the last time under the name by which she has made a name. However, it is as impossible for her to tear herself from music as from her own soul, and perhaps it is better for her talent and our art that henceforth she will sing only where she loves, and whom she loves. I trust she will return very frequently to the Rhine, where she has made a regular conquest of hearts. The muses she loves she will always find faithfully fostered here.

A pupil of the worthy Ferdinand David of Leipsic (whose violin class has become a regular nursery for great and little fiddlers) Herr August Wilhelmj of Wiesbaden, created this evening, even every other occasion, the greatest sensation thereof. Almost a mere youth (he is nineteen), though every difficulty presented by the most difficult of all instruments has become mere child's play to him, or rather scarcely that. Anybody might [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and patiently, though not perhaps without a certain curiosity as to how the thing would go off to some one who was using his arms and hands to play that once. While the musicians of the furthest benches of the orchestra [illegible] their heads, almost incredulously at the passages of thirds, octaves, and tenths, at the infallible flageolet tones, and, in a word, at the boldness and certainty of technical skill that has something fabulous about it, the young artist himself appears to take just as little interest in his own talent, as in the applause which all the more attached. But he is very wrong, for the Italian [illegible] of the Ritornelles he overcomes, because they were never, perhaps, [illegible] too for him, the beautiful tones he draws from his violin should possess no less charm for him than for all of us. Or did not the piece he played (a Concerto by Paganini and [illegible] Mazurka by Ernst) please him? Or was he thinking of Goethe's words "You will never find a rhymester who does not consider himself better than every other, or a fiddler who does not prefer playing his own melodies?"—I do not know. Melodies of his own will come in time—and there are already so many beautiful ones that may be as beautifully played! At any rate I take the liberty of saying a good word to Herr Wilhelmj in favor of his talent. This deserves not only the applause of the public, but the particular and sincere sympathy of him on whom a kind fate bestowed it.

As is generally the case at our Musical Festivals one of the finest choruses from the oratorio of the first day was repeated on the third. But this practice ought some day or other to be abandoned for it is something painful to remark how these pieces, torn from the context, transplanted to the midst of surroundings foreign to them, and sung by a weary and hardly [illegible] chorus, fail to produce the proper effect. After the "Vögel im Walde" one of the best [illegible] has a bad place. As we have borrowed this custom [illegible] we ought to make it into the example of the English who end with [illegible] the present one—In the magnificent [illegible] of "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," a finer one surely could find a satisfactory way of showing termination.

The practice of flinging flowers, which at most previous musical concerts are carried to such a pitch that anyone might have fancied himself transported to the midst of the Carnival at Rome, was on this occasion omitted. An undoubted step in advance! But the customary laurel-wreath commonly accepted as for the conductor was not wanting—I did not, however, see my good friend the [illegible] in a glow [illegible] round his shoulders. They are strong enough to bear it.

Shall I now speak of the joyous hours passed after the concerts in the rooms of the Kurhaus [illegible], the Refreshment Rooms, and the many other agreeable resorts in which Aix-la-Chapelle is so rich? Or of the suppers, so fertile in toasts, of-

[illegible] after the last concert by the hospitable Committee? Such subjects are not included in the domain of "Musical Letters." I must leave all this to the good-natured, unclouded, festive face that prevailed everywhere. It proved that [illegible]

It was a beautiful Festival, and to all who contributed to render it such I hereby tender my warmest thanks.

A Visit to Franz Liszt at Rome.*

The building in which Liszt resides in Rome is of an [illegible] appearance. [illegible]

[illegible]

After I had arranged my necktie and [illegible] my gloves [illegible]

[illegible]

Those who look upon Liszt as a riddle will most decidedly not find the solution of it in his outward appearance.

After having interchanged a few words of greeting, we proceeded to the work-room. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] he said, had been sprung into existence, and also the oratorio of Christus, that was to be produced at the approaching grand centenary of St. Peter and St. Paul. [illegible]

He certainly knew, pursued the Abbé Maestro, [illegible]

[illegible]

"A splendid balcony might be erected here," observed Liszt, [illegible]

[illegible]

The thanks I conveyed in my words on taking leave were warm and sincere.

Music Abroad.

The London Opera.

Royal Italian Opera.

The Telegraph of July [illegible] has the following review of the past season.

The last week has been the most active and [illegible] of the season that closed on Saturday. [illegible] On Monday "L'Africaine" was given, on Wednesday [illegible] on Thursday "Don Giovanni" [illegible] "Romeo and Juliet" was repeated on Tuesday and Saturday. [illegible] singer. But "Medea" will remain her grandest impersonation, and as we remarked on Friday last, in noticing his performance, it is much to be regretted that this opera was only given once, and then as one of the closing nights instead of during the regular season. Mlle. Tietjens has had no rival in her special line except a Mlle. Clarens, a good singer but with a voice [illegible] by an unsure [illegible], who appeared three times as Lucrezia Borgia, but in no other character. In this opera Mlle. Trebelli made her mark in the manner singing the careful music of Maffio Orsini as it has never been sung since "Alboni the Great." A voice of luscious quality Mme. Trebelli came to the more [illegible] still, always being equal to any [illegible], [illegible] and always ready to undertake any part, however small. Although she is the best Azucena without any exception whatever who has trod the stage in our generation, "[illegible]" has never since been given [illegible] had any very prominent part to fill. Mme. Trebelli's best characters have been Fatima, whose songs she sings delightfully in "Oberon" and Pierotto in "Le Forza" [illegible] the [illegible] special praise for [illegible] appearing as one of the three Damsels in "Flauto Magico," [illegible] opera it is [illegible] always to sing in company with the two most [illegible] voices that ever [illegible] [illegible] Mme. Trebelli-Lablache has had considerable experience of the stage, and, in the absence of Mme. Titiens, has been of use to the management. In tenors the company has been very rich. The most highly gifted and the most popular has been Signor Mongini, who has been present all the season and who has sung in [illegible] in almost every opera. He has, beyond all comparison, the finest tenor voice in Europe, splendidly full and sweet in tone, and perfectly equal in power. Throughout its extensive compass his voice is capable of [illegible] every [illegible] of an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Signor Mongini, too has a warm [illegible] style of singing and much dramatic feeling. Unfortunately, he is frequently carried away by his emotions and forces a voice that needs no forcing. If he would but moderate his energy he would be the finest [illegible] of the time. He surprised all his admirers last Tuesday by the success of his Manrico in [illegible] "Il Trovatore" is still the opera in which he appears to most advantage. He has this year a tolerably efficient substitute in Signor Tasca, who may be described by [illegible] [illegible] of promise [illegible] Mr. Hohler has maintained his good name by undertaking second-rate parts, and replacing at a short notice other singers. [illegible] does not easily [illegible] to do justice to his voice, the sweet quality of which excited expectations that are not seldom gratified. The most accomplished of the tenors engaged, and also the most useful, has been Signor [illegible], whose co-operation in such operas as "Il Flauto Magico" and "Faust" has been of the utmost value. Mr. Santley's repertoire is as large as that of Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Mongini, while he is infinitely more reliable than the gentleman with whom we have coupled him, and he is as ready as Mme. Trebelli to accept any part, however small. Then he is a [illegible] [illegible] to the company, [illegible] character of Nevers in "Les Huguenots," [illegible] buffo parts, such as Leporello and Papageno, sings the [illegible] music of Pizarro in "Fidelio" with a power that has not been rivalled of late years, and renders Creon in "Medea," the chief of [illegible] [illegible], with sustained dignity and magnificent effect. No style is strange to him, and he invariably as perfect in his part as though he had been singing nothing else all the season. If Signor Gassier's voice is not comparable to that of our English baritone, he is [illegible] equally capable and ready, while Signor Foli, a young basso, promises to attain a high position on the stage, and Signor Bossi is most satisfactory in parts of secondary importance. A word of praise must be spared for Mr. Lyall, who has displayed much [illegible] in many subordinate tenor parts. With Herr Rokitansky's noble voice has been heard in several [illegible] has for him, would have been irreproachable Sarastro [illegible] in "Il Flauto Magico." Il Commendatore, in "Don Giovanni," &c., has, for the first time, [illegible] Falstaff in Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor [illegible] has been in every respect a great improvement on his predecessor Signor Junca. Signor Foli [illegible] may be included with [illegible] [illegible], and her [illegible] Mlle. [illegible] who has a fresh pleasant voice is the only one who need be particularly mentioned.

But all these artists must confess to the majority of them are, would not, it is to be feared, have raised the season had not a young prima donna with a lovely voice great in the [illegible] [illegible] her appearance and with the distinction of manner which we [illegible] associate with high breeding arrived upon the scene and saved the fortunes of the house. Although Mlle. Nilsson made her début in "La Traviata," an opera which is eminently distasteful to us, and which was used up by the [illegible] [illegible] brought it to this country, the success of the fair Swedish singer was from the first evening assured. It was at once perceived that there was some lacking French [illegible] in her manner of singing, and that she had not much [illegible] but nevertheless, the charming quality of her voice, her perfection of her vocalization, and the charm of her manner instantly raised the popular [illegible], and she maintained the advantage thus easily gained until the very end of the season. In Marguerite and Donna Elvira she did not enhance her reputation; but she sang the two great airs of the Queen of Night in "Die Zauberflöte" in admirable style, and found in "Martha" the character best adapted to [illegible] favourable display of all her personal and acquired gifts. Mr. Mapleson is, indeed, fortunate. Two years ago he suddenly secured the presence of Mlle. Ilma de Murska, an erratic singer who, for so strange results drew crowds to his house, and he has now replaced her by another soprano [illegible] of vastly greater merit.

Without the hearty co-operation of an experienced [illegible] and indefatigable musician like Signor Arditi such performances as those of "Fidelio" and "Medea" would have been simply impossible. He drilled the orchestra into a state of great proficiency while the chorus is the best that has been heard on any London stage in our recollection.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC. At the concert recently held under Herr Otto Goldschmidt's direction, the progressive character chiefly of the [illegible] works of the pupils, among them being an overture in C major by Mr. Alwyn, a pianoforte sonata by Master Shakespeare who played the first movement of it, and several vocal pieces. The prizes were distributed by Lady Wilton, and the Earl of Wilton gave a well deserved round of praise to the director and Herr Goldschmidt, for the energetic way in which they have presided over the Academy.

Paris.

PARIS CONSERVATOIRE. A writer in the France Musicale, writing on the recent examination for the annual prizes in the Paris Music School, remarks on the small proportion of pupils with some science. This year there were a dozen baritones and basses, but only three or four tenors. Two of the former, MM. Wezard and Gaillard gained the first prizes for singing. Among the tenors M. Vivien who only received an "accessit" [illegible] by the [illegible] [illegible] a very pure and delicious voice giving great promise for the future. The young ladies voices are described as being even better than usual. Mlle. Bruner-Lafleur took the first prize. In the pianoforte classes the jury had to choose from fifty-four candidates—eighteen gentlemen and thirty-six young ladies. Among both sexes the excellence was so great that they adjudged three first prizes to the gentlemen, MM. Cortes, Ernthernal and Rambourg and five to the ladies, Mlles. Wilden Krasinski Müller Conradi and Laroux. In the Opera Comique the successes again were extraordinary. In fact this audience preponderance of ladies seems to be the case in nearly all the classes. The pieces selected for performance by each of the [illegible] students were Hiller's concerto in F minor for the ladies, and Chopin's second concerto, in the same key, for the gentlemen. Of the successful candidates M. Gaillard and Mlle. Bruneau are to go to the Opera Comique, and M. Wezard to the Grand Opera House.

THE PARIS SCHOOL OF SACRED MUSIC held its anniversary on the 20th ult. when a diploma of "Chapel Master" awarded by the Government, was given to one of the pupils. The vocal music performed was selected from the works of the great writers of the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries, and the pupil-band moreover played one of Beethoven's quartettes.

MUSICAL PRIZES. An announcement has just been made by the Minister of Fine Arts, at Paris, which has considerable interest for French composers and indirectly for English musicians, as we may hope that our own Government will, in time, be induced to follow a similar encouragement to the profession. It has, we understand, been decided to offer three prizes in the course of next year, open only to Frenchmen. The first, in connection with the Imperial Opera-house will consist of a double prize, and the [illegible] in one act, and the other for [illegible] of [illegible] which will be represented at the Opera. The second, in connection with the Opera Comique, will be a prize for the best setting of a comic opera in three acts the libretto to be chosen by the directors; and the third, under the auspices of the Théâtre Lyrique, will be a prize for the best opera, the choice of theme and of the form, being left to the candidates. Each of the prize works will be performed within twelve months from the date of adjudication at the respective houses, the directors of which will give a portion of the prize money.—Choir.

M. Offenbach's new work, Robinson Crusoe, will be performed at the Opera-Comique towards the end of September.

The intended series of "Historical Concerts" at the Paris Exhibition will not be given, owing to a disagreement between the Musical Committee and the Imperial Commission.

Mlle. Nilsson is to sing in a new opera, "Les Elfes," by M. [illegible] She goes to the Grand Opera to take the part of Ophelia in the "Hamlet" of M. A. Thomas.

The hoarding which encases the facade of the Grand Opera House was to fall on the 15th inst. The swelling in bronze of the buildings has been transported from the Champ-de-Mars, where it was exposed, the busts of composers had been placed in their niches and on the brown marble could now be read the following names in letters of gold. Mozart, Gounod, Donizetti, Jomelli, Meyerbeer, Grétry, Sacchini, Lesueur, Herold, Spontini, Rossini, Boieldieu, Verdi, Halévy, Piccini, Philidor, Bellini, Campra, Cambert, Adam, Halévy, Weber, Nicolo, Méhul, Cherubini. These are only a third of the names to be afterwards added. By the way, La France Musicale, successful of all the other Parisian papers for acknowledging the mistake the foregoing list. "Instead of Beethoven," says La France, "they have put one Beethoven, with a resume on the first e [illegible] since they have taken away an a [illegible] [illegible] instead of [illegible] they have written [illegible]!" The last fault is perpetrated on the stone itself where the names are [illegible] copied. As for Herold's name, La France's correction recalls the optional orthography of Mr. Weller. But while La France is so particular about spelling everything from "A to a Wee" how comes he to overlook Cherubini with an acute accent?—Athenæum.

WIESBADEN. The Athenæum has the following from one generally cautious on the subject of German music:

Herr Rabecker's opera, "König Manfred," was produced at Wiesbaden the night before last (July the 26th) with most complete and genuine success. It is indeed, a very fine work, and quite surpassed [illegible]. I had not the least expectation that it would put forth anything like the dramatic power which the opera evinces. It is a great Romantic tragedy with ballet, &c. Much of the recitative is accompanied after the modern fashion, but admirably accompanied and in the most part well expressed. The choruses and finale are vigorous and effective. There is no act of graceful melody well written for the whole. The orchestra is admirably treated throughout. The prelude to the fifth act, the epilogue is wonderfully, the orchestral is exquisitely beautiful and was as much so [illegible]. On the whole, I have heard very few productions of dramatic music within the last six years that have given me anything like the pleasure and satisfaction of "König Manfred."

FLORENCE. The People's Concerts at the Pagliano Theatre have met with a degree of success surpassing all expectations. They were established on the 12th May last. The orchestra, under the direction of the Cavaliere Mabellini, consists of a hundred picked musicians. Among the works that have pleased most have been Beethoven's Septet, and C minor Symphony; Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, the Turkish march; Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, and Meyerbeer's overture to Struensee.

Liszt's Oratorio, Christus was executed at Rome on the 6th ult. in the "Hall of Dante."

The Italian musical journals announce that Signor Federigo Ricci is engaged on a new opera buffa, which will probably be entitled "Don Chisciotte e Sancio Panza,"—that Signora Borsi has been singing in "Lurlie," in the San Carlo, Naples with Signor Carrion a great favor where she is likely to be expected—that Signor [illegible] has received a commission to write an opera on the taking story of "Behrimas Faust"—that Signor Sabra is at work on a five act opera, entitled "Leo," and that Signor Ronconi is to be looked to as a rising baritone.

WEIMAR. The operatic season is over, and the artists are reposing from their labors. The holidays of the orchestra, however, have not been of long duration, for the members of that body were ordered to co-operate at the Meiningen Musical Festival, and they have, also, to perform at the Wartburg Jubilee, when the Abbé Franz Liszt's Elisabeth will be executed, under the personal direction of the composer. The only novelty in the way of opera lately was M. Aimé Maillart's romantic opera of Lara. It was not particularly successful, and is not likely to hold a permanent place in the repertory. There was grand [illegible] "Jubilee," on the occasion of Professor Johann Gottlob Töpfer's [illegible]. This celebrated writer on the theory of the organ, and famous organist, was born on the 4th December [illegible], at Niederrossla, near Weimar. The King of Prussia, William I, conferred upon him the Order of the Crown; Queen Augusta of Prussia, a former pupil of his, made a valuable present to the Töpfer-Fund, established for assisting poor and talented Seminarists in Weimar and Eisenach to pursue their studies on the organ; the Grand-Duchess Sophie of Weimar consented to become the patroness of the Fund, and presented a considerable yearly addition to it; his Royal Highness the Grand-Duke Carl Alexander presented with his own hand the Knight's Cross, first ribbon, of the Weimar Order of the Falcon to the respected hero of the Festival; the magistracy of Weimar presented him with the freedom of their city; [illegible] authorities raised his salary as organist; and the University of Jena bestowed the honorary diploma of Doctor on him for his having been the first to propound a scientific theory on organ building. The various teachers in the Duchy offered him a magnificent Album containing an account of all the principal forms of the organ. They made him also a valuable present. Herr Kühn, a bookseller, gave him a similar work [illegible]. At the ceremony in the Seminary Herr [illegible] delivered a most successful speech in honor of the veteran musician, and the teachers and pupils offered him a number of handsome presents. At a grand repast that took place afterwards Herr Töpfer was almost overwhelmed by an immense number of complimentary toasts. The proceedings were brought to a close the next day by a grand concert of sacred music, under the direction of Herr Müller-Hartung. It was reported that Herr Töpfer would have delighted his hearers by extemporising; but he [illegible] performer, but contented himself with [illegible] on the organ [illegible]. The choruses were brilliantly sung by the members of the Singakademie who gave, also, Liszt's Vater unser, and Christopher Bach's Motet, Ich lasse dich nicht. The solos were confided to Mme. [illegible] Wettersheim, Dr. [illegible], Herren Zerb and Thoms. The last named gentleman sang, moreover, Mendelssohn's air, [illegible]. The organ part in Liszt's "Vaterunser" as well as in the famous "Hallelujah" from Handel's Messiah, which Herr Töpfer had arranged for a chorus of male voices and orchestra [illegible] organ, was played by Herr [illegible] who performed, in addition, Herr Töpfer's most difficult organ composition, an unpublished Concert Fantasia on the chorale, "Mache dich, mein Geist bereit." Herr Werner another pupil of Herr Töpfer's performed the Concert Fantasia, highly interesting from a contrapuntal point of view: "Was mein Gott will g'scheh' allzeit."

MEININGEN. At the approaching "Tonkünstler-versammlung," or Meeting of Musical Artists the works performed will be: "Was man auf den Bergen hört," Liszt; Symphony, Lassen; Symphony, R. Hol (conductor at Utrecht); Overture, [illegible]; [illegible], Hans von Bülow; Overture to [illegible], E. von Mihalovich (Pesth); Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, F. Draeseke; the 23rd Psalm, "Die Seligkeiten," and [illegible], Liszt; "Sappho," vocal scena, R. Volkmann; Violin Concerto, Damrosch; Pianoforte Concerto with Orchestra, F. Liszt; Duet for Soprano and Tenor from the opera, [illegible]; [illegible] Tenor Ballade; [illegible] on two Pianofortes, [illegible]; Poems, Cornelius; Songs, Damrosch and Lassen. In the way of older music there will be compositions by [illegible], Beethoven, Bach, Berlioz, Schumann, while the sacred music will be contributed by Cornelius, Liszt, [illegible], Seb. Bach and Palestrina. The artists engaged are [illegible].

ZURICH. The grand Festival of the Confederation has gone off most brilliantly. It was under the direction of Herr Hegar. The soloists were Mlles. Reinhard, and Wagner, Herren Stockhausen, Schneider, and Jean Becker. The programme included among other works, Bach's "Magnificat," Bruch's scenes from the Frithjof Saga; Handel's [illegible]; overture to Beethoven's Leonore; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; Schubert's Symphony in C major; Sonata by Bach; scenes from Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis; and songs by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Kirchner.

BOSTON, AUGUST 31, 1867.

OUR MUSIC PAGES. With the last number the "Saint Paul" of Mendelssohn (Vocal and Piano Score) was completed. Having run so long upon great choral works we now propose to alternate and give something for our piano-playing readers. Accordingly we commence to-day the publication of MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS (Lieder ohne Worte), and mean to continue the same, four pages at a time, throughout the Seven Books of six Songs each.

Bach's Sacred Works.—His Magnificat described by Robert Franz.

Unquestionably the world is slow to seek intimate acquaintance with Sebastian Bach. That fugues played on full organ, with so little of marked accent in the entering of the parts, should not be clear to many is not strange. But even our [illegible] have owned the power and beauty of some of his violin pieces rendered by a master hand; and now and then a sacred Aria, sung with style and feeling, has reached the general heart almost. We know too, by report of the deep impression which his Passion music and great Mass in B minor have produced wherever they have been performed in Germany and even in London. Here they have been scarcely called for. There is among us an undeniable, a certain dread of Bach; his entrance in a concert room is [illegible], and the very name a bugbear, though a very considerable society even here are getting rather deeply smitten with the love of him.

We verily believe that this avoidance is not founded on any intrinsic lack of truly human interesting qualities in Bach's music; for those who know him know that there is no Art so sincere, so full of beautiful poetry, so sound and wholesome, so [illegible] acquaintance as this Art of his, which so few learn to read. We verily believe that it is owing to the whole direction of our past musical education, which has pampered us with what is highly-coloured, highly spiced, sensational, and not formed [illegible] (by the ear), the mental or the moral habit of perception for this complex, seemingly unpopular polyphonic style of writing. We need to be prepared for it, not necessarily by scientific study, but by beginning with the most approachable, a little at a time, say a few four-part Chorals, and so gradually bringing our hearts into rapport with the style and spirit. It was even so in Germany until Mendelssohn brought out the Passionsmusik.

We scarcely dare to hope that any of our [illegible] of musical education (if it is of any use to speak of "managers") will seriously undertake a Bach Oratorio or Cantata yet awhile. And yet we know the subject has been mooted in our Handel and Haydn Society, and earnestly by some of them in view of their triennial Festival of next May. Of course such music is not "popular," and perhaps never will be. But a great musical Society, with an avowed educational motive, and not merely one of pleasurable excitement or pecuniary gain, ought not to consult the popular pulse alone in all it does. It should do some things not because they will be popular, but because they are good, because it is well to know them. If they speak only to a portion of the public, to a few, as surely as they deeply interest and quicken them, as surely as they plant seeds there, they do really influence the whole culture of the time. If we went solely by popularity, no great master work of poet, artist, or musician ever would be brought out or known except in studies or by hearsay. A musical Society should address some part of its season's programme (it need not be the largest) to the more advanced taste or more [illegible]. A great Festival is a fit time for such an experiment. We do not know whether our old Society will have the courage to look Bach in the face; but it is something even to have begun to moot the question. Meanwhile, to keep the thought in that direction we for our part here undertake the modest task of translating what ROBERT FRANZ has written about one of the shorter (that is, compared to the Passion) and perhaps more practicable of Bach's great sacred works, the Magnificat in D.

Although it cannot be denied that the interest in Bach's vocal works has increased of late years (i.e. in Europe) still, compared to the real worth of these creations, this interest must be counted as but feeble and occasional. The reasons may lie partly in the technical difficulties here to be overcome, partly in the sketch-like form in which Bach has left these works to posterity; partly—and this must be emphasized especially—in the somewhat pretentious habit of the public of to-day of estimating musical achievements mainly with reference to the immediate sensuous enjoyment they afford. The notion that what cannot be "understood" at once must be deemed unsatisfactory and a failure, contrary to the nature of true Art, is unfortunately so widespread, and seemingly justified in thousands of instances, that one can scarcely wonder at the [illegible] steps by such works, which are only to be comprehended and brought home to us by the most earnest and even self-denying devotion. Nobody is willing on his own part to carry anything to Art: he would simply be the passive recipient of pleasure and diversion from Art. Add to this that musical journalism has kept itself as good as altogether silent in regard to Bach's Church compositions generally; with the exception perhaps of the Matthew Passion and the B minor Mass, that hardly one of the master's numberless productions has been the subject of an exhaustive discussion such as would call the attention of larger circles to it, and the want of interest to which we have alluded has indeed a certain justification. Every one thinks he may take it for granted: "That which the Art criticism of to-day leaves so wholly unconsidered, cannot possibly answer the true wants of the present; we do better therefore to leave the interest in Bach's vocal works to the so-called 'connoisseurs and scholars;'" the old gentleman no doubt has written, them principally for them—they may be added to those to their hearts' content?"

It is not our purpose to analyze the reasons of this peculiar attitude of criticism toward these works. It is enough to say that hitherto the public has been altogether destitute of the necessary instruction here need among and adjoining. Also never would seem enough appear. We gladly resign ourselves to the hope, that there will at last be found those called to such a task, to pay an old and heavy debt to the great dead and thereby introduce into our future culture elements, which surely will be rich in blessed influences.

Little as we can see the calling and capacity in us for meeting the want as it should be met, still we hold it our duty to direct public attention to a work, which heretofore has waited in vain for the pen which should lay it nearly to men's hearts.

True, there has been a rumor now for some time of its existence, and it has ever been spoken of with great respect,—but not so that account has it become one into better known. As formerly the B minor Mass passed for one of the most profound and grand of Bach's achievements, and yet for all that its great forms life could hardly be still and unstudied, just so for years there was a vague report of a celebrated Magnificat of the master. Perhaps here too that incomprehensible art may have wrought which so mysteriously draws the human mind toward what is significant, and gradually prepares it for the understanding thereof.

Bach's Magnificat is one of the few among his Church compositions, which lay before the world in print before the editions of the Bach Society. W. Rust tells us (in his excellent preface to the first book of the 11th annual issue of Sebastian Bach's Works) that it had already appeared as soon as the year 1811 (Simrock publisher). To be sure, this edition differs from that of the Bach Society in not unessential points. It shows a different key, E flat major instead of D major, and has none of the alterations which evidently came later from the improving hand of the master. It will be understood of course, that the following analysis is not based upon this edition, but upon the Score of the Magnificat as published by the Bach Society.

The text of the Magnificat is the well-known song of praise of Mary in the Gospel of Luke, chap. I, verses 46–55: "My soul doth magnify the Lord," &c. Although the Bible puts these words in the mouth of a single person, yet owing to their own internal meaning and the excellent contrasts they afford for musical treatment, they had already been used by the composers of the old Italian school for a larger Art-form, in which songs for single voices alternate with choruses. Bach has followed this precedent in his Magnificat, which lies before us as a succession of twelve numbers. We will first endeavor to submit each number to a separate consideration and afterwards to form a fair concept of the composition as a whole.

1. The first number, a chorus in D major, declaims merely the words: Magnificat anima mea Dominum (My soul doth magnify the Lord). In an extended prelude the master unfolds in intervals (the ever-remit one) on which the piece is founded, and which are afterwards brought into more fluid and conscious presence by the vocal setting. The orchestra, rich and brilliant for that day, embraces the stringed quartet, two flutes, two oboes, three trumpets, tympani, and as in most of Bach's church works, the Organ. Each and every part is kept extremely individual and independent in its movement, and they group themselves in three distinct choirs: the string quartet, the wind instruments of wood, the brass instruments with drums. The Organ from which it is well known that Bach used to conduct, he should here most certainly have served very distinct purposes: here supporting, there predominant; here uniting and binding, there mediating. Thus in the hand of the master the instrument par excellence through which he so directed how to make his personal influence avail. It cannot be enough lamented, that Bach in the scores of his church music has left us no organ part fully written out, with that we should not only hear the works in these completeness, but it would reveal to us new forms of expression, of whose depth and significance we can scarcely form a weak conception! No one certainly who knows with what unheard of mastery Bach treated the Instrument, will find this assertion extravagant.

In the three instrumental groups just mentioned and in the most unconstrained manner and now developed just as many motives, which dispute the course of the opening number between them. The moving and elastic leading motive (there first in the chorus) with its coupled with not more delay an accompanying motive, brought in by the three trumpets; out of the agme these is at last developed a short sub motive, which plays an extremely active part in the subsequent working up. Bach is in the habit of so inventing his themes, that they shall admit of the most various transpositions and in consequence they are written according to the rules of double, triple, quadruple and quintuple Counterpoint. Especially does there reside in them a certain rhythmic melodic and harmonic spring-power which uplifts you at the outset with the soaring feeling that here all will work itself out of itself through the indwelling vitality of the ideas, the themes, and that the ordering master hand will only intervene to guide, to guard against a mere, arbitrary diversion.

After a modulation into the Dominant, the prelude concentrating in essential matter closely returns to the Tonic on which it makes now a full close. The chorus enters, 1st and 2nd Soprano, Alto, Tenore and Basso, two by two and without instrumental accompaniment now close upon a portion of the main motive, which is presently resumed again in full force by the orchestra, repeating note for note the first half of the prelude. We have already spoken of the remarkably independent and polyphonic conduct of the instrumental introduction, and yet it has been possible for Bach to go still further and to write a most complex score in almost wholly new vocal setting of five parts. If the great masses which he uses must ... were not at the same time an equally unapproachable model of the noblest simplicity such audacity could hardly have come off unpunished. But now how is it possible to see so much such a multiplicity of parts to comprehend and feel as a unity all these different turns and passages, as they go swiftly whirling by?—What Franz suggests in answer to this question we shall see next time.

☞ We credited the wonderfully fanciful story about Mme. Sontag in one "Franz Gerger" in the New York Leader on the indigenous showing of that individual. We are now shown a copy of Arthur's Home Magazine in which the same version almost word for word, appeared a year ago (July 1866) as "from the German, by Arthur Horseley!"

The Musical Season is approaching, but as yet we have only vague intimations and apprehensions of what it will bring. Among the really important things, of the permanent and quiet kind, rooted in our own musical life, the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association will first take the field beginning on Thursday Nov. 7 and will be eight in number. The Handel and Haydn Society will give Oratorios at Thanksgiving and Christmas time, if not oftener; but their weight practice will bear chiefly upon the triennial Festival of probably the first week in May.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club have got an "agent" and are going off concerting miscellaneously through the West, but we still hope for classical concerts in the latter half of the winter.—The pianists Parepa, Petersilea, Dresel too we hope, and Leonhard, will give us chamber concerts.

Of the other kind the "speculative" concerts of managers, there will be plenty, no doubt, but we have no room to speak of them now.

An American Tenor in Germany. One of our well-remembered tenors of Boston Concerts in Boston ... the last and who some Boston boy or girl by Mr. Charles R. Adams, after crowned successes in many European theatres, singing German, French, Italian and English, has been for some time a member of the Royal Opera at Berlin. Recently he has been visiting Vienna and the papers there all speak in praise of his performances. Thus the Wiener Zeitung says:

"The second of July brought us Herr Karl Adams Royal Prussian court-opera singer, who for his first Lacerdis had chosen the Arnold in William Tell. Herr Adams is an American by birth, who has had to learn his correct German here upon the spot, and has already mastered it so well that he hardly betrays his foreign origin. Happening to be in Vienna visiting some friends, he was heard in a private circle by court-capellmeister Esser and by him recommended to the manager Salvi, who is much inclined to experiments. Herr Esser's sound judgment can be trusted in such cases, and we have actually found in Adams a graceful singer who possesses truly beautiful and well nursed vocal means, whose use to lyrical parts, although his (legato) suffers a little weakness from much too close there. His action full of life and energy has acquired great routine and he belongs in every thing the company by the man who has been to wide reputation. We dare say that a closer acquaintance with him will show us both of his light side and the shadow. That he was has come to raise us upon from the ... tragedy. His voice, outward appearance, temperament all speak for it. The reception of the 'guest' was a very friendly one and coupled with a recall."

We translate also from the Vienna Musik-Zeitung: "All that we have again a tenor, voice of the beautiful and pure! Herr Adams' voice is a favorable one ... his delivery is correct and he ... the right conception. The bright ... of his voice in Hostitia ... has led the honor of a recall ... in the second act and in the terzet ... through ... The artists associated with Mr. A. in Tell were Frau Dustmann as Mathilde, Herr Beck as Tell, ..., Herr Pauli another ... &c."

Again from the Neue Fremdenblatt: "Mr. A.'s material is tenore, more that of the beautiful ... and in his delivery there is no want of what he ... favored by gentle ... yet all his productions work not unfavorably and deserve recognition in as far as his charts are in them the results of ... and ... ... Mr. A. ... on the whole of Reichardt ... His impression is agreeable.

Again, the correspondent of the Theater-Moniteur (Berlin) writes: "Herr Charles Adams, Royal Prussian court opera singer, has begun his first engagement, as Arnold in Tell, with the happiest success. The tenor voice of the singer, which has gained essentially in fullness of tone since his former appearance here with Mlle. Artôt, is a subject of general comment. [illegible] the less so the artistic cultivation of his musical delivery. His impersonation of the character was also complete."

The Vienna papers speak of him as being in better voice and still more successful in Il Trovatore.

(From the New Bedford Mercury, Aug. 31.)

OBITUARY. We are pained to record the death of Franz Kuttbach, of this city, which occurred in Boston on Tuesday last, after a brief illness. Mr. K[illegible] was a native of [illegible] in Mecklenburg, Germany, and left home at the age of [illegible] years, in company with Carl Zerrahn, now a highly esteemed citizen of Boston, to seek his fortune in this country. After his arrival here he remained for two years a member of the Germania Band, which was organized in Europe previous to his departure, when on account of ill health he withdrew from the arduous duties of his position, and came to New Bedford to establish himself as a teacher of the various branches of his profession. A thoroughly educated musician, he at once found his time fully occupied in teaching, to which he devoted himself with enthusiasm and for seventeen years, and until within a few weeks of his death. He enjoyed a considerable reputation as a composer, mostly of lighter pieces, though some years ago he brought before the public the opera of "[illegible]," which would have attracted the attention it deserved, had the author been possessed with his recognized talent so eminently some of the pushing characteristics of an impresario.

There are many who will sincerely regret the loss of one who has done so much to cultivate a refined musical taste in this community, many who will miss the careful instruction of a conscientious as well as accomplished teacher, while others who knew him best, will recall with pleasure, if sadly, the characteristics which made him a genial companion and a warm friend.

MUSICAL CONVENTIONS. There is some pretty shrewd common sense in the following comments of a Vermont paper (the Montpelier Atlas and Patriot of Bray, &c.) on a Convention held the week before at Burlington, in that State:

The text-books adopted for use were the "Church Bell," a new publication from the pen of W. O. and H. S. Perkins, and the Oratorio of the "Messiah," an old work from the pen of Handel. The incongruous union which the two works were made to bear to each other was, to say the least, so much of an excuse as added a dash of playful irony among the "better musicians" of the convention. The frequent passage which the convention made from "Hurrah for New England" to the "Hallelujah Chorus," was all the appropriate one possible. Tried by the pub[lisher]'s notion, one page of the "Messiah" would outweigh more of the "Bell" than could be packed on Boston Common. Not that we object to the "Bell" any more than to other works of its class, but the balancing of the convention for four days between the "Mother Goose Melodies" and the "Messiah" was none the less inappropriate. The fact is, neither of these works meet the wants of the convention. It is no doubt well to those comprising the chorus to sing, with few exceptions, they were wholly inadequate to a proper rendering of the works of this kind. Instead of four days of intercourse, they needed weeks of study and careful training. To accomplish anything they did in the time allotted, it was an impossibility. The result is expected, the "Messiah," there can with a view to [illegible] it, was [illegible].

The introduction of that other work—the "Bell"—was equally ill-timed and inappropriate, and to any pretension pleasure or profit to the singers, it was a poor compliment to the capacity and taste of Vermont singers. It was as much below the ability of the members as the other was above them, and that's a good deal. The design of musical conventions is, we suppose, or should be, to improve the standard of music, to develop the ability of singers, and correct and elevate the taste. For one thing, though it is an official one—we seriously object to turning the convention into an exchange for the sale of a particular music book, and the paying of out-[illegible] one hundred and fifty dollars, or so, to encouraging a mere work and very his own [illegible]. We know nothing for the managers of the Burlington convention responsible for the same, and certainly we have no reproaches for those at this time. If the mistake was theirs—which we do not believe—they will act more wisely next time and not permit their own better judgment to be over-ridden by the number of some mere book-manager in their personal ambition with using the name of "bringing out" the "Messiah," and other works of that kind, without the time and toil necessary to do them properly. While this convention [illegible] which we hope the next one will have—we again [illegible] disappointed but one has reached their ability to master, and yet sufficiently difficult to demand careful and laborious study in order to attain proper [illegible] in [illegible]. And woe to the book-men! are on the road, and let these conventions henceforth both pleasant and profitable, they must set their faces as firmly and forever against the approaches of those who come bending under the load of books which smell of the printing office and the bindery.

THALBERG the pianist, has obtained an honorary mention at the Paris Exhibition for his wines of Posilippo, near Naples. The vine which produces these was planted there by Lablache, his father-in-law, from cuttings obtained in Burgundy.

The London Choir has the following:—"Picked up in the quadrangle of the Schola Musices at Oxford, supposed to have dropped from the pocket of the Oxford Professor of Music—'Why has the science of music always been held to be a 'difficult study'? Because, by the verdict of antiquity, some operas (Sic) harpsichordist—but one becomes a thorough-bass man in a moment.'"

A German Journal reminds its readers that in 1787 the Leipziger Zeitung contained the following remarkable notice, emanating from a citizen of that town:—"A certain Mozart of Vienna, has taken the liberty of denaturalizing my drama Belmonte and Constance by turning it into an opera libretto. I formally protest against this infringement of my rights, and reserve myself the power of further action.—Christophe Friedrich Bretzner."

GERMAN AND ITALIAN COMPOSERS.—The well known saying of Carl Maria von Weber: "I consider as God wills and flowers composed as the public wills," characteristic admirably the artistic tendencies of most German and Italian operatic composers. The German operatic composer not unfrequently ignores, to his own disadvantage, both singers and public; he tries to give himself up entirely to the task in which his own individuality is completely merged, and writes in the fixed belief that his work is destined to last forever. The Italian composer, on the other hand, writes in the first place for certain singers; he does not think of a work of art lasting forever; he pays court to the exigencies of his day and of fashion, and takes for and care as he generally finds them. I honor the operatic composers who, renouncing outward success, has only art itself in view [illegible], but I do not hesitate to the name of the artist who thinks of the actual operatic public. That great genius and worldly-wise man, Mozart, did both; he took into account singers and public, and created works of imperishable beauty. His dramatic works will, at any rate, endure as long as feeling for one of [illegible] beauty and graceful characterization exists in the world of art. However people may, of late have striven to think such masterpieces, it can never be destroyed.—Hand's Hiller.

PARODY OF "ROMEO ET JULIETTE." A very amusing travestie of M. Gounod's opera is [illegible] being played with great success at the Théâtre Déjazet, at Paris, under the title of Rhé et Pien en Juliet. The piece is cleverly handled and the new music supplied by M. Eugene Déjazet.

A DISAGREEABLE QUESTION. Mme. Catalani, the celebrated singer, was [illegible] once appearing at the Italian Opera Paris. [illegible] sometimes came off very badly. A [illegible] of the period used to commence every one of his notices with the Ciceronian phrase: "Quousque tandem abutere, Catalana, patientia nostra?" "How long, Catalani, will you abuse our patience?"

A GRAND WAGNER'S OPINION OF A GREAT MUSICIAN. Jean Paul said of the composer of Don Juan: "Every note of Mozart is a sound on the ladder of the spheres by which he ascended to the throne of perfection."

To a Life Size Portrait of my Mother at the Harp.

BY [illegible]

Shade of the Past! Vision of sunnier days,
When Youth, and Hope, and Beauty, and the rays
Of Joy once round thee smiled! Time severe
Hath changed the features fondly imaged here!
These locks are greyer now! That placid face
Hath gathered wrinkles! Age has left its trace
Of furrows on that brow! Those beaming eyes
Are dimmer than they were. The way, the sighs
Have chased that smile! That music-moving hand
Has wreathed many a darkened hope's band!
That beloved Harp, too! How in bygone days
Its melodies rang out! What stirring lays Informed it once! What music used to thrill
Along that stricken lyre! Alas! How still!
In school-boy days I heard its tones divine
Filling our home like airs of Palestine!
And, now that Harp, which then rang o'er and loud,
In some dark corner wears a sable shroud!
And yet, why mourn I? What although no more
Those sounds melodious move me as of yore!
What though the hand which waked them is withheld!
Memory still echoes every tone which swelled
Upon my youthful ear!—Ah yet! I find
It still hath sounds for the listening mind!
Symbol of sympathies! to me it seems
Ere when I lay close me, there are gleams
Of light electric, as of heavenly fire,
Playing a flashes o'er the pensive wires!
That Harp such songs accordant, seems to sing!
A mother's love tone trembles o'er each string!
And so, if sadness shrouds me — If it swings
Of sorrow sicken my soul, it sounds a dirge!
Mournful in chords! with all its chords it seeks
It sounds a requiem to my wounded breast,
Yes! Then Æolian like it breathes a moan,
And gently soothes me with an undertone!
Thus, even thus, my soul ensnares hears
Those magic tones, like "music of the spheres,"
At home, abroad, where'er I roam or stay
That Harp tone sounds cornest to my breast;
It calls my tardy prayers, and seems to say
"A mother's blessing cheers thy pathway way!"
And as I muse, at even-tide's solemn hour
Spirit of Harmony! I feel its power!
Yes! daily on my solemn altar,
Thy music mingles with the morning.
Matins and Vespers, each, the Harp attends;—
Its harmonies thy sweet, thy image blends
To guard and guide me, while my fervent soul
Glows by those impulses feels thy calm control.
It now thou! And when the art no thought
I go astray, be thy sweet influence sought.
It never vanishes me, let the feel of sight
Of thy dear presence with me in the end;
Be thou my conception, my tower, my aid,
My tender firm;—my comforter and my guard!
My Judgment future! not blessed wighs wrote
Which King Belshazzar saw upon the wall!
And when I die to me the bliss be given
To hear that Harp amid the Hymns of Heaven!

Three Evenings with Ferdinand Hiller.

Translated from Die Gartenlaube, by ALICE FORSTER.

Music is of all arts the most purely human, the most universal.—JEAN PAUL.

It is a large cheerful saloon; busts of colossal statues of Bach and Handel beneath the characteristic portrait heads of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn and Schumann; opposite a luxuriant flower stand stood a Härtel Grand Piano. The candles had been taken away since, the great lamp over the table shed its light through a sea-colored shade: the little group of ladies and gentlemen gathered together listened all breathless to a little tone poem—Ferdinand Hiller was playing his "Zur Guitarre."

Without it was storm: the wind tapped noisily, tremendously upon the window, the rain beat upon the pane; within all were dreaming of a warm evening night beneath Italian skies. The tones blossomed, from the lofty balcony there leaned a lovely female form à la Castilian, the moonlight transfigured her flower face, and the elegant cavalier ardently confessed to her his love "zur Guitarre." It was a love such as is breathed only in the land where the orange blooms, and those poor sons of the North envied the happy ones, for orange blossoms are more fragrant than Forget-me-nots, whilst the Northern ladies sighed. Who could bring a lover a serenade "zur Guitarre" in the land of rain and storm, of catarrh and throats, of spiteful envious neighbors?

I have never heard this enchanting musical "Zeitkenten Damon" played by any one but the composer, yet it seems to me it could never fail of its effect. As concerned our little circle of that evening we were all charmed as one is charmed at sight of the first nosegay of Spring, or by the long-missed voice of a dear friend. Hiller was constrained at once to repeat his song. He was then returning laden with honor wreathed with all sorts of fresh laurels, at the "ducal" and laurel wreaths of Italy, from Tenrnes where his opera "Die Katakomben" had been represented for the first time with brilliant success; and now he was resting one evening at the house of a friend. Playing at evening thus is, pleasantly chatting in a comfortable arm-chair and for once asking favor not as offers, but purely con amore. About three o'clock after midnight he must pursue his journey to Cologne. First, however, he meant to read a little story. Now then the clock must not be allowed to fly too fast, and yet it had been so long since all had met together, and there was so much to ask and talk. Hiller himself was as fresh and delightful when he talked as when he played; and during the little supper he was sparkling gay. It was one of those evenings such as rarely fall from Heaven, hours which leave the fragrance of violets in the soul. Later on he played a Beethoven Sonata from him, and then he played a few expressive little things—"Bagatelles" he called them, of his own composition. In between these the lady of the house sang Hiller's "Wolfsfeier, weck ß otero" that beautiful tone-flower one of Hiller's poets as well as Mendelssohn's Suleika songs, of Schubert's Schumann, Franz and finally the parting song "Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath."

Midnight was long past who would have believed it! With all sorts of musical literary and other themes were yet discussed; gayest sketches of Paris life were traced by Hiller, who opened the reliquary of his memory to bring to light many a sparkling jewel. Meanwhile the narrator's eyes shone, and a merry smile played about his lips. All at once he sprang up and seated himself once more at the piano. Softly the hands stole over the keys; at first it was as a far off dream, but gradually the thoughts became connected and the remarkable poet glanced up on all the songs that had been sung to him. The church bells rang to the procession. "Das ist ein Kirch an dem Rheine," the mother of God softly entered and laid her hand on the sick heart, then the moon mind was borne over an glittering pinions. Sabina breathed, "Sag' ihm, eher my's boots aber." Then the voice of the nightingale from Schumann's "Spring Song." Schubert's "Barcarole" passed lightly over. Hickert's exquisite love song by Franz, "Er in schweren in Sturm und Regen" stormed in, and finally came the lovely melody soft and deep as a parting look.

"Wenn Menschen auseinander gehn,
So sagen sie: auf Wiedersehn!"

When Hiller arose there were tears in many a beautiful eye, and the hands were gratefully extended towards him. Suddenly the little scene of excitement was broken into by a man's voice that half playfully, half seriously said "There is no help for it, my honored "Herr Capellmeister," the parting is at hand; in seven minutes the inexorable express train will start. It is past three o'clock!" This was the "postes" of the Play.

Ferdinand Hiller is a child of Frankfort, the tenderly loved son of cultivated parents, born in the year of the great comet and fiery constellations, and ardent and fiery has he remained. Various good geniuses have stood godfather to his youth. Goethe's hand rested upon the boy's head when he came to Weimar to take piano lessons of Hummel. Beethoven's dying eye looked again fondly upon him when the youth accompanied his celebrated teacher to Vienna and stood with him beside the couch of suffering of the dying Titan. The profoundly learned Sou for of the Cäcilia Society in Frankfort on the Maine, Schelble called Hiller his darling and Aloys Schmitt prophesied for him a brilliant career. The grave, reserved Cherubini was thawed by the lovely musician, and the unfortunate heritage of musical aristocracy of Paris interested itself on the boy of scarcely seventeen, when his mother's introduction to the rich world threw open a saloon at which often the most heterogeneous and attractive elements might be found together. What a scene for a painter, this union of grand heads and forms!

It is a winter evening. The fire burns upon the hearth. Without splendid equipages roll past, and by the light of the lanterns may be seen little rose-adorned heads, sparkling diamonds, fluttering garments at the windows within. Paris dances to-day in the Tuileries, in the Theatre, in the Chaumière de Lilas, in the Jardin d'hiver and who knows where beside. The great music room of the Hiller house is pleasantly warmed and lighted. There is dancing there, too; yet the dancers are only ten fingers, the fingers of Chopin. In a marble vase upon the table there are violets, the pure favorite flowers of a pure composer, shedding their fragrance around. An Erard Grand Piano stands in the middle of the room, in front of it sits the young dreamy Chopin. He seems scarcely to touch the keys; as from the far-off distance floats a passionate, yet smiling dance melody, dreaming nearer and ever nearer it grows louder as it approaches; he is playing his wondrous Mazurkas and fantastic Waltzes. Hiller himself with his velvet-browned twinkling eyes, stands beside the player, not losing the breath of a tone. Near the hearth, beside the cheerful blazing fire, sits the venerable Cherubini, with almost mien and yet listening in spite of himself to the magic sounds. It disturbs and yet fascinates him,—the concluding close of his Requiem is forming in his mind. Near him lounges Adolph Nourrit, the noblest "Pylades" to Gluck's "Orestes," who ever trod the stage. When he sang the celebrated Aria the ladies were not the only ones who were affected to tears. His voice was of a wonderful sweetness, and yet powerful, and his style, less dramatic than singing, was nevertheless always noble and feeling.

"Nur einen Wunsch, nur ein Verlangen,"

On the other side of the fireplace the violinists Lafont and Baillot had taken their places. Behind them arose the characteristic profile of the young Berlioz, a world of thoughts burned beneath his beautiful brow with its framework of dark hair. In the window alcove stands Ary Scheffer, the great Painter surveying the group with earnest eye. There is somewhat in his noble head that recalls the painter's celebrated picture: "St. Augustine with his mother Monica." Not far from him in the darkest corner sits a pale man, in an attitude of almost hopeless depression, the cheek resting upon the slender hand, the eyes with their far-off expression, plainly bespeaking the soul within. About the mouth there hovers an ineffaceable impress of pain, the expression of an endless "Heimweh," which renders the rare smile inexpressibly touching. The brow is of a lofty beauty, clear and light. It is the author of letters from Paris, of intellectual critiques, and enthusiastic reminiscences of Jean Paul, Ludwig Börne. Music is his familiar friend; of it he has said: "Music is prayer, whether given by the babe in lisping numbers, whether held by the wild child of Nature in rude form who has by cultivated language passionate soul-stirring words,—Heaven harkens to it with like satisfaction, and gives back as comfort to each the echo of his own feelings."

Chopin's playing was a tender balsam for the soul of Börne. These ardent and melancholy spirits could not but understand and love one another.

Beside a table filled with exotic plants, from amidst whose luxuriance the statue of a Polyhymnia peeped forth, sat the chosen darling of the Graces and Muses, the poet of the "Book of Songs," Heinrich Heine. As his rival in the favor of the ladies appears the amiable, jocular composer of the "Barbiere di Seviglia," Rossini. Notwithstanding his weight, the rather corpulent gentleman was always "Figaroqui, Figarolà." Then the delicately moulded head of Heine was yet untouched by the devastating ravages of illness that later so cruelly destroyed all his beauty. Yet the equalizing hand of death alone had power to smooth the distorted features. The blue eyes yet shone like stars, and the lips whispered the most bewitching absurdities, until a beautiful hand was laid upon his mouth. This time it was the lovely fingers of the renowned and fascinating Delphine Gay, who in Paris was scarcely less celebrated as woman than as authoress. He seized Heine's hand at once meekly and passionately, for it had brushed by his lips softly as a rose leaf just as Chopin's playing began. Now he had long forgotten the wanton sport. A deep melancholy was graven upon his brow, the head was as then upon the breast, the long lashes almost touched the cheeks, many a beautiful eye at this moment rested upon the statuesque profile. Perchance he dreamed poems to the phantastic melodies of Chopin. And over yonder, that young creature, that fairy-like being with the great Southern eyes and the waves of dark hair—that woman with the smile of a child and the movements of the Graces, with whom Musset Rossini had just been whispering? Who else than Maria Malibran the great singer, the genial warm-hearted woman, the idol of Paris! The Countess Merlin, her friend and countrywoman, had introduced her into the little German salon. Also many other celebrated and uncelebrated pupils of Garcia were there: Mesdames Lalande and Ferrari, and sundry Parisian faces who had only to appear to excite the warmest admiration.

At one time, had not you look from the eyes of Beethoven made strong and firm the musician in Ferdinand Hiller, he would have turned renegade and gone over to literature. Hiller himself confesses in one of his letters how mightily he was influenced by the intercourse of the most significant and diverse minds of the time.

"The intercourse with so many distinguished men," he writes, "was in the highest degree exciting: but the whole life of Paris, as well as politics, into which I entered with passionate interest, and the entire whirlpool of the undulating life brought on, so to speak, out of myself, and materially interfered with the development of my musical talents. More than once in moments of excitement I was tempted to hang the whole music upon a nail and rush into one or another of the careers that seemed then so attractive."

Whoever is acquainted with Hiller's letters, and the truly German depth of thought combined with French lightness of style of his "Feuilleton" articles, must feel no less love for the writer Hiller than for the musician and composer; and whoever has heard him converse upon some inspiring theme, must wonder at him as a speaker.

Ferdinand Hiller composed when very young—as early as his tenth year—and always with the greatest ease; and it is an evidence of how deep the enthusiasm of Goethe's friendliness had penetrated into his young heart that he chose as text to his first song, "Rastlose Liebe." With his seventeenth year he entered Paris as teacher in the "Institution royale de musique classique et religieuse," enjoying at the same time tuition in Harmony himself, and playing the organ in the church of the Sorbonne, where the scholars sang Mass there. Several concerts which he gave in the Conservatoire brought him abundant fame and honor. The elegant and artistic public that assembled upon such occasions became thus acquainted with Hiller's compositions, Symphonies and Piano pieces. French and German journals contained descriptions of the enthusiastic receptions the young German met with.

Many charming souvenirs date at this period: Trios, Quartets, Songs, the charming "Danse des fantômes" and the first reverie. A short sojourn in Frankfort on the Maine followed the artistically stirring Parisian life, then a dolce far niente on Lake Como, whither his faithful mother accompanied her son (his father he had lost during his residence in Paris) and there arose his Oratorio "The Destruction of Jerusalem," then a winter in Milan, and there—a Spring time of love.

Many years ago there appeared at one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzic a beautiful woman with dark hair, eyes like coals of fire, and a profile such as one often sees upon cameos, but seldom in life; she sang the "Tarantella" from Rossini's "Soirees musicales" with brilliant voice and especial execution: this was Mme. Antolka Hiller. At the same concert Hiller played one of his charming "Reveries." An amiable lady said to him afterwards, playfully: "Ah, now we know at last of whom you have always been dreaming so sweetly and mysteriously!"

Nothing could be more delightful than to hear Mme. Hiller sing the Soprano part of one of those original, fresh Quartets for Soprano and male voices, which Hiller composed in Rome in the early part of his wedded happiness. The idea of letting a female voice float in all its clearness above a Quartet of male voices, is so bewitching in its effect that one feels transported to a land of Spring where high above all that creeps and flies, sings and hovers around us, the fluttering lark soars aloft to the blue sky.

Hiller led the Leipzic subscription concerts at the time when Mendelssohn, with whom he was united by the closest ties of friendship, changed his residence from Leipzic to Berlin; but he soon emigrated to Dresden in view of there establishing and directing a series of concerts. He had meanwhile composed Operas, Songs, Quartets of stringed instruments, Sonatas, Caprices, Etudes, his beautiful Impromptus, as well as many songs. His "Destruction of Jerusalem" went out from Dresden over the whole world, and met everywhere with the warmest applause.

In the year 1850 Hiller accepted the honorable position of city Capellmeister and Director of the Conservatoire at Cologne; and there he has labored ever since, with the intermission of one winter when he directed the Italian Opera in Paris. His creative Phantasie brings forth ever new blossoms, amongst which may be reckoned as one of the most delightful his "Operette without words" for Piano with four hands. His opera "Die Katakomben" had its origin about this time, and his Symphony with the motto "Es muss doch Frühling werden!" with its sister piece the joyous "Im Freien." Several large and small pieces of vocal music appeared now for solo and orchestra, the Oratorio "Die [illegible]" amongst others. Notwithstanding all, Hiller still found time to write the most exquisite æsthetic critiques, and many beautiful testimonies to the memory of departed great friends. Living friends also, celebrated and uncelebrated, alike find him always ready for merry or serious talk, and not only male friends, but also the, as is universally admitted, far more talkative female friends. Amiable, open-hearted, cheerful and self-sacrificing, he is ready at any moment to aid, by word or deed, all who apply to him personally or by letter for assistance. His house is now, as ever, the hospitable place of artists from far and near. At this moment—Tuesday evening, December 4,—he stands at the conductor's desk in the Gürzenich Hall in Cologne, baton in hand. It is his Oratorio "Saul" that he is representing for a second time to a crowded public.

And what a choice public it is that is listening to the splendid choruses, with the engaging instrumentation! How cheerful is the face of the great critic, Professor Bischoff, in the vicinity of the Orchestra! What a confusion of beautiful and less beautiful women, of civilian's dress and uniform, of youth and age! And then the female singers in white, the male in black! The orchestra, that numbers amongst its members many brilliant names, looks with fixed attention upon its lord and master; the chorus hangs upon his looks and the movements of his hand. With what evident delight do they all play and sing under his firm guidance!

Hiller stands very high as a conductor, and at the late Dusseldorf Festival gave ample evidence of his power. The little round man with the noble head becomes one of the great of the earth when he stands amidst the Orchestra. The people of the Rhine are proud of their Hiller, particularly, however, the citizens of Cologne, as the very soul of their Gürzenich concerts.

Reminiscences of the Abbate Baini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.*

When, shortly after the commencement of the fifth decade of the present century, I had repeatedly attended Divine Service in the Sistine Chapel at Rome, it was clear to me that most of the music of the old Roman school performed there was—not clear to me. As was the case with the majority of my German brethren in art, educated in the works of Bach, Handel, and their great successors, my relations to the old Italians were rather distant and superficial, though I had often played through, besides having now and then heard played, the better known, and, if I may so express myself, the more popular of their compositions. The pure and elevated nature of these strains impressed me as much as their arrangement attracted me, and I determined to do all that lay in my power to penetrate the profoundest mysteries of their combinations. My first step was to pay a visit to the Abbate Baini.

Baini was well known as one of the leading investigators in the field of musical history. Starting with his great work on Palestrina, from the wish to place in their true light the eternal services rendered by this, his favorite, composer to the cause of art, he yielded unexpected information concerning the changes in sacred music before Palestrina, concerning the musical doings at the Council of Trent, and concerning Palestrina's life and efforts. The free use of the collections and archives of the Vatican had placed within his reach materials inaccessible to every one else, and he possessed the talent of turning them to account with as much erudition as conscientiousness. A large portion of his life, and the most considerable part of his income, were devoted to the task of editing all Palestrina's works in score. It is scarcely possible to form an idea of the restless investigation, the persevering labor, the passionate self-abnegation, required. A great number of the immortal compositions of the extraordinary master were scattered to the four quarters of the globe, and to recover a single missing sheet frequently demanded whole years of search, and—comparatively speaking—heavy pecuniary sacrifices. Baini had been a singer from his youth, and for many years director of the Papal Chapel. This post had been conferred on him as an especial mark of distinction, it being the general rule for the Papal singers to take it by turns to direct the music at Divine Service. The reader will easily understand that such a man struck me as being the one from whom I could best hope to obtain satisfactory and useful information, as well as assistance in carrying out my artistic desires—and such was the case. Baini received me most kindly, and promised to do all he could. His suggestion that the best course I could adopt to penetrate into Palestrina's style would be to practice it myself, appeared to me perfectly just. Two evenings a week were fixed on, when he said I should always find him ready to look over my work—and for a whole winter I enjoyed the instructive society of this excellent man.

I cannot, of course, here dwell upon the specially musical investigations which formed the principal staple of our conversations; indeed—though I am half ashamed to confess it—these investigations are not what I recollect most vividly. It is chiefly of the grand simplicity, the self-sacrificing pains, the calm kindness, of this venerable man that there remains in my mind a picture, deriving a peculiar coloring from the originality of very many views which he propounded with a kind of naive humor, and of which I should like to give a sketch. Perhaps many of my readers will gladly transport themselves with me for a few moments from the restless bustle of every-day life to the quiet chamber in which I passed an existence that, with all its unostentatious simplicity, wanted neither the power to dare nor to bear. The highest excellence, after all, where it is granted us to attain is to have been in one's own way a perfect man.

Baini was, at the time to which I refer, sixty years old and of tall stature, though he bowed his head slightly; his bearing was full of vigor. His serious and rather strongly marked features had something energetic, nay here and there, hard about them, but by a glance, and a smile, not perhaps exactly agreeable, could assume a particularly mild and kindly expression. Baini was not handsome, though he may in his youth have been a fine one. It was probably the self-searching recollection of this that caused him on seeing an admirable drawing which my friend the artist Rudolph Lehmann had made of him, to exclaim: "O! O! how ugly!" His health was greatly undermined by the weary labor to which he constantly devoted himself. A life which as he himself expressed it, "he had spent between his writing table (tavolino) and the confessional" could not possibly be attended by satisfactory results. His digestive powers were impaired, and it required many, many hours for him to get over the effects of the very spare meal he took once every day. I often found him suffering from the most violent spasms in the stomach; at such times, he would make a slight sign with his hand, and I waited with painful sympathy in an adjoining room, till the crisis was over. This was scarcely the case, however, ere he began the conversation on the most cheerfully serene calm and cheerful, laying aside, so to speak, the pain he had been suffering for hours, as though it were a book the perusal of which had been interrupted. Frequently, also, I found him engaged in the prayers which were a duty for him of an evening. In this case, too, he would point to a chair and a score that he had got ready for me, and quietly continue his pious occupation. The following may serve as a proof of his really affectionate kindness. While he was looking, with conscientious earnestness, through my attempts, I was transcribing compositions by Palestrina, in order not to be doing nothing. The next time I returned, I would find, in Baini's hand, the words, which I had not had time in the evening to write myself, traced under the music. I hardly dared to thank him for taking this trouble, and felt quite touched to think he had done so.

After he had subjected my exercise to the strictest criticism, Baini used to begin chatting with us. In this, as in many other instances, I have to regret deeply not taking notes, for a very great deal of what he told me really possessed historical interest. The reader will easily understand this when he reflects that Baini had spent all his life in Rome, and that the year of his birth was the year 1775. He had served a whole series of Popes; had been brought in close contact with them; and struck me as having taken as unprejudiced a view of the affairs of the world as was conceivable in so firmly believing, and, in many respects, so zealous, a priest. Of course, he sometimes made assertions which, for people like us sounded strange, not so much in themselves, as from their contact.

Thus he told me, one day, the life of the then Pope, Gregory XVI., and I cannot deny that he told it in a somewhat irreverential manner. The minute details have escaped my memory, but there is one thing I know, and that is, that the Abbate attributed to very mundane chances the adoption by the future Prince of the Church of his sacred career. Gregory, he said, entered a monastery in which he mounted very rapidly from step to step, chiefly because the brethren had run away for fear of the French. The Abbate continued his narrative in the same strain, till in perfect simplicity I asked: "How did he become Pope?" "That was the business of the Holy Ghost," was the answer. I suppose I looked rather astonished, for after a moment's silence on both sides, Baini continued, very seriously: "How do you think that the election of Popes can take place except through the Holy Ghost? Just reflect. There are a number of men seated together, every one of whom wishes the other to obtain so elevated a position, and yet the decision has to be unanimous! The Holy Ghost alone can effect such a result."—On the days of grand festivals, a military band is placed in the front gallery of St. Peter's, where it plays as the procession passes along. I had attended the ceremony in the morning, and had gone away rather indignant, for after an introduction in which the strains of brass instruments, suddenly bursting forth, had produced a very thrilling impression, there came an operatic motive, which was very frivolous at such a moment and in such a place. On my mentioning this to Baini, he replied: "I am always preaching the same thing to them. When we are by ourselves, we know each other (ci conosciamo!). But, above all, the strangers! what can they say to it!" How much more neat and graceful such observations sounded in Italian than they do in my homely German translation, I am painfully aware as I write them down.

Baini cherished a very grateful recollection of King Friedrich Wilhelm IV., whose acquaintance he had made when his Majesty was Crown Prince and of our celebrated Bunsen—both had displayed great interest and appreciation of music, which Baini regarded as higher than aught else besides. He had frequently conducted performances of his vocal choir in the Prince's presence. The evenings on which these performances were held belonged to the exceedingly small number of those which Baini had ever spent away from home save when his duties summoned him to church or chapel. He was fond of referring to the cleverness and amiable disposition of the two men, and it was evidently his intimate acquaintance with Bunsen which had led him to adopt a feeling of great tolerance towards Protestantism. "There is something, however, I do not understand," he said, one evening. "Protestants are good Christians; they reverence the Redeemer as we do—how can they be so indifferent towards the Blessed Virgin? After all, she is the mother of God! That is what I cannot comprehend."

Notwithstanding the extraordinary and energetic perseverance with which Baini had devoted himself to his historico-musical labors, he took great interest in many things most foreign to them. On one occasion I spied a book he had just been reading. It was a history of the Theatre at Valenciennes. "Do you busy yourself with the stage also?" I exclaimed, somewhat surprised. "I have certainly one of the largest collection of works in existence relating to it," he replied, "and I have read them all. The theatre interests me in the highest degree." "Do you ever go to the theatre?" I enquired, still more astonished. "I never set foot in one" was his answer. During my stay in Rome I [illegible] a small German vocal association, composed exclusively of German artists, painters, sculptors and architects. We resolved to give a concert for the Catholic [illegible] College, which was then regarded as the symbol of German unity. (I had at that time a much finer bass voice than now.) With his usual good nature, Baini said I might select [illegible] the concert for the church of the [illegible] at Rome [illegible] much [illegible] friends in that capital. In reply to proposals of this kind, I [illegible] Miserere by Dorner, which the latter had [illegible] the Pope, and which had been sent to Baini for his [illegible]. It was written with great modern [illegible] as well as orchestral accompaniment, and was [illegible] for the Papal Chapel. "Do you [illegible]," I said, handing me the [illegible]. "I do not understand such [illegible], but it does not strike me [illegible] a [illegible] piece." [illegible] of the [illegible] Dorner's, but it was an extremely insipid production. "Why do you [illegible] according to the Pope?" said Baini to me. "Because [illegible] you will receive a large heap of beautiful [illegible] gold pieces, which you can take with you to Germany." He did not know that nothing [illegible] from [illegible] Italy except golden [illegible] memories.

The interior of Baini's abode was remarkable for a simplicity and absence of ornament bordering on poverty—the large rooms [illegible] where his [illegible] occupying [illegible] there. The housekeeping was conducted by an elderly [illegible] who sometimes opened the door for me, and then disappeared like a shadow. During the winter, though the days were extremely cold, there was never anything in the shape of a fire; but [illegible] standing on the table was a tolerably large brazier at which the old gentleman used to warm his hands. [illegible] had never travelled; the only [illegible] he had been absent from Rome was on the occasion of his making a trip to Bologna. The reader will perhaps, be able to form some notion of his energy and endurance [illegible] played [illegible] of his forces, [illegible] that during the time of the French occupation, when the people sought, [illegible] to say others, those [illegible] who had not paid homage to the foreigners, Baini frequently [illegible] hours a day. All his books and music, including the invaluable collection of Palestrina's works, [illegible] by him, he bequeathed to the Minerva Monastery in Rome, where they will, at any rate, be well taken care of—perhaps, too well.

Baini composed in a variety of styles, though his compositions are not numerous. A "Miserere" of his is played alternately with those of Allegri and Bach [illegible], during Passion-week in the Sistine Chapel. It is an effective piece, but it proves how impossible it is for any one to escape [illegible] of his own time. Although Baini lived almost exclusively in the world of old sacred music, knew and cared but little modern music, and, perhaps, never having heard any performed, [illegible] the above "Miserere," which [illegible] the strict style, contains a number of passages revealing the [illegible] over [illegible] a person who [illegible] musician. [illegible] conception, and the [illegible] of the "Miserere," was the result of the profound impression produced by it, at a rehearsal, in the Sistine choir. Towards my attempts in Palestrina's style the worthy man exhibited the most unbearable severity, and it was not till about the end of the winter that I succeeded in writing a piece with which he was perfectly contented.—I have preserved it as a memento of the pleasant days spent in Rome. After my return to Germany, I sent Baini a copy of the score of my Zerstörung Jerusalems, and subsequently the scores of Mozart's Requiem and Mass in C [illegible] as well as of Beethoven's Mass in C major. I cannot deny myself the pleasure of publishing the letters I received from him on the occasion and I give them in the original text. On every account it is impossible for me to translate them. By publishing the first letter I may appear desirous of sounding my own praises; [illegible] I take the [illegible] his kind words, so flattering though they are for me, to complete the too imperfect picture of one I so respect. Here they are:

"Pregiatissimo Signore ed amico, [illegible]

"Ed supplico, ecc."

After the introduction, the second letter runs thus:

"[illegible] La prego, ecc.

GIUSEPPE BAINI."

This worthy man died in the year 1844. His death was not merely a heavy loss for the Sistine Chapel; it was an irreparable one. His works and his name will live forever in the history of music.

Music Conductors, in the service of [illegible] societies, Conductors whose [illegible] are paid, and consequently are not [illegible] for any act of neglect, have no [illegible] of the [illegible] which the conductor of amateur associations has to go through before they can get up a performance. [illegible] too, enjoy such a performance, and [illegible] go [illegible] to it, because they know nothing of the trouble it [illegible] produced by downright agony. [illegible] to meet [illegible] and go away forever that has been rehearsed. [illegible] with sighs and tears [illegible] to the Conductor, while even every ordinary [illegible] by all the performers together [illegible] of the same [illegible] done as a rule, the most necessary are always missing [illegible] while the former can [illegible] only on [illegible] performance [illegible] the [illegible] of the day will [illegible] and want of punctuality [illegible] severely censure the [illegible] fault, the conductor of an amateur society must only [illegible] the greatest neglect with considerable mildness, and [illegible] him, if he would not "disgust" the members and lose their attendance altogether, etc. But enough of this; an example shall show what we mean. We will suppose that a mixed Solo Quartet has to be rehearsed. After mature deliberation with the other persons concerned, the Conductor has fixed on a Sunday afternoon for the purpose, and given the two ladies their parts to take home—the gentlemen have intimated they do not require them. He waits at the appointed hour in the room where the rehearsal is to be held. There is a knock at the door; the Bass comes [illegible] holding in his hand a bouquet from a [illegible] who has [illegible] that very same day in a [illegible] family in X. "The [illegible]," he observes, [illegible] Tenor, if the [illegible] also, had come. However, the bass part may be taken [illegible] by itself. Meanwhile the Contralto makes her appearance, a somewhat aged spinster [illegible] gray are the [illegible] of colour, [illegible] being marked by [illegible] "[illegible] where on earth can Mdlle. N., our soprano, be?" she asks in a [illegible] tone. "She [illegible] Herr A. again [illegible]" The reader must know that Mdlle. N. is a beauty much run after in the town, though we do not accuse the Conductor of any partiality for her. [illegible] The [illegible], whose presence is so much desired, rushes in at last dressed in the depth of [illegible], but with a most [illegible] smile and the [illegible] that "She had kept [illegible] the [illegible] was dead for [illegible] and had only just [illegible] the time at which [illegible]" [illegible] the Conductor's [illegible]. As a natural consequence she is [illegible]. By the way I [illegible] that [illegible] began [illegible]. The Bass [illegible] out of his pocket [illegible] but the Tenor does not come! A messenger is dispatched to his house and is informed that the Tenor went out early in the morning and [illegible] that he was not to be expected [illegible] day. "Gentlemen! [illegible] everybody [illegible] with [illegible] formalities?" "A more fitting [illegible] could [illegible] the [illegible] Conductor could have [illegible] the weather and the [illegible]," says the Conductor [illegible]. "The [illegible] you [illegible] at the [illegible] and [illegible] with the most friendly [illegible] and [illegible] you were afraid he had been taken suddenly ill. He assures you however [illegible] where he has been breakfasting with a few friends, has only just got in, and you [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] manager [illegible] the Tenor has [illegible]. The [illegible] with a slight cough complains of [illegible] which the Soprano declares [illegible] her [illegible] brothers and their friends. The [illegible] of the Quartet [illegible] is now rehearsed [illegible] at last on account of [illegible] indisposition, [illegible] the piece may be sung two notes lower. This request is [illegible] opposed by the Bass, who has already [illegible]. The Conductor [illegible] to arrange [illegible] and transpose the part one tone. This puts out the Contralto, who is too [illegible] to sing correctly in a strange key; [illegible] afraid in the correct key and go through [illegible]. It sounds far from right. The Conductor wants to [illegible] the Bass cannot stay any longer. "It will be all right," he observes [illegible] "[illegible] good performance!" [illegible] There are [illegible] to the rehearsal. Mdlle. N. begs the conductor to take her [illegible] she expects [illegible]. The Contralto remonstrates, because she has to attend a religious meeting and was the first to come to rehearsal. The Tenor [illegible] he has [illegible]. The Soprano being very good-natured, [illegible]. The Conductor takes, therefore, the Bass for the Tenor and Contralto. During the solo of the latter the Tenor discovers that Mdlle. N. has a bunch of [illegible] golden [illegible]. He begins playing with them, while the Contralto [illegible] glances at him and he forgets to come in at the right time. To keep him Mlle. N. sings the part in the upper octave. This sounds horrible. The Conductor gazes yearningly through the window at the blue sky and at the weathercocks, already gleaming in the golden rays of the setting sun; in the street below are heard the merry voices of children and he thinks of the cool summer cellar, the evening skittle-gallery and the round table reserved for the regular customers. But he is still a captive. When below, at last, dismissed the Comedian and the Tenor, the Soprano [illegible] to her religious duties, and the tenor to make up [illegible] [illegible] Mlle. N. [illegible] [illegible] form arrangements in her head—she does not like singing them a part an octave of the annoying [illegible]. The Adagio of the Aria is sung most profound sentiment and melting fervor. A great deal too much feeling [illegible] old Viennese master used to [illegible] a thing was spun out in this fashion. But our Conductor is obliged to praise the young lady. It is true that she may be mistaken in the Allegro. She does not keep time. It is true that she [illegible] the tempo, but her host [illegible] by her own singing on that, in a moment of inclination, the Conductor [illegible] held of her arm and guides her head. Suddenly the door is thrown open and Mlle. N.'s [illegible] rushes in, with a sweet smile upon her face. "Ah! I thought I should find you alone," she says, "I am very sorry to interrupt you, my dear, but our visitors have also wish to hear the air!" With these words, she points to two elderly females who follow her. These take possession of a couple of chairs, and Mlle. N. sings the air even more sentimentally and more out of time than at first. All kinds of [illegible] are now described, and the Conductor has to accompany them. Meanwhile, the old ladies go on whispering to each other and using expressions, such as "responsible sentiment," "a steady young man," "honorable intentions," which he hears, and cause him awful perturbation. "Must I put up with this, too?" he thinks, but he cannot justify himself without giving offence. At last they rise, thank him, conveying rather sadly as they do and call off. The last evening, however, is growing [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] are already [illegible] from the [illegible] in the country or their [illegible] in town. [illegible] N. [illegible] significant allusions among her acquaintances in the [illegible] [illegible] her daughter may commence with some one in the town. The result of all this is a silence in the poor Conductor at the general rehearsal the next evening. A third of the [illegible] do not appear and several young ladies [illegible] by their absence. [illegible] [illegible] does not know that every one of the missing [illegible] had cast an eye upon Mlle. N. and that every one of the missing [illegible] had probably [illegible] two eyes upon him, and [illegible] [illegible] from the moment of N. [illegible] [illegible] had been only spread abroad. [illegible] [illegible] as such addition, al particulars, an uncertain sudden feeling of dislike for him, poor fellow, and as [illegible] he is opposed to, not by [illegible] him in [illegible] [illegible] attendance at the grand rehearsal. But one friend a more delicate one and a calmer disposition he would derive some [illegible] of the ... [illegible] the general [illegible] [illegible] is a [illegible] [illegible] into a more [illegible] situation. But he is in that hateful state of excitement known only to those fellow sufferers who have conducted a grand rehearsal.

The public performance is far less fatiguing. The [illegible] then rolls along an appointed course, which it is too late to alter. But the grand rehearsal, alas, perhaps, all the more more weary [illegible] [illegible] only time, and where, in addition to the musical arrangements, so many troublesome [illegible] have to be settled, demands and exhausts the whole intellectual power of the Conductor.

After our friend has, for instance, given three taps with his conductor's wand, and [illegible] [illegible] most [illegible] [illegible] requested those present to be silent, he has, in the first chorus, [illegible] [illegible] obliged to stop and ask the first and second tenors not to stand talked up together [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] separate, so that he has to hear [illegible] ladies will be so [illegible] by a merely artistic feeling; and create themselves with one book between two. But many a fine member is shortsighted, or pretends to be so, and she is hardly allowed to share her book with any one. The consequence is that the available parts are pulled backwards and forwards and partially torn, while three or four persons are painfully peering, in many cases, into the same book. During the rehearsal, the composers are [illegible] away in the boys' [illegible] close at hand, and when the Conductor [illegible] on his pass to for them to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the noise which prevents his hearing [illegible] all the [illegible] [illegible] progress of the [illegible] [illegible] appears and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] independently supplies for the next evening, and that the workmen are not to be had at any other time. During the pause, the Conductor is again compelled to ask for silence, if only out of consideration for the soloists. The fact is, a new photograph is being circulated among the ladies, every one of whom thinks she is called upon to give her opinion of it, while a [illegible] [illegible] is usually passed round amongst the men. But it does not strengthen their powers of endurance so much as it increases their longing for the smoking-room. Many of them do not wait for the last chorus, but [illegible] [illegible] over benches [illegible] [illegible], into the dark holds of the room, where [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] through a [illegible] doorway, whence there issues an enticing odor of food and tobacco. With the last chord the parts are thrown aside, and the majority of the members hurry out without any leave-taking. Only those who have some question to ask, or some demand to make, gather round our hero, who wipes the perspiration from his brow, and is at length left by himself not to get cool, but to gather up and arrange the parts again, to correct in a [illegible] [illegible] have been found in them, or to tell the attendant to [illegible] [illegible] necessary trifles, etc. When at length completely [illegible] he enters the eating-room the best dishes are already [illegible] one of the [illegible] some of the members to whom he has to speak on important subjects are playing Tarock, and only half listen to him; others assert as their conviction that a great drawback is [illegible] [illegible] over again, etc. Our friend [illegible] [illegible] early and out of [illegible] sleeps [illegible] and [illegible] of solo singers who are suddenly attacked with hoarseness, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], of passages taken up at the wrong moment, and of [illegible] [illegible]. May nothing of this come true, but everything go off successfully.

England.

THE HEREFORD FEST [illegible] began on the 20th of August. The Orchestra reports of it as follows:

For the people of the old city the annual gathering is doubtless an interesting event. Life in a cathedral city and in the outlying parishes is usually all sort of routine, on which the advent of an occasion like the present agreeably breaks. [illegible] on Tuesday morning the cathedral was crowded. The [illegible] [illegible] were there in their robes of office, the members of the Three Choirs were there for their old purpose, a large congregation was here, drawn by the celebration of the annual festival. Dr. Wesley was there at the organ (his own Service in F being done early in the morning), and the Dean of Hereford was there for the sermon.

At noon the first performance of music commenced and lasted till three. The singers were Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss. The programme was as follows: Overture, Last Judgment (Spohr); Psalm 84th (Mozart) [illegible] (Spohr); Chorus, How lovely are Thy dwellings fair; solo (Miss Edith Wynne), My soul doth long; chorus, Happy who in Thy house [illegible]; quartet (Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Montem Smith and Mr. Weiss), Lord God of Hosts, hear now my prayer; chorus, Lord God of Hosts who mightest [illegible]; Anthem, Ascribe unto the Lord (Dr. Wesley); solo, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton and Mme. Patey-Whytock. After luncheon, Handel's Israel in Egypt was grandly executed, the magnificent choruses producing their usual effect. Additional [illegible] parts were supplied [illegible] Mr. G. A. Macfarren. Mr. Santley and Mr. Hunt Rees re-joined the musical forces. Mr. Townsend Smith conducted and Mr. Done, of Worcester, presided at the organ. In "Thou didst blow with Thy wind" the style of Mlle. Tietjens told splendidly, and gained general admiration. Mr. Sims Reeves did not take part, and Miss Elton in the duet "The Lord is my strength," though Mr. Reeves was down for it in the programme. Mr. Montem Smith was the substitute. But Mr. Reeves [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] his old success, "The enemy said" and made up for his [illegible] [illegible]. Choruses and band went [illegible].

The first [illegible] concert given in the evening at the Shire Hall was not so well attended as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] however, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible]. The programme was as follows:

PART I.—Selection from Mozart: Symphony in D, No. 4; aria, Mme. Patey-Whytock, "Addio"; recit. ed. aria, Mlle. Tietjens, "Non mi dir" ("Don Giovanni"); aria, Mr. Sims Reeves, "Dalla sua pace" ("La Clemenza di Tito"); duetto, Mlle. Tietjens and Mr. Santley, "La dove prende" ("Il Flauto Magico"); song, Mr. Montem Smith, "The Violet"; Andante et variations d'une Sonate in A, arranged for voice by J. D. Wakefield, Miss Julia Elton; song, Mr. Santley, "Ho a faded violet" (Flotow); Romance, Miss Edith Wynne, "Quando a te lieta" ("Faust") (Gounod); violoncello obbligato, Mr. G. Collins; song, Mr. Weiss, "I am not old" (J. L. Hatton); [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], "Kate Kearney" [illegible] ([illegible]).

PART II.—Overture, Meluslna (Mendelssohn); song, Mr. Sims Reeves, "My Queen" (Blumenthal); Irish melody, Mme. Patey-Whytock, "The Meeting of the Waters"; scena, Mlle. Tietjens, "Le Violette" (Scarlatti); solo, piano, Mr. H. Blagrove, Romance in F (Beethoven); duetto, Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Sims Reeves, "Tornami a dir" ("Don Pasquale") (Donizetti); ballad, Miss Julia Elton, "Little Fay among Fay" (Barnett); song, Mr. Santley, "Oh! Mistress mine" (Sullivan); air, Miss Edith Wynne, "Where the bee sucks" (Purcell) (Dr. Arne); chorus, Mama, there's a storm (Sir H. R. Bishop).

The first went in a very dull manner; there was little interest in the minds of the audience in the symphony in D, and still less with the Wakefield arrangement of the sonata in A—too great a musical to a verbal task. Yet the performance of the former was altogether creditable, and even by the listless audience the assistance of Mr. Townsend Smith, who conducted, were recognized in loud and applause. The Herefordians woke up presently when the songs came on, and listened by ignoring every one [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which was politely [illegible] by Mr. Sims Reeves. The "Melusina"—a favorite composition with Mendelssohn—was given by the band [illegible] [illegible] and without [illegible] in [illegible]—faults which [illegible] destroy the charm of an otherwise attractive work. This overture might have been, and the violin solo by Mr. Blagrove was the chief instrumental feature of the programme. This excellent artist played which I [illegible] [illegible]. Reverting to the vocal portion, we may notice the melodious duet from "Il Flauto," which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a perception of the [illegible] of Mozart. Dr. Barnett's agreeable song "Little Fay" [illegible] [illegible] by Miss Elton. Blumenthal's popular song, "My Queen," which Mr. Sims Reeves [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] which went very well, especially Purcell's, and "Kate Kearney," which the Herefordians evidently thought [illegible]. This last was rapturously applauded and encored. In "The Meeting of the Waters" Mme. Patey-Whytock altered the [illegible] order to show off her fine voice [illegible] which she achieved at the cost of the melody. Dr. Arne's "Where the bee sucks," and M. [illegible]'s [illegible] [illegible] found great favor. The vocal arrangement of Mozart's Sonata there are far better [illegible] [illegible] to determine. It does not suit the voice, and it is thoroughly spoiled in the [illegible]. Miss Julia Elton could make nothing of it.

On Wednesday morning the "Elijah" was well attended—a circumstance due to the popularity of this oratorio which [illegible] its public [illegible] [illegible] in the "Messiah." Every seat in the aisle and nave was occupied. [illegible] not only was the second-[illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible], but the co-operation of Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington with Mlle. Tietjens was an addition which much was expected. The arrangements for the reception of the crowd were extremely good, and good [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of the morning brought no disappointment; the singing of Mme. Goldschmidt was full of [illegible] [illegible]. Her [illegible] of course suffered from time, but the loveliest and culture remain as [illegible] as ever, and the [illegible] of all who heard her was pronounced. Of the oratorio, the second part was better [illegible] [illegible] than the first, and the forte passages better than the piano. The choruses, however, were on the whole very satisfactory, and the tempi were taken rapidly and effectively by Mr. Townshend Smith, under whose baton all things were smoothly [illegible]. Mme. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] by her [illegible] by the lady who stood at his side. "Hear ye Israel," sung [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] were given a [illegible] beauty. The chief defect about Mme. Goldschmidt's performance was the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] the effect of [illegible] a parcel. The gem of the whole must [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] hardly so well [illegible] could have been wished. The [illegible] [illegible] by over [illegible], but [illegible] to use the effort. Mr. Reeves repeated his [illegible] excellences and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] higher [illegible] were shaky and unpleasant. Miss Edith Wynne has a fresh and sympathetic voice, which would have told better if she had always sung in tune. Miss Elton gave an intelligent reading of her part, and sang the solo "Woe, woe unto them" in a highly finished manner; and Mme. Whytock was full of dramatic fire. The whole of the tenor music was borne by Mr. Montem Smith, and it is no light praise that he sustained the burden so well. Mr. Smith's chief merit is his artlessness; as a singer he is somewhat too mechanical; but his obliging disposition does great service in his business. On both Tuesday and Wednesday he stepped, in a most cheerful manner, between Mr. Sims Reeves and disappointment. In the "new gentleman" was announced to sing the second part of "Elijah," but the promise was not kept. Mr. [illegible] sang [illegible]. The collection of the day was £196 to 1d. which, added to the previous amounts collected, made a total of £331 18s. 9d. The exhibition falling off of Handel's benevolence, as compared with the magnificence of her sister cities.

At the concert on Wednesday night, Mr. Sims Reeves was unable to appear, and there was no Adelaide (or Golden) as Mr. Montem Smith was already announced. But an absurd compromise was made, and Tamano and Aria being called from one, Mr. Smith took the burden on himself. The serenata was capitally supported by Miss Tietjens, Mr. Santley and he also a second tenor. The second part of the concert was announced with success, and did not come out till midnight.

On Thursday morning the Cathedral was thronged with visitors anxious to hear the novelty of this year's festival—Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's oratorio "Ruth." Those who had not previously been enabled to gauge Mr. Goldschmidt's capabilities as a composer were much disappointed at the result. Not all the good singing of the soprano can, for "Ruth"—Miss Lind, Mme. Whytock, Mr. Santley and Montem Smith (Mr. Reeves was still unwell) could render the work interesting. Mr. Goldschmidt's [illegible] high. No failure has been yet presented. Beyond mention of the circumstances of the [illegible] we cannot this week go, and must defer any further remarks on "Ruth."

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

II.

To those who wonder how it is possible for the ear to apprehend and follow such a multiplicity of parts as Bach has given us in the first chorus of the Magnificat (five voice parts, besides all the instruments, all treated polyphonically) Franz offers aid and comfort in the following suggestion:

We do not deem it indispensable, with Bach, to follow the web of parts in all the details. As in a Gothic Cathedral the numberless particulars and minute embellishments only serve to give life and motion to the great whole, but not to draw the attention of the beholder away from that, precisely so it should be with the polyphony of Bach. Bach's harmonies unfold themselves for the most part in great broad proportions—the fundamental basses show this clearly enough —those great groups are evidently resolved by a melodiously flowing carriage of the parts into small or groups giving rise to a multitude of secondary harmonies, leading throughout this way and that way. Now whoever seeks to follow this flowing, transitory essence, will soon be wrecked, because before one form has completed its whole outline, another is already pressing to the foreground, to give way as quickly to a third, so that all that is single and particular seems to elude the ear. The true apprehension of the detail, as well as of the whole, is lost by so listening to Bach. On the contrary, much rather seize upon those great proportions, seek to image them inwardly in his own mind, and from this firm basis learn to look with a sure insight into that seemingly confused, but really most richly artistic, organically developed composition of single parts. Then will those particulars in which the centre of gravity in every passage lies, those which have the decisive word to say, those which are the principal supporters of the artistic design, stand forth of themselves without difficulty, while that which is only intended to be auxiliary and to round off the musical form or point of style, will cease to exercise any disturbing and bewildering effect. The secret of Bach's manner of leading on his parts lies in the close and intimate relation of each single part to the whole,—accordingly the understanding must keep it ever in the first line, the development of the whole, and seek through this to orient itself as regard to the particulars. Even for the musician, with the most searching study, entering into the smallest details, it will never do to leave this out of sight, unless he would run the risk of misunderstanding Bach.

Now here our first Chorus, in spite of the richest fulness and variety, unfolds itself essentially in the most simple forms. As a first change the Dominant is introduced, from which the chorus in its further course takes a side direction to the parallel key (of relative minor). From this the modulation turns unconstrainedly back toward the Tonic, touches the Subdominant in passing and finally makes a full close on the Tonic. Ornate melodic cadences mark the end points of the principal keys and give a tender lyric breath to the grand, majestic forms. After the vocal setting has come to an end, the orchestra comes forward again with an independent post-lude, which is taken from the second half of the prelude. We see how simply and with what comprehensive oversight Bach knew how to lay out the fundamental relations of his plan! Dazzling splendor and jubilant joy in all such meeting, such as the most graceful interlacings of tones, are the leading attributes of this first number. Keeping expectation on the stretch, it admirably prepares you for the following, and is like the festively decorated entrance to the temple, in which songs of thanksgiving and praise resound to the might and mercy of the Lord.

2. The next sentence brings a Solo (D major, 3-8 measure) which in a lovely manner flashes back as individual feeling the same emotions, to which the chorus has lent a broad and weighty expression. The voice part, a Second Soprano, treats the words of the text: "Et exultavit spiritus meus in Deo salutari meo" (And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour); and is accompanied by the string quartet, here and there interrupted by the Organ. A gently moving motive sounded at one play by an intervening bass figure, which afterwards, as the whole goes on expanding, imparts itself ornamentally to the first violin, controls almost exclusively the development of this mild and tender Arioso. Here all so rounds itself to the most beautiful symmetry of forms, that the last half of each musical sentence seems to flow from the first half of itself. Such a bright, childlike joy, which runs along in a lovely unobstructed and untroubled mood, only can spring from the absolute purity of a virgin heart.

3. Quite different is the character of the number which now follows, an Aria for the First Soprano (B minor, 4-4 measure), to which a Chorus is appended in the most immediate connection. The solo part is built upon the words: "Quia respexit humilitatem ancillae suae; ecce enim ex hoc beatam me dicent"—the chorus, on their continuation: "omnes generationes." (For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden, for, behold, from thenceforth all generations shall call me blessed.) Plain and simple as the style seems in which the Air is outwardly disposed of—the song is only accompanied by an Oboe d'amore and the Organ—the depth of feeling is most touching. Bach conceives the text words not only as they, the situation in which they present themselves: his musical conception evidently reaches far beyond. In Mary he perceives not only the humble, lowly maid to whom the Saviour of the world has just been announced and who in blissful peace enjoys the consciousness of the great boon—he rather, with a prophet's eye, sees in her that mother of God whom Sorrow is to bear and to atone for the sins of the world under a servile form. How else shall we explain the uneasy fearful pictures that like a dark veil settles down over all the still repose and devotion? And still more is this mystical conception of Bach confirmed, when we take into view the character of the chorus that falls in so swiftly in F-sharp minor 4-4 time. Its wild eager haste the voice parts rush in the tone of the solo piece and, as if driven by demonic forces, tower to such a colossal height of expression that it is easy enough to imagine that the master seeks to bring before us here a wild convulsion of the most unexampled kind and from an unrooted starting point. Perhaps there floated over his deep soul in the moment of conception the words of Christ: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace but a sword."

The extremely energetic theme is first seized by the Bass, around which the second Soprano, Alto and Tenor start off with a whirling motion. Then follow the further entrances of the theme which constantly draws after it a powerful wild-ly excited figure; they succeed each other in half measures blow on blow. A far reaching sequence extends it then by step upward till it at last finds a momentary point of rest in the parallel key, A major. But without rest or pause the hurrying masses roar along in a new onslaught, which shapes itself if possible in still bolder and more gigantic proportions, hurrying toward another goal, the key of the Dominant, C-sharp minor. Thus far an angrily up-rearing bass figure has roared below the voices, presently (in a bold and sequence) working its way up out of the dark depths. Suddenly the Bass is given to the Basso Continuo: sharp and heavy orchestral strokes, marking the Dominant Chord of F-sharp minor on the first and third quarter of the measure with full force, follow and so form a sort of Organ point, above and within which now the chorus is hurled in the most fabulous confusions. Imitations or five-part Canon, at unison and in the octave, in swift succession on the quarter beats, press onward in a strange uncomfortable hold (fermata) which forms as a certain close the decisive crisis of our stormy chorus. For after this the voices, in a lily battling to the resolvent, united almost hemispherically, are sum of blended into steadfast unity—the confusion passes, although after violent contests, is fulfilled in chaos!

The Coming Opera Season.

Italian Opera, under Maretzek's direction, will open at the New York Academy, on the 2nd of this month. The repertoire, so far as yet whispered by the newspaper quid-nuncs, is not very inviting to those who love music in a deeper sense than that of fashion or of momentary sensation. For novelties are promised, of course, the two latest Parisian fashions: Verdi's Don Carlos and Gounod's Romeo and Juliet, also a Leonora of Mercadante's (not a word of one by Beethoven, commonly called Fidelio!) and some pretty trifles (we suppose they are) such as Ferrari's Pipelè and Cagnoni's Don Bucefalo. Among the revivals are named Bellini's Romeo and Juliet, Donizetti's Belisario and Maria di Rohan, Meyerbeer's Prophet, Rossini's Otello. Of course too there will be the usual Verdi and Donizetti hacks, the Gounod Faust, &c., &c. Nothing first-class in the whole, except most likely Don Giovanni, which no opera company can afford to shelve entirely. No Nozze di Figaro, nor Magic Flute, nor Seraglio of Mozart; no Fidelio; no William Tell; nothing by Weber nor by Cherubini; none of those noble classical revivals which have redeemed the character of the London houses in spite of the "stilt-walking chaos" of trash! But that Italian Opera is a thing of fashion mainly, and must be expected to seek first to please the fashionable rather than the strongly musical. If we only had a good permanent, organized German Opera at the same time, which should carry out the promise of that which gave us Fidelio, &c., a few years since, we should not object to the Italian Opera in its peculiar province. But, now it seems as if it never will go one way and we were not to be allowed in America with the word Opera any hopes of what is best in music,—what there are such noble operas in so many!

The real remedy, which we fear is far off, must lie in permanent local lyrical establishments, which may provide for this want with the same superiority to momentary popularities and fashions that our Philharmonic Societies do in Concert music. So long as we depend on private speculation (which is instinctively opposed to everything of quiet growth and permanence) we shall know Opera only by short, feverish seasons, in which advertising is the chief part, more fresh than ale, the whole aim being to exploit each field in turn as hastily as possible, get all the dollars that can be got out of people's pockets in the smallest number of weeks, overdoing the thing by frequency of performances, and leaving the musical sensibilities of each little opera public utterly exhausted and demoralized for any healthy interest in the better sense of unpretending entertainments.

Of Mr. Maretzek's New York Season we gather further particulars from the Evening Post:

It is to be divided into two subscription series of twenty-eight nights. The regular nights will be as heretofore, Thursday performances at Brooklyn continuing as usual. The company engaged is a very large one, including in its list of principal singers seven prima donnas, four tenors, two baritones, one primo buffo, and two bassos. The chorus has been enlarged and improved. The orchestra has been increased.

There are thousands who will regret the withdrawal of the name of Miss Kellogg, who has gone to win new lyric triumphs abroad. Her vacant place will be supplied not only by Mme. Parepa-Rosa but by [illegible], who became slightly famous last season. The inimitable Ronconi has again been lured from a London engagement by Mr. Maretzek's more liberal offers. The public's old and ever trustworthy favorite, [illegible], has been re-engaged as a matter of course and so are Antonucci, Baragli and Testa. Miss Hauck, Mme. Natali Testa and Miss Ronconi are also re-engaged.

Of the new engagements, the first is that of Mme. Kapp-Young, a dramatic soprano, of whom much is expected, but who [illegible]. Mrs. Jenny Kempton, a contralto, who goes out with honors from the [illegible] and has been studying opera in Italy, is also engaged. Signor Anastasi, a tenor already pleasantly familiar to our public. Signor [illegible], a "robust" tenor of European reputation. Signor Paolo Medini, a young Italian basso of great reputation and Rupert [illegible], have been engaged.

The Opera will of course serve its favors round to what New Yorkers like to call the "provincial" cities, by two or three weeks at a time, during the winter,—in short just as often as it will do to pass the hat round. In Boston we are told, Maretzek will come to the new "Selwyn's Theatre," not yet more planned when we are not informed.

2. There is also mention of another Italian Opera party under the management of Max Strakosch, who has induced that admirable artist of former days Madame LAGRANGE to revisit America. He has also secured Signor BRIGNOLI; and it is said the concern is to bear the name of "The Lagrange-Brignoli Combination."

3. Then comes Mr. Bateman's importation of the lightest and frothiest of light, satirical French extravaganza and burlesque, the bouffe of Offenbach, whom the New York Weekly Review calls "the greatest living musical genius of the old world" (Heaven help the Old World, and the New!). He has brought all the requisite French singers and other artists, and will open in New York, at the French Theatre, about the same time with Maretzek. Report speaks highly of the leading prima donna. It will be a novelty and no doubt amusing; at any rate we shall be able to see for ourselves whether the Offenbach celebrity is merely an old fashion or something more. Mr. B.'s first experiment on the New York public will be Offenbach's latest, said to be his best work: "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein."—Of this too, we are to have our turn at the new theatre.

4. Light English Comic Opera, at the Boston Music Hall, is among the things announced. About the middle of January it will begin, in a kind of "Parlor Opera" style, under the direction of Mr. Julius Eichberg, who proposes to bring out his own clever sparkling little operettas, the "Doctor of Alcantara," and some new ones, with fuller amount of execution than heretofore.

5. There is a Richings English Opera, making Philadelphia its point of departure, with plans of traversing the country. Balfe, we suppose, is the type thereof.

6. Where is the German Opera? Weber's Freischütz, and all the hopes it raised! Where are Fredericks and Himmer and Habelmann and Hermanns, and the rest? Why will it not come and plant itself in Boston, and live on modestly and quietly and grow?

NEWPORT, R. I. An Amateur concert was given on Thursday evening, Sept. 5, by the residents and pleasure seekers of this happy isle, for the benefit of the suffering women and children of the Island of Crete," unhappy isle upon the other side of the globe. It was the work of a few energetic ladies whose sympathies were aroused for freedom and humanity, even at that distance, and who, bravely overcoming many obstacles, brought it to a very successful result. The "Academy of Music" was well filled by the best part of Newport society and the concert realized more than five hundred dollars for the Cretans. Musically, too, it seems to have given pleasure. We are not at liberty to name the amateurs, as some of them [illegible] been part of the express condition that they must not be published." There was a charming lady soprano from Boston, who gave great delight by singing the soprano air "Mein gläubiges Herz" of Bach as well as Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" and [illegible] Franz. There was also one of our finest contraltos, who sang Lachner's "Thou everywhere" and some ballads with truest expression. And one of our best basses;—these last two very kindly went down at a few hours' notice to offset some sudden disappointments in the programme. A gentleman from New York sang some solos (Italian) acceptably; there was fine piano-playing by two Newport ladies and a gentleman amateur of Boston did good service in the accompaniments.

THE MANIA OF A GOOD THING PERHAPS. It is cheering to see how rapidly the interest in music spreads among the American people. But there is such a thing as overdoing it. Is there not danger that so many "Conservatories" (think of five already in New York, and one or more now open in Boston!) may lead some to sweep in vast numbers of superficial pupils, that is take up a reasonable number of good intentions or a "reserve" the time and means and of true Art? We should be sorry to see these rushed heedlessly as a new opening in business. But [illegible] and the various "fancies" which have their little turn of fashion [illegible]. At least we trust that some of our readers (whom we see doing our humble part to make as musical as we can) see more than enough not to miss the good sense of the following from the Transcript:

MUSICAL INCAPACITY. How many young persons we see who spend a vast amount of time in the practice of music, but who evince by their little progress that if they were to pass their entire mortal existence in their instrument they would never become good musicians. At best, they in the end can say, succeed in the performance of a few pieces in a third-rate manner, or learn to [illegible] how much better they have heard them played elsewhere by others who had a real genius for the science of harmony. The conversation, too, of those [illegible] after a [illegible] time. So great has been the sacrifice of their hours, that they have devoted but little time to reading and the poverty of their general information is as the more plain with that of their skill in music.

Yet, had the whole of many of those young persons been turned in another direction, they would have been found to possess a capacity or guidance [illegible] in their pursuit for music is defective. Had they been supplied with books, and encouraged in the work of storing their memories with useful knowledge, until they had become habitual readers, they might have been brighter ornaments in their social circle than any musical talent could have made them.

Musical practice, at best, is so alarming absorbent of time and at this period of life when time is most valuable,—the years of youth when the character and habits are in the process of formation,—the seasons cannot be too carefully spent. We would say to every parent, weigh well the capacity of your child, and the probability of his success in the difficult science of music before bearing too great a sacrifice of time and money in that direction.

The name of Mr. L. W. WHEELER, the well-known teacher of vocalization, has been added to the list of instructors at the New England Conservatory of Music for the coming year.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 1.—It affords me very great pleasure to be able to report that there will be no cause for the complaint which has been hitherto too frequently heard here of the dearth of instrumental concerts. With the exception, alone, of our Germania Rehearsals, and the three Evening Concerts, at each of which a Symphony was produced, given by Messrs. Jarvis and Schmitz, there have been no opportunities presented at least to the present generation of becoming acquainted with orchestral music. A good orchestra is a decided community rarity in Philadelphia. It is from this that one part of our really intelligent people, little or nothing is known of the great works of Beethoven, Mozart or Haydn; and of course, of Mendelssohn, Schubert or Schumann, of the others, scarcely have the names been heard. This is a melancholy confession to make, but it is a pleasure to make it now than heretofore. I see there is every reason to believe that the future promises an improvement for us in this respect. Our new Hall, the Horticultural, I understand, is better adapted than any similar place of the kind in the country, is to be put to an appropriate use during the coming season by Mr. Carl Sentz, who places there a series of Weekly Orchestral Concerts, with an efficient corps of our best performers, under his own direction, producing in regular succession the works of the masters. Mr. Sentz promises, as well, the presence of solo assistance vocal and instrumental at such concerts. It is an undertaking in the proper direction, and I trust will meet with the most cheering encouragement. I [illegible] of Mr. Sentz [illegible] his praiseworthy efforts to elevate the standard of popular musical appreciation. The first concert will be given on Thursday afternoon, October 3, of which I will send you a detailed account.

An event worth chronicling in your columns is the production of a mass of Gounod's,—the only one I understand which he has written,—by the Choir of St. Augustine's Church on Fourth Street. The Mass has not yet been produced elsewhere this side of the water. It is by no means a great work. In it the composer falls below even his own not very high standard, and although the effort, as a whole, is pleasing, it is not a composition that is destined to occupy a prominent place among works of its class.

It lacks originality and is ornamental. Its few mise [illegible] are some in the extreme, and the more striking effects are borrowed from the masters. Without entertaining a very exalted opinion of M. Gounod's merits as a composer I am not expecting or too critical in expecting something much better from him than this somewhat weak attempt at sacred writing. Nevertheless, as the production of one of the most popular of modern musicians, it possesses an interest which would not perhaps otherwise attach to it. The mass was very creditably produced on last Sunday when I had the pleasure of hearing it. It was directed by Mr. Thunder who presided at the fine organ of this church, assisted by a large and well trained Choir.

Our New Musical Society, the "Mendelssohn," formed last Spring held their annual meeting last week and permanently organized. They promise the production of the "Walpurgis Night" at their first Concert in October.

Mr. Wolfsohn is still in Europe, but is expected to be in the city before the end of the month. He has in contemplation a series of Soirées assisted by Mr. Kopta, and a cello player whom he expects to bring with him from Germany.

Messrs. Jarrett and Cross have likewise been sojourning on the Continent, during the vacation, and are now on their way homeward. These gentlemen will also do something in the matter of novelties, so that with the "Germania," the Opera and the other attractions promised and herein already noted, the lovers of music will have enough to occupy and interest them. MERCUTIO.

In a late number of the Revue des Deux Mondes is an article by the well-known publicist, Henry Blaze de Bury, entitled "Shakespeare and his Musicians." The writer is clearly, [illegible] German musicians, and is especially [illegible] of the musical [illegible] of Richard Wagner [illegible] "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," [illegible]. He [illegible] the doctrine of French music, and arraigns it for making of Shakespeare's characters [illegible] and [illegible] sentimental pictures, on which to hang its miserable tatters. He charges the musical-rarers of [illegible] with a "pure mixture of impotency," and places the poor composers who condescend to [illegible] such stuff. Unfortunately the composers themselves seem most to blame. Nothing enough [illegible] was there not buried beneath their effect-making, airs, modes, [illegible] pieces, marches, and dancing music, agreeable and acceptable [illegible]. Gounod in particular [illegible] in having transformed Goethe into a Parisian grisette. The masterpiece of his own opera, Romeo and Juliet, beside the treatment of the same subject by Bellini—at whose harmonic [illegible] is now very favorably [illegible]—in [illegible]. Gounod in his "Faust" had been inspired at least by a spark of Shakespearian genius, but Gounod annihilates feeling and character in order to make [illegible] the best-bede of his paradoxical creations.—Ibid.

The death of Mr. Bartholomew, the librettist of Mendelssohn's oratorios, occurred on the 18th ult. He wrote the book of "Elijah" for Mendelssohn, but did not select the subject for the composer, as it has been erroneously stated. Mendelssohn [illegible] in the [illegible] of [illegible] from Krummacher, [illegible] and arranged the materials prepared the [illegible] incidents of the Prophet's career. A PORTRAIT OF HERR JOACHIM.—In an article on the "Pictures of the year" the Saturday Review says.—"Violinists have not generally much reason to be thankful to painters, who rarely understand either the form of the instrument or the manner of performance. Mr. Watts seems to be an exception to this rule. His "Lamplight Study, Herr Joachim," is a [illegible] in its interpretation of violin-playing. The instrument is held as a master holds it, and the [illegible] has [illegible] fingers in the right place [illegible]. There is great power in the treatment of the face, but Mr. Watts has [illegible] the general tones that were to [illegible] as to [illegible] as an [illegible] King[illegible] Napoleon [illegible] of [illegible]. It is green, his fiddle is green, and the hue of it is all green. The eyes are [illegible] the lamps [illegible] and the whole picture has the [illegible] being terribly skilled in [illegible] as if there were a [illegible] between [illegible] withstanding these drawbacks [illegible] the massive head so grandly modelled [illegible] of the face as well as an expression of [illegible] who [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] occupation [illegible] of great [illegible] are [illegible] being at the task, some true [illegible] unknown [illegible] which though beyond the reach of most of [illegible] at [illegible] is at least [illegible] as a [illegible] perhaps for the full development of modern civilisation, almost as necessary."

MUSIC IN A COUNTRY CHURCH IN FRANCE.—We extract the following from "A Week in a French Country House" by Adelaide Sartoris:—"Our Sunday [illegible] was all very brilliantly [illegible] and [illegible] successful. Two German songs with translations. One is [illegible] all [illegible] and [illegible] though there are [illegible] in the [illegible] as [illegible]. The [illegible] song, and the second is the [illegible] itself.

Fair Newport. Song.	W. Harland.	30

The words are in connection with the poet. [illegible] and the "[illegible]" of "Newport" ought to be no less than sing the song which compliments them.

Instrumental.

Tell me, darling. Quickstep.	Dr. Ordway.	30

A quickstep as smooth and fit to the highest [illegible] to the players and composers. Here is something with the old [illegible], but finely wrought and very brilliant.

Träumerei. (Reverie)	Schumann.	25

It is pleasant to play those shorter pieces of Schumann, only to enjoy their exquisite workmanship. There is no more [illegible] of them two pages, so [illegible] of a dozen more difficulty [illegible].

Whispering Breeze Polka.	C. J. Dorn.	30

Has a kind of rustling, whispering sound, which compares well with the title.

BY CHARLES LORD [illegible]

["Yesterday I drove here and at night met with a wonderful organ on which I could play "Schmücke dich, O! liebe Seele," to my heart's content. —MENDELSSOHN'S LETTER FROM [illegible], September 3, 1831.]

There came into the church at dead of day
When angel shapes with vestments [illegible] in tie dances,
And crimson saints were pictured panes wide-arched [illegible] as pallid ghosts in purple as at
With a brace and with pure light upon there is
A [illegible] [illegible] king [illegible],
Who passed into the organ in the loft,
The dusty [illegible] left, all [illegible],
Where carven choral [illegible] and seraphim
And imaged scroll symbols [illegible] up keys.
He bowed and pressed the mass of yellow keys,
With [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] then
He soul beheld a [illegible] light;
The lurid spaces, shade and twilight weird
Before his eyes. He felt no weight of gloom
For life to him a splendid sweet seemed,
Rap[illegible] with happy [illegible] sunshine songs
And realms of blissful [illegible]
Arpeggios of harp-like [illegible] [illegible] he.
And such a [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of him
That joined the singing planet chorus vast
With human song an [illegible] of high hope!
He [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and wove the woof
Of [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] cherubim
Then [illegible] in full [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible],
The organ giant-voiced and grand in speech
He [illegible] [illegible] harmonies;
Created holy [illegible] and word
Majestic marches, [illegible] sweet-rhymed
And [illegible], [illegible], joy and overtures,
The reminiscences of nightingales
Whose treble shrill the dreaming [illegible] at dusk
All perfect [illegible] of precious peace,
Soft shepherd songs and [illegible] of him,
Ecstatic allegro of all [illegible] delights
And [illegible] fugues of quaintest sound,
While pedal-[illegible], [illegible] rhythmical
Its diapason the [illegible] rolling strong.
He urged the massive keys to mould and make
The shapes his soul demand as sculptors [illegible],
With [illegible] fugues [illegible] [illegible].
Those [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he wrought in tone—
Sweet songs that need not words, but pregnant are
With love, aspiration hope and holy praise!

LARGO.

With tone on tone and [illegible] I build up [illegible]
The [illegible] of song.
And [illegible] Thou no more than reach into Thy Heaven [illegible] of strong Triumphant [illegible] such as Miriam, and she then had a [illegible] song,
With happy chorus of delivered hosts, Thy Name led when [illegible] and [illegible].
And Thou [illegible] the [illegible] Oh! Most High!
I [illegible] to speak
Thy praise and [illegible] organ [illegible] here, with [illegible] chords [illegible] seek To [illegible] Thee [illegible] sphere-[illegible], magnificent [illegible]
And wealth of [illegible] that angel-wise shall soar and [illegible] in Thy presence, Lord!

I praise Thee evermore! [illegible] let Thy children sing a perfect anthem of love
And modulate their [illegible] that are the undertone of life and [illegible]
As flamed [illegible]. Let the merry [illegible] of [illegible] by [illegible]
O[illegible] sweet-[illegible] harmonies of [illegible]

ANDANTE.

Arise, my [illegible] [illegible] strong to [illegible] and
[illegible]
The angry fiends and evil lurking phantoms born of night,
As [illegible] shapes, Walpurgis witches, [illegible]
[illegible]
All [illegible] [illegible]! Oh! arise and [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] with lightnings, as an armed angel [illegible]
grand
To [illegible] vivid banner of great glory from [illegible] hand
To [illegible] of gloom, where groping man do toil and
[illegible]
An awful [illegible] silence! Awake! [illegible]
of [illegible]
And cheer the wearied souls of men, as [illegible] winds from sea
Float welcome to their brows in August hours!
They pray for ye!

ALLEGRETTO.

Ah! magic pipes that emulate
The wailing winds and singing seas
And all the [illegible] melodies
Of earth or heaven commensurate,
Repeat for me but merry songs!
No dismal hints of human wrongs!
Repeat the children's merry joys,
In [illegible] quavers of [illegible]!
With all [illegible] of [illegible]
And trumpet and sweet viol [illegible],
Repeat the [illegible] of Helvidius,
The [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible],
The phrase as [illegible] sudden burst
[illegible] her sugar [illegible]
And delicate [illegible] fraught
With all delicious sweet thought
Of marvellous Sebastian Bach!
The gates of melody unlock
With all the soft [illegible] keys,
My Abbé Vogler's [illegible]!

There still as [illegible] [illegible] he, the [illegible]
[illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible]
[illegible] old church['s] sight and silence mute;
The bellows [illegible] from dazzling dreams;
The [illegible] was [illegible] from his touch
And [illegible] [illegible] behold [illegible]
A black-cloaked [illegible] that soft [illegible]
And lost himself in night. Thus all was still!

Recent German Operas.—Reinecke's "King Manfred."*

(Translated from the German for this Journal.)

In the history of Music, as in other spheres of human development, there are periods of transition, marked by the dying out of the genius which inspired the old works, followed by a "storm and pressure" period of seekers after something new whether such a renaissance, clear-voiced or only a vague anticipation. Unquestionably we find ourselves in such a situation, as regards the Opera. In Italy the period which began with Rossini is utterly effete, since Verdi is about written out, and no successor worthy to be named yet shows himself. Italians of taste and culture turn their eyes to Germany. Their public there begin to espouse the better German works, and the younger Italians seek to acquire the German culture, having learned justly to regard that as the fresh spring, from which alone can flow for them a thorough reformation for their opera Art. —France in the grand Opera, had yielded the primacy to the eclectic and speculative Meyerbeer and even in the comic opera, the properly national Art work has seen composers of German antecedents Herold, Halevy, Adam, dominate. But we must not deceive ourselves about the artistic worth of the productions which have gone forth from Paris and had their run in all theatres during the last thirty years. On conventional grounds produced with a more or less happy gift of invention and technical skill, mechanically these works have only a relative worth in detail, while on the whole and as a great mass they lay no claim to the satisfaction of any sort of ideal requirements, which apart from conventionalism conceal another deeper reason in themselves than a more or less amusing entertainment. At present Gounod is the hero of the day,—owing essentially to the success of his Faust, in which (thanks to his essentially German musical culture) he knew how to introduce, along with as many trivialities, some traits of that Romanticism which until to-day is not such as no other French score. Whether he will succeed, or how far in doing and deepening the tone which he has struck, and in becoming the French Weber we have yet to see. The works, which have come from Gounod's pen since the Faust, justify no such hope.

In Germany it is three names essentially, which seem to be epoch-making in the history of Opera: Mozart, Weber, Wagner. The first as founder of a German Opera in the classic style; Weber in the Romantic style; and finally Wagner by his attempt to do away with the divided, laboured product the Musical Drama, at once poetically and musically in great features, out of the motives contained in the subject matter and the persons.

Since Wagner, operatic production has had to choose between three ways. Either to attach itself to Wagner's predecessors, or to go with Wagner, or finally to seek out a new and independent path. This last seems now to be the effort of the more gifted young producers. But the independence, which they strive to manifest in their undertakings, can of course only be a relative one: for in the first place they are dependent partly on the receptibility of the public; and then, just the most cultivated and most cul-one among those ones, on the principle: "Try all things, hold fast to that which is good," surrender themselves to classicism in the best sense of the word.

A glance at the German repertoire teaches, that since Wagner there have been no German operas created, which have held a lasting place upon the stage. Nevertheless the activity among the producers is just now very great. Among the works, which the last years have brought us, the most talked about have been "Loreley," by Geibel and Max Bruch; "Des Sängers Fluch" (The Minstrel's Curse) by Meyern-Hohenberg and August Langert; "Astorga" by Pasqué and Joseph Abert. Bruch's "Loreley" in spite of the various "protections" which the composer enjoyed has not yet been able to find its way into one of our great court theatres, and its success at Mayence was not encouraging as to its acceptance here (in Wiesbaden.)

"Des Sängers Fluch" unquestionably betrays a certain as well talent in the composer and our Intendant Herr von Bose was not disinclined to accept it; but the principal events of the last summer prevented.

Abert has sent his opera into the world with his customary aplomb and with that colossal réclame in which he is even more a master than in composition. In our opinion the performance of "Astorga" is not without prospect of success with the great public, for everything in it is practical and made with a knowledge of usual outward effects; on the other hand all depth and sincerity are wanting, and the hollowness of the whole can scarcely remain long concealed from the not exacting public.

Under such circumstances our new Intendant Herr von Bose, has undertaken to put upon the stage the work of a composer who by his previous achievements in all fields of musical art has won the honorable reputation of an artist of an earnest and ideal direction and formed with all needed mastery in technical respects. This is the opera of which we here propose to speak: the five-act opera "King Manfred" by CARL REINECKE, the successor of Mendelssohn as professor in the Conservatorium and Director of the world-famous Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig.

Born in Altona on the 23d of June 1824, Reinecke received his first piano-forte instruction from his father, who, a venerable old man of 74 years, is now here (in Wiesbaden) to attend the first performance of his son's opera. At the age of eleven Reinecke could already let himself be heard in public, and in his eighteenth year he made an art journey to Copenhagen and Stockholm, which was brilliantly successful. For the completion of his studies he then went to Leipzig, where his progress was much furthered by intercourse with Mendelssohn and Schumann. Next follow during the years 1844-51 a series of journeys, partly alone, partly in company with the violinists Wasielewsky and Königslöw, to North Germany, to Copenhagen, where King Christian VIII appointed him court pianist, to Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Hiller, who engaged him as teacher of piano and counterpoint for the Conservatory at Cologne. In 1854 he went to Barmen as Music Director, in 1859 to Breslau as University Musical Director. In 1860 to Leipzig in his present above named capacity.

Among the 11 printed works of Reinecke are found the Oratorio "Belsazar;" a Battle Song for double chorus of men's voices; a Te Deum for the 50th anniversary of the battle of Leipzig; the operetta "Der vierjährige Posten;" a great number of songs for one or more voices; moreover a Symphony, the overtures to "Dame Kobold" and "Aladdin," a Concerto for piano and orchestra, a Quintet with piano, a Trio with piano, a Concerto for the violoncello, two piano Sonatas with 'cello, two string Quartets, and a very considerable number of piano pieces for two and four hands. A large part of these works have become known in very numerous performances and many of them enjoy a well deserved popularity. "King Manfred" is Reinecke's last work, and is at any rate the product of a cultivated mind, a ripe experience, a still blooming fancy and a noble will. The text was written by Dr. Robert Eitelfeld, favorably known by the dramas "Henry IV," "Tristan and Isolde," "Appius Claudius," "Sophonisbe," the "Märchen von König Drosselbart," a collection of dramatized German popular fairy legends, and numerous ballads, romances, songs, &c. The cooperation of the poet and composer is of old date. Eitelfeld also wrote the text to Reinecke's "Belsazar."

The fortunes of Manfred, of the Hohenstaufen family have been the subject of a great historical monograph. Among others of a drama by Raupach. Undoubtedly the contest of his house as well as instantaneous one against the popes Innocent IV., Urban IV., and Clement IV., who sought the annihilation of the Hohenstaufen rule, contains high tragic interest. Robert is he liberty to rework traces of the last episode in the very eventful life of Manfred which came to a bloody termination in the battle of Benevento (1266), and within these limits he makes use of all allowable poetic license.

In the first act we are transported to the environs of Naples. It is night. The fishermen on the shore are preparing to haul in their nets. To these come one by one several of the nobles banished by Manfred, as well as nuns from a neighboring cloister, among whom is Clemenzia. Complaints about Manfred's government resound on all sides. Clemenzia, who joins in them, shows nevertheless, after the men have retired and she is alone with her sisters, in a conversation with one of them, that she never has seen Manfred really but only in a dream. Hence she betrays a sympathetic attraction toward Manfred which she vainly tries to overcome. The attraction is nothing but the spark of love which only needs the actual appearance of Manfred, to kindle into flame. But Manfred too, on his part, who has just appeared with his trusty Eckart and a Love Court of his glee, ladies and minstrels, a Serenade procession feels an equally mighty attraction toward Clemenzia. Surely he would now have and held her fast within his power but for the approach of a Cardinal with his train, who commences a conflict with a bad demand on Manfred to change his attitude towards Rome.

(Conclusion next time.)

Auber.

(From "Musical Recollections from," in the Berlin Echo.)*

The two Grand-Masters of Musical Art in Paris pursue a completely opposed mode of life. While Rossini enjoys his dolce far niente at a Olympian repose, Auber requires constant activity. The former avoids every kind of exertion which would wear out the machinery of his existence; the latter, on the contrary, seems to fear that indolence would cause the works to grow rusty and stop. Rossini, a refined symbol of the Italian dolce far niente, keeps at a distance the world, with all its enjoyments as well as all its onerous affairs, and nothing can surpass the repose of his life in town except that of his life at his country-house. Auber, who is the incorporation of French restlessness, would, on the contrary, die, were he not to come constantly into contact with society; even during the heat of summer, the bustle of Paris possesses a greater charm for him than the idyllic monotony of a rural life. Auber is 85 years old; we can not well suppose that at such an age his activity can be attended with any great advantage to art, but it is a rarely a phenomenon. The grey haired man at retires to bed at one o'clock in the morning and gets up regularly at five. A cup of tea for breakfast has to constitute all his nourishment till about seven in the evening, when he plays his part valiantly at a solid and set dinner. It is rarely that he can say at home later than nine o'clock in the "morning." He goes to the Conservatory, to the Senate, or to the Institute, lounges on the Boulevards, or takes a carriage-drive.

In his own house, Auber does not see so much company as Rossini, though his brilliant circumstances would render the duties of hospitality easy for him. Is this because he is not married? Yet there is an elegant and stately lady to whom people pay almost the honors due to the mistress of the house. The composer of Fra Diavolo also grew up in a feeling of admiration for the fair sex and is still susceptible to their charms, could not exist without having females about him. Auber receives comparatively fewer visits than Rossini. It is not every one who possesses the bravery and the courage to visit a celebrated man before eight o'clock in the morning, especially as he is guarded by his household with fearful watchfulness. The hero of the Amorous episode of forty-days, is a tried like old housekeeper who has guarded the composer's street door in the Rue St. Georges for the last forty years, by word and deed. This celebrated female demon looks upon every visitor applied for her master as a personal insult to herself and is capable of hurling, with outstretched arms, the affrighted stranger into the road.

Fortunately I enjoyed, in the course of four months, plenty of opportunities for closely observing Auber in his social character as well as his character as an artist and a man of business. It was near the termination of the Italian operatic season. Adelina Patti, who, in her elegant residence of the Avenue des Champs Elysées, all not be disturbed in a life as she did, in 1860 in the Klostergasse, Vienna gave her supposed secret provocations to words. According to the custom of Paris and London, the evening party was preceded by a dinner offered to a more restricted circle of friends. Besides some Italian friends in the house, and friends of the hostess, Bagier, the manager of the Italian Opera, M. de Thal, Russian Councillor of State, Gustave Doré the painter, and the famous horn-player Vivier occupied places at the table. Vivier's presence is a well-known guarantee for good-humor. Vivier enjoys everywhere the greatest popularity as an amusing composer of verbal jokes, and teller of anecdotes. A genuine original to-day, the lion of a drawing-room; to-morrow a "Bohemian," he is as much at home at the most smoke-begrimed public-house frequented by artists, as in the saloons of the Emperor Napoleon. A German speech made by him towards the end of dinner, brought back vividly to my mind the similar talent of Alex. Baumann. Vivier, whose entire stock of German was limited to the words "meine Herren," arose with a glass of champagne in his hand, and, with a gravity that equalled his heavens, began pouring forth a flood of nonsense, which no one understood but which every one supposed to be German. The guttural sounds, too, of German speechifiers on festive occasions were imitated with consummate comicality. The general feeling was worked up to such a pitch of hilarity that every fresh joke fell upon good ground. Such, for instance, was the case with the proposal to drive off at once (in the darkness of the night) to Doré's studio, for the purpose of seeing his new picture, The Gaming Table at Homburg. Two fiacres were quickly engaged, and we drove off to the studio which was situated close by in the Rue Bayard. The colossal genre picture in question, with nearly one hundred figures life-size, which was destined to be, some weeks later, the principal attraction in the Fine Art Exhibition, was standing, still unfinished, in utter darkness. It was rather funny to see Doré, with a lamp in his hand, mount the scaffolding and light up the picture from the right, while his colour-grinder, perched upon a ladder, illuminated the left side. Doré, whose clever illustrations of Don Quixote, Bernardakis, and Dante's Divina Commedia have long been known in Germany, is a neat young man, with very prepossessing features and manners, one of those genuinely French artistic beings who combine the fullest enjoyment of life with the most astonishing industry. He urged us to leave as soon as possible the half-dark area of his studio and return to the brilliantly lighted [illegible]. [illegible] already [illegible] [illegible] throng of beautiful women, popular artists and diplomatists [illegible] the orders. The celebrated vocalist [illegible] had just entered with her three daughters, young girls [illegible] [illegible], with dark tresses, and eyes beaming with [illegible]. They seated themselves near that dark [illegible] tenor, Carlotta Patti and Maria Kurtz, the Carmen [illegible], The Marquis de Caux, one of the stars in the world of fashionable young Parisians, had as leader of the cotillon just clapped his hands several times, when there was suddenly perceptible a slight movement at the door towards which all eyes were turned, and a little old gentleman edged through the rows of guests who respectfully made way for him. The young [illegible] of the house, with all the natural grace peculiar to her [illegible] to meet him. The latest of all her guests, [illegible] patent leather boots, and a blue [illegible], with the rosette of the Legion of Honour in his button-hole and his opera hat under his arm, was Auber. Having greeted, with great politeness, the members of the family, he stood looking at the dancing a little. By [illegible] [illegible] several short conversations, right and left, till two handsome women compelled the gallant maestro to seat himself near them on the sofa.

That a man of the age of eighty-five can make up his mind, more [illegible] to [illegible] about two o'clock in the morning, to [illegible] somewhat [illegible] and [illegible] himself [illegible] in the presence and bustle of a large party—this is something that reminds me more of La Muette di Portici. The papers may well continue to honour him with the stereotyped nicknames of "ever-blooming youth," "youthful patriarch," and so on, only the reader must not suppose from these expressions that there is [illegible] or undue desire to please about the composer. Such a supposition would be an act of deep injustice. No one can behave with greater [illegible] and [illegible] than Auber. The [illegible] jokes, and the ever playful humour of Rossini, are quite foreign to him, and even still more so the [illegible] and company of [illegible] young men like A. W. Schlegel. His sharp glance, shooting out from beneath his thick eyebrows, as though [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to Auber's countenance. Just as Rossini is open and loquacious, Auber is close, chary of his words, and formal. He is seldom seen to smile, except perhaps, when conversing with children. He turns the brilliant society [illegible] full scope this season. I saw him present [illegible] at the stage [illegible] given by the Emperor, [illegible] Marshall Vaillant and by the ministers, MM. Rouher and Forcade, at the distribution of prizes of the Exposition, and [illegible] over and over again at the Opera. He seldom was absent from the Italiens, whenever Adelina Patti sang, for he considers her the first living operatic singer. He used to be seen in the second row of stalls applauding enthusiastically, for her farewell benefit he ordered a splendid nosegay from Nice. When one of his own operas is performed, he never appears in the front of the house, but is fond of going behind the scenes. I met him there among the "habitués of Paris," during a miserable performance of La Muette which must have occasioned melancholy comparisons in his mind. But even he himself, the composer of this charming opera, gave at times to be seen the ravages of time. Some new grand ballet music composed by him for the Market-scene in the third act, was exceedingly weak and commonplace that it absolutely required a strong effort to believe that Auber was the composer of [illegible]. The prettiest, though still nothing very great, is a little simple andante, which Auber composed for Adelina Patti, and which she is in the habit of introducing in Il Barbiere di Siviglia.

Auber was chairman of the jury appointed to decide on the merits of the Prize Cantatas and Hymns of Peace—not a chairman in the title only, like Rossini, but a really working one. It is true that he did not take part in the first rough task of playing through 800 cantatas and 400 hymns—the most inhuman barbarian would not have required him to do that—but he attended the last two long sessions, when the best of the compositions were performed. Unfortunately he did not utter a single syllable in the way of an opinion or a proposal, but confined himself to counting up the voting in the Parisian fashion and in [illegible] the result. Our preliminary labors already mentioned, were carried on next to Auber's study in the Conservatory. We could not get to it except through our room. We were thus able to observe him [illegible] the [illegible] of his activity day after day. Sometimes he is seen [illegible] [illegible] in a [illegible] or [illegible] classes, to hurry [illegible] forth [illegible] to the classes and [illegible] fiddlers, some [illegible] to confer with the teachers or officers of the establishment—in a word, he was indefatigable. Only those who know the large and complicated machine can have any notion of his duties, if only of a formal character, which it imposes on him. Auber was kind enough to take me to an examination of one of the classes. He sat at the [illegible] professor [illegible] great table, [illegible] [illegible] female pupils play their pieces, and after each piece entered his [illegible] in the great book.

One of the few occasions I ever heard Auber express on his art afforded evidence of his having studied, and of his esteeming [illegible] music. Gevaert had just informed him that he was preparing Gluck's Armide for the Grand Opera. Auber praised the selection of this work, which he prefers to Alceste and [illegible] noted [illegible] most prominent pieces of it. "But," he added with [illegible], "how much has the [illegible] of the book also, done! What verses, and what a tragedy! Gluck is to be envied for such librettos!" Is not the praise bestowed on the author of the book—Quinault—this everlasting [illegible] of a libretto a hundred years old characteristic of a French composer?

One morning that I arrived somewhat too early at the Conservatory, I found Auber in his room seated at the small table-formed piano which, if I am not mistaken, once belonged to his predecessor Cherubini. Auber has very frequently composed on this instrument during the last twenty years, on this occasion, also it served him as a laboratory for producing a new opera, which is to be completed next winter. "Cannot reproduce these now [illegible]"—the same words the [illegible] had used when speaking to me several years previously. The [illegible] duty of conductor [illegible] but difficult even then; but, on the last occasion, the words absolutely stuck in my throat. The melancholy rehearsal of Auber's last opera (Le Premier Jour de Bonheur), and its complete failure, checked not by a general feeling of respect to look like a triumph [illegible] [illegible] any hope of the new score. But the ancient [illegible], and [illegible] of work possessed by the venerable composer who, though even [illegible] [illegible] and beards, stoutly continues to produce [illegible] [illegible]. I contemplated silently only the little old [illegible] man, [illegible], glancing at the [illegible] [illegible], he got up and shut the piano. What times have passed over that white head! As a boy, Auber often saw Louis XVI., whose carriage his father painted and gilded. His first romances, written when he was twelve years old, were sung by gay ladies of the Directory in the salons of Barras. His first little opera was played by a company of amateurs at Duprez's in Paris, sixty-two years ago. He then went to a banker's in London to study commerce, but, soon tired of the experiment, returned to Paris, and resolved to re-commence his musical studies under Cherubini. His first two operas in the Théatre Feydeau were failures. In after-years, Adolphe Adam, the composer of Le Postillon de Longjumeau, begged Auber for the scores. "What, in the name of Heaven, do you want with them?" asked Auber. "They are miserable attempts!"—"All the better," replied Adam; "I will show them to my pupils, whenever the latter feel desponding."

With the greatest delight have I again heard here in Paris La Muette and Fra Diavolo. In forty years they have lost nothing of their freshness and brilliancy. I felt happy at seeing him who created these works, and who, at his advanced age, still full of life, [illegible] listening on. His feet [illegible] young. Why does he care about the date of his baptismal certificate? "Poor Carafa, how old he is getting!" whispered Auber to me, as his younger colleague entered the room [illegible] the jury met. Auber is greatly attached, through a [illegible] [illegible] to life. He sometimes expresses his feeling on this point with a certain amount of humor. "Such a [illegible] [illegible] to make a [illegible] [illegible], the old opera composer," he [illegible] to a friend on returning from Meyerbeer's funeral ceremony. "It will be Rossini's turn next."

Dr. Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria.'

The first impression made upon most minds by the news that Sterndale Bennett had undertaken to write a work for the Birmingham Festival was one of unqualified pleasure. Wherever and whenever true [illegible] the [illegible] of English music, they speak of the Doctor. English [illegible] with a mixture of pride and disappointment—pride in the great [illegible] in the undying works he has given to art, disappointment that those works are so few and far between. The prospect of an addition to the number, therefore, was not only welcomed for itself, but accepted with a zest in proportion to its supposed rarity.

If such was the first impression, the next was one of doubt as to the merit of the selected subject. The story of the Samaritan woman seemed so barren of dramatic interest, so little likely to awaken sympathy [illegible] so [illegible] such small scope for musical treatment, that the composer's warmest admirers might well have been excused for doubting the result of his effort. This they would have done beyond question, had they foreseen the plan upon which the book is constructed. Nothing could well have seemed simple as [illegible] of [illegible]. Had the libretto, as planned in [illegible], have taken [illegible] with the narrative either by vague lines and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], or by the introduction of characters not found in the sacred [illegible]. In either case he would have lost [illegible] by precedent [illegible] [illegible] from a musical point of view would have appeared more encouraging. But [illegible] [illegible] had nothing of the sort. He simply took the words of the Evangelist John just as he found them, making with the [illegible] verse of the fourth chapter, incorporated the whole narrative (a short passage excepted) down to verse 42. Here and [illegible], however, he has interpolated words from other parts of Scripture, and, in one place, three verses of John Keble's famous hymn "Abide with me," [illegible] [illegible] appear somewhat incongruous, but under the circumstances no one would wish them away. From this it is easy to see how much the success of the work depended upon Dr. Bennett's music.

In point of construction the Woman of Samaria follows accepted models. That is to say, the comments [illegible] [illegible] incidents as occur are made by the chorus, [illegible] the narrative passages are so divided as closely to [illegible] the several characters. Thus the words of the Lord are given to the bass voice, those of the woman to the soprano, and the connecting sentences of the evangelist are allotted to the [illegible]. As much of [illegible] [illegible] is secured by this arrangement as circumstances made possible.

[illegible] Google

The "numbers" in the work are twenty-one. Of [illegible] as in the chorus there are regularly constructed airs [for soprano, contralto, and tenor respectively], and the rest consist very many of which [illegible] and recitation [illegible] a careful [illegible] to have a special importance. [illegible] "number" [illegible] of notice, but I must content myself with a reference only to the chief among the twenty-one.

The "Introduction and Chorale" gives a fair [illegible] of what is to follow. The former opens with an andante [illegible] A minor, [illegible] leading to a [illegible] allegretto in the same key, one being plaintive, the other agitated and impassioned, and both full of character. A point on the dominant of C major at length introduces the chorale (the subject of the allegretto still going on) for voices in unison. This chorale—which is the one known as "Luther's Hymn"—by a clever use of syncopation has the effect of being sung in common time against the triple measure of the orchestra. That effect is in the highest degree striking, and not being at all confused. As given on Wednesday at Birmingham the melody stood out in massive grandeur against the [illegible] ground, while the composer's art is [illegible] for it and the whole [illegible] everybody present in a way that was to come. At the close of the chorale the andante returns, [illegible] with the theme of the allegretto, and the "Introduction" [illegible] in the key of its opening. The [illegible] the [illegible] the sacred narrative with the words, "Then cometh Jesus to a city of Samaria," and is followed by a chorus—A major common time—"I am the Lord God of Israel," which is of larger proportions than usual. The [illegible] theme is [illegible] by the [illegible], then is [illegible] in harmony and with words taken up by the basses and a [illegible] Ending in the tonic key, the first part is followed by a striking episode, in C major, full of bold and massive [illegible]. The [illegible] of the leading theme, the repetition of the word "Blessed" is beautifully [illegible] and [illegible] at the end [illegible] through the chorus in pure [illegible] music of the highest order. The [illegible] of the woman is well told in recitative, the words of Jesus "He would have given thee living water," being followed by a short [illegible] andante [illegible] D major, common time—"For with Thee is the well of life." In this there is [illegible] a [illegible] tender [illegible] style which would have delight of the old Church musicians. The [illegible] is [illegible] agreeable. Another short recitative then introduces the soprano air [illegible] "Art thou greater than our father Jacob?" [illegible] of the work [illegible] through [illegible] well [illegible]. The expression [illegible] and by no means in keeping with what precedes and follows. The narrative goes on after this, with here and there a [illegible] in the point where Jesus tells the woman of her past wickedness. A passage from the psalms, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out and known me," is then interpolated, [illegible] This is one of the [illegible] of the work, and neither the present generation nor those to follow will [illegible] let it [illegible]. As a [illegible] melody [illegible] whether looked at for the beauty of its melody [illegible] or the depth of its [illegible], the thoroughly pure [illegible] has not been heard since "[illegible] is the Lord." Following the declaration that the Father is to be worshipped [illegible], comes a chorus in six parts—B flat common time—"Therefore they shall come and sing in the height of Zion." This is another gem. The [illegible] and [illegible] upon a [illegible] flowing theme is [illegible] and accompanied by the tenors and basses [illegible]. After [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] "For whom and for [illegible] they" [illegible] with fine effect. At this point the chorus [illegible] the remainder of the passage, "They shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint," [illegible] of much [illegible] beauty. All through this charming number the strings have a pleasant figure in accompaniment, which adds materially to the effect produced. The declaration of Jesus, "I that speak unto thee am He," [illegible] chorus—[illegible] common time—"Who is the Image of the Invisible God." The organ alone accompanies this, and [illegible] [illegible] therefore be imagined. That the chorus will find a welcome among lovers of true church music there can be no doubt, and its [illegible] within the reach of the most ordinary choir. The [illegible] next told of the woman's return to Sychar, and her testimony to her neighbors to come and see Jesus. Then follows a chorus—E flat, common time—"Come, O Israel, let us walk in none of light."

After a fashion which he seems to love, the composer announces the [illegible] then [illegible] and [illegible] repeating it [illegible] the words of full harmony. Contrasting with [illegible] is [illegible] of the words, "[illegible] darkness," [illegible] the idea of the [illegible] by [illegible]. The tenors then repeat the subject [illegible] of bold progression [illegible] chorus [illegible]. The arrival of the Samaritans at Sychar, [illegible] two days serve to introduce the dynes [illegible] Dr. Bennett has set the verses in [illegible] common time—for a duet for soprano and contralto, with a trio subject in the tenor and [illegible] a full chorus. He has evidently [illegible] to [illegible] the utmost simplicity with the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] he has succeeded. The "number" [illegible] as [illegible] the [illegible] Immediately [illegible] a chorus for five voices—[illegible] common time—"Now we believe." A fugal opening of [illegible] construction leads to an [illegible] passage [illegible] on the words, "This is indeed the Christ," and [illegible] is followed by a [illegible] of the first subject. But the [illegible] is most impressive of all. The [illegible] be [illegible] "This is indeed the Christ." In an [illegible] passage, which beginning on the chord of G minor [illegible] by degrees [illegible] that of C [illegible]. Then after a pause the voices add [illegible] on the dominant on the words "the Saviour of the world," and the final cadence is reached. The effect is [illegible] the highest degree. The tenor air, "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him," [illegible] and is [illegible] to that of the [illegible]. A [illegible] accompaniment for the [illegible] throughout and is remarkable for the [illegible] soloist. Following this solo comes the final chorus, "I will call upon the Lord and Blessed be the Lord God." The former is [illegible] by the combined themes of the Introduction, and is a vigorous piece [illegible] declamation. In [illegible] the latter, however, that we must look for an example of Dr. Bennett's power as a writer of oratorio music. This is a fugue in D major, with a very bold and well marked subject, which the most [illegible] one can readily distinguish [illegible] managed. [illegible] the [illegible] Dr. Bennett displays as well as an [illegible] he did [illegible] hold out by [illegible] inversion and [illegible] the fugue out with all the devices which he is evidently a master. But though he declined to do [illegible] he has [illegible] to a very great height, and I am given to a "proof that the race of contrapuntists is not yet quite [illegible]."—Mus. World.

Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" in Music.

(From the London Orchestra, Sept. [illegible])

The latest of two new works prepared for the Birmingham Festival enjoyed a better fate than its predecessor. Mr. John Francis Barnett, [illegible] the applause of Thursday night [illegible] famous. Hitherto known only among a [illegible] and [illegible] circle of musicians as a pianist of some [illegible] beyond that of the nephew of John Barnett, the composer of the "Mountain Sylph," he has had the gratification of seeing his merit widely acknowledged, of hearing his name mentioned with approval by thousands to whom it was previously unknown. He [illegible] the "Ancient Mariner" has [illegible] fame, and [illegible] The [illegible] and the [illegible] of the [illegible] were not [illegible] wrung from the mere [illegible] of an audience, but rather the [illegible] awakened by a genuine work. Nor were the [illegible] alone at their [illegible] band, [illegible] and [illegible] highly of Mr. Barnett's work. To begin with the [illegible] must be taken at the subject chosen by the composer for illustration. In the race for [illegible] suitable for musical setting, a musician is often hard pressed [illegible] to select a poem [illegible] a [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] choice. The [illegible] of Mr. Barnett [illegible] point of view [illegible] to his [illegible]. Certainly [illegible] of books and [illegible] the composer and [illegible] who [illegible] poetry [illegible] Mendelssohn's "Lays of Ancient Rome," Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," and Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis," [illegible] the view of [illegible] these to poetry. We should look to see "Horatius" [illegible] in the [illegible] chorus describes the oath of Lars Porsena, and the gathering of the [illegible] a chorus of [illegible] "Go forth, go forth, Lars Porsena, go forth, beloved of Heaven," the baritone [illegible] due and the soprano and [illegible] at such passages [illegible] in the [illegible] "I [illegible] as that of [illegible] and Hand." Not less unsuitable is Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," a poem as remote from musical purposes as can well be imagined. This objection being conceded, it may be cheerfully admitted that Mr. J. F. Barnett [illegible] done the best he could with an unsuitable subject. The poem is at once monotonous and [illegible] varied, monotonous in its form, in its rhythm, and varied in the splendid images [illegible] up and the pictures it presents. The monotony, so to speak, has been well broken up by Mr. Barnett; the different scenes have received adequate illustration from his hands. Naturally the [illegible] process required a good deal of labor and the [illegible] of the [illegible] of these [illegible]. One may mark how much the composer would have been relieved by a break of the matching lines [illegible] or by a lengthening of the [illegible] a [illegible] more suitable for recitative. But on the whole he has done wonderfully well. The portions of the poem will be best explained by the list of the movements, numbers both themes and of the artists who sang them.

It will thus be observed that the "Ancient Mariner" was sung by Mr. Santley,—with occasional [illegible] of his [illegible] by Mr. Sims Reeves, Mlle. Tietjens and Mme. Patey-Whytock, and the delicate [illegible] of their portions in the chorus; and that the [illegible] of the Wedding Guest were given by Mr. Sims Reeves. Of course all [illegible] of illusion is lost, when the Guest is made to tell the Ancient Mariner himself a portion of the Mariner's story, and narrate how wholly original) is the quartet "Their souls did from their bodies fly," which is commenced as has Mr. Barnett studied it for the briefness by its ending of the verse "O happy living things," is an andante was more, which was sung by Mr. Santley in a truly splendid manner and achieved undeserved encore. A pretty melody is that which follows, and prettily it was given by Mme. Patey-Whytock. "The upper air burst into life," is a number forcibly describing the [illegible] — a tenor chorus, followed by a twinkling and chorus for male voices. "The loud wind never" very effective the [illegible] elegant ly suggested by the words "Around, around, flew each sweet sound," of which the composer has formed a quartet in D the various descriptions of melody distributed by the part being appropriately voiced and interwoven. A duet for soprano and contralto, "Two voices in the air," was superbly sung and drew down an encore. No passages in the cantata are more judiciously treated than the whole of this [illegible] of the music, a dire air with arpeggios for the violins and violoncellos con sordini the effect is as well brought out as the conception is accurate. Among the tablet still numbers we have space only to render the solo and chorus "This seraph band," a lovely soprano song delightfully by Mlle. Tietjens. The work ends well. The quartet and chorus "O sweeter than the marriage feast," with its suggestions of the wedding, the [illegible] and the marriage bells, gives effect to [illegible] well-wanted bit of chorale, "He prayeth best who loveth best," with which, supplemented by the full effect of voices, band and organ, the cantata comes to an effective termination. The composer much abounding from the [illegible] ity I [illegible] throughout all the [illegible] of the story on the Mariner. A single beauty was sufficient to stamp this work as one of great merit. There is little peculiarity in it, but it is pleasant, melodious, and full of genuine inspiration. The talent with which the poem is musically treated is bad in Mr. Barnett's excuse for having selected it for this sort of embellishment at all.

Mr. Goldschmidt's "Ruth."

(From the Musical World.)

There is something in the sight of a man addressing himself to the great and difficult situations which calls forth our instinctive admiration. But there are after some other times with it we make and I not be undertaken without qualifications accorded only to a few. In the knightly days he who would do the deeds of knighthood was first required to show himself worthy. Those days are gone, but their spirit remains, and when a man, only in his cardinals on an organ, rides into the ring wanting golden spurs, we need not be doubtless and it so he has make a mistake, and his hearers respect if a youthful bard said to account "To his unknown [illegible] we can tolerate his mediocrity, but if he attempts an epic poem with out sufficient means we [illegible] him, and warn him not to do it again. So, too, is a musician making a modest appearance as a composer we bid him "God Speed"; but he has he comes before us with an oratorio which, weighed in the balance is found wanting, he neither deserves nor receives any mercy. The composition of an oratorio is one of the things requiring best not foremost a careful [illegible] of resources. He who would undertake it must feel within himself profound technical knowledge, large creative fertility, great power of invention and that kind of mental vision which not only sees the whole but the relation to it of each part, then by all means let him set about the task. But let it be ascertained with careful ponders, [illegible] upon the accuracy of his conclusion whether or not he is to be adjudged guilty of an impudent assumption. A mistake as this makes a lapse, for a success. Something depends, however, on the nature of the subject selected. For a man to attempt the illustration of the agonies and sufferings of the Messiah, or the tremendous plagues of Egypt, on the varied and stirring incidents in the life of Elijah is a different thing from essaying the same office for the simple story of Ruth the Moabitess. So far Herr Goldschmidt has shown himself modest. He might have addressed himself to the opening of the Seven Seals, or the Deluge, or the Fall of Man, while he was about it. In that he did not, he must be accredited with having gauged his power to a certain degree. The [illegible] of it is then he accomplished tolerably at all. Before he set pen to paper nobody thought him equal to such a task, and nobody, showed him for the want of power. Now the prospect is passed, and with it another law of property having relation to self knowledge, which is not so much a misfortune as a fault.

To make matters worse for Herr Goldschmidt, the subject he selected is not only easy of treatment compared with most others, but adapted so as I see most even his facts power a composer may possess. In a word simplicity, its perfect naturalness, and the touching pathos of many of its situations ask no ordinary sympathy, so that he who made it more needs realize every incident it contains. We all know the marvellous effect this has a [illegible], illustration, as devotional in any work of the sort with its continual [illegible] to bring a [illegible] to bear upon Looking at it thus it is hard to see how a musical setting of so beautiful a story could fail utterly, unless such a failure were actually courted. One would imagine that a composer has only to open his heart and mind to its influences, and, in order to set the thoughts it spontaneously inspires, in order to be it not profoundly learned, in least, simple, natural and pleading. Nobody supposes for a moment that Herr Goldschmidt courted failure, or that in writing his work he did not labor with zeal and conscientiousness. He has shown us, however, that lacking being unable to rise to the height of so great a [illegible], through some singular defect of organization, [illegible] a something which would help him on its upward path. Some composers fail because of their subject. Herr Goldschmidt has failed in spite of his. In other words the result is the same, but with a difference.

Looking over the new cantata (or "Sacred Pastoral" the composer likes it better) one is first impressed with the singularity of its construction. Ruth resembles nothing more than a piece of mosaic, or rather a Dutch chequer piece, in which each piece is a different story and has no connection with its neighbour except that of [illegible]. The mere poetry and fragmentary character is fixed in the libretto, which is divided into a succession of short "Idylls." Loaded "At Bethlehem," "In the Harvest Field," "At the Threshing Floor," &c. In this case, however, there is a necessity for such a before, which would have suggested to a judicious composer the [illegible] of providing a remedy, so far as possible, by the more symmetrical construction of his music. Instead of doing so he labours upon Herr Goldschmidt had been in the opposite direction; and the whole work is a mass of undeveloped and unconnected thoughts which fail upon the ear much like the snatches of conversation among the passersby in a crowded street. Now in a simple question like that of Naomi, "Who art thou, my daughter?" does a talkative choral passage not "germane to the matter" in the slightest degree, and next comes the answer almost every sentence of which the school [illegible] are the almost captured fashion of church psalmody. How any possibly musicians still more become as one needs to be told, and if necessary to point out how fixed in earnest was the inability even to sketch the outlines of an oratorio of which it is the sign and result.

One of the twenty-eight "numbers" in this work, ten are recitatives, many of them very long. The composer's treatment of these monotonous becomes, therefore, an importance as not having a formidable influence upon the character of the whole. It is to be regretted that he had not adhered to the "orchestral [illegible]" so well marked out by the masters of his art, who [illegible] it rare in interest, were evidently a [illegible] for the simplest means for the [illegible] of narrative. Our such one called for by the composition of the same [illegible] in [illegible] the breath that connects the various parts together, and its elaboration is both a [illegible] and sin of plan. For some reason or other Herr Goldschmidt has failed to recognize this fact. He has throughout attempted to achieve the narrative portion with [illegible] with a musical interest they cannot possibly bear, and which the thing [illegible] of ideas becomes positively [illegible]. In doing so he has not been content as it when [illegible] "accompanied recitatives." He has in these expanded it into a kind of descriptive symphony for the orchestra the voice being [illegible] that of a showman to tell what is meant to be described. Even if this were well done, its effect would be open to question, for means not necessary to such [illegible] is the present instance this been done badly. Some of Herr Goldschmidt's many recitatives have no meaning at all and others convey, after a [illegible] with the [illegible] may be found. Take for example [illegible], where he [illegible] takes part in a procession of the day, [illegible] the [illegible] of Hannel. I [illegible] this passage which appeared to need more, about as much as it was the multiplication table. Herr Goldschmidt has lavished an amount of orchestral [illegible] which would have been far better employed of the whole. As a rule however his [illegible] [illegible] of chords signifying nothing; they [illegible] much in the shape of [illegible]. After the Ruth we have given through [illegible] elegant, musical [illegible] it should [illegible] even as these we owe to Handel and Dr. Marx [illegible] at least in treating so sincerely, how greater sometimes struggles unavailingly against [illegible] incubus.

Closely allied to his treatment of recitatives is Herr Goldschmidt's peculiar management of the orchestra throughout the work. In other cases he has set accompanied, [illegible] as his voice, such a result disappointing only in [illegible] himself. As used by the great masters it is, of course, the orchestra is made [illegible] subordinate to the voices, and looked upon as an accessory [illegible] to sustain and enrich the vocal parts, as well as to color the effects produced. This may be done in different ways and in varying degrees, but in no single case must it be said that the thing is [illegible] than the [illegible] from the equal have been exceeded. Even in the Creation of all instances he was where the orchestra is more important, in [illegible], are though it must be said that no such result was only made possible by the consummate [illegible] and judgment of the composer. Herr Goldschmidt has chosen to violate this rule. He has attempted to good his orchestra into a position of equality with, if not of superiority to the vocal music, and has done by spoiled his work for several good and sufficient reasons. In the first place by the bold [illegible] and independent action of the instruments he has not only left the voices in great part unconcerned, but has puzzled and [illegible] what might have been assistance into an obstacle. The audience on strengths left to have been likely to notice in so many measures as a chorus of [illegible] four voices in as very many movements, and in distracting the attention of the [illegible] hinders them in their work. The result is that there is [illegible] to spread the instruments and voices an [illegible] as the one in how [illegible] sense well. It is only this [illegible] at the general character of the one to [illegible] one of [illegible] in other. The first one, he [illegible] to [illegible] Herr Goldschmidt, but it will a [illegible] of [illegible] there also may, that is hear his composition. Again the orchestra made has [illegible] and [illegible] given a [illegible] by reason of the different [illegible] has to [illegible]. It is curious to [illegible] in a [illegible] Herr Goldschmidt has [illegible] difficulties. He is [illegible] who, having to find a [illegible] and desperate art, with the certainty of being in school [illegible]. An orchestral [illegible] of the Ruth is the most [illegible] of its kind because the increasing use of its orchestra [illegible] of [illegible] of descriptive with a feet [illegible] of them that gives only to a very few. Among those very few is not Herr Goldschmidt. The preludes and interludes which form so large a part of the work are remarkable in spite of here and there a striking passage for a [illegible], and a poverty of ideas which make them very [illegible] a [illegible] of the composer's self [illegible]. [illegible] and such a very rarely appears. The orchestra of the Crystal Palace [illegible] a piece that may [illegible] it quite would be equally well into a hundred different places. At [illegible] same fashion though an [illegible] the same symphonical [illegible], Herr Goldschmidt's orchestral passages might be arranged anyhow and anyhow would be equally bad.

I should like after a little necessary fault-finding to be able to praise the vocal music of Ruth [illegible]. But Herr Goldschmidt has barred the door against any such satisfaction. He has adopted with [illegible] meaning be cry of poor [illegible] "[illegible] be here and [illegible] shall help me." Surely if he could not be other than fragmentary and incoherent — he would use [illegible] the [illegible] as I have shown he has treated [illegible] in his [illegible] a vocal phrases of his should be [illegible] and [illegible]. We were none of us disposed to be exacting on this matter. Nobody asked for the [illegible] of Mozart, the [illegible] of Handel or the flowing grace of Haydn. But [illegible] kind was expected. [illegible] we should again have to learn how Handel [illegible] the expected coming. There is hardly a single theme in Ruth which is [illegible] upon the ear and one would like to recall in the memory. This is the most fatal blot of all. Melody is the soul of music. There may be [illegible] everything else — [illegible] scholarship, great [illegible] [illegible] — but without melody it is no more than a [illegible] body [illegible] life. [illegible] have a [illegible] and [illegible] to defeated. [illegible] and [illegible] Herr Goldschmidt's [illegible] no [illegible] for his Ruth is an [illegible] corpse.

But besides all this, and to take a lower view, the new oratorio is wanting in proofs of scholarship. Though it [illegible] abundance, and much [illegible] taking [illegible] the more [illegible] workmen can do [illegible] parts. Having [illegible] as [illegible] possible. Herr Goldschmidt [illegible] have [illegible] how to [illegible] them up. All [illegible] ment, mastery [illegible], there is little or none in the work. Of [illegible] in [illegible] them in piece has repetition affords a poor and very reliable to the power to present the same thought in ever-varying, always interesting forms. An example of contrapuntal skill, the two or three fugal choruses in Bach are of a very inferior order, resembling nothing so much as the exercises of a student endowed with poor abilities, or afflicted with an indifferent [illegible].

[illegible] has been said and detailed analysis of [illegible], because, in the first place, I [illegible] to repeat myself, and next, as Bach [illegible] to be heard again, the result in the nearest [illegible] would be trouble and loss time. The [illegible] remarks have been made, not [illegible] demanded by the importance of the [illegible] as [illegible]. [illegible] have a habit of smiling doubt [illegible] encourage the motive. [illegible] no object in view I have refrained [illegible] lengthy notice.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

III.

In his church compositions Bach has [illegible] forms which are peculiar to [illegible]. Not only does the [illegible] the [illegible] the subject, but he knows [illegible] how to introduce a specialized organ feature [illegible] the reversed forms by putting [illegible] relations with the subject, [illegible]. Without [illegible] the deeper Bach appears in his formal combinations, the more certain we may be that behind the musical expression lies concealed an equally surpassing thought. To enter into the meaning of the words poetical [illegible] way to solve the riddle.

He can, who can accustom himself to this way of looking at the matter will see [illegible] interpretation which we have suggested of the last Air and Chorus [illegible] words [illegible] the clearest confirmation. To be sure, most "temperate" interpretation "such as are often made in the case of instrumental works, are very much at the mark and are apt to run into the most contradictory views: one, for instance, seeing in Beethoven's A major Symphony the description of a merry wedding among peasants, while another deems it the greatest tragedy since King Lear! But in musical works of Art founded on a definite verbal text the case is different, and an [illegible] not only need no [illegible], but are sometimes even necessary. The word gives a distinct direction and meaning to the [illegible] against arbitrary [illegible] and will receive [illegible] than is possible in purely instrumental works.

But to come back to the Magnificat!

3. To the wild unrest of the number just [illegible] there [illegible] succeeds, a splendid contrast, a Bass Solo (in A major, 4-4 measure), with the words: "Quia fecit mihi magna, qui potens est, et sanctum nomen ejus" (For He that is mighty hath done to me great things, and holy is his name). Here [illegible] breathes a warm and heart-felt thankfulness for the great things which the Lord hath done to us, and praises his holy name. The economy of this Aria is really admirable and could hardly be surpassed. A characteristic and expressive motive of the basso continuo, forming four measures, repeats itself continually in the most different positions and intervals through the whole movement. First it diverges to the Dominant key, from which, by a gentle transition, it reaches the parallel key, F sharp minor. Then we are led into the Mediant, from which the Tonic springs again as if new-born. The voice part takes its material partly from this theme, partly it moves, calmly and full of dignity, in free and independent figures, [illegible] like the smoke of a thank-offering. The noble form of [illegible] given us the desired opportunity of here inserting some remarks about the style and character of Bach's vocal melody.

It is a little prevalent notion, that Bach treats the voice pretty much [illegible] instrumental manner; he was eminently an organ player and has carried the customary organ style over into vocal composition," we often hear it asserted. Surely it is rather [illegible] the very nature of the case, it requires a great artist, capable of such [illegible], moreover, a proof of fact, as master's manner of proceeding, is in direct contradiction to so thoughtless an assumption. When Bach composes for the organ he does not write for the piano-forte, and so [illegible]. His way of treating the violin, the violoncello, the oboe, the flute, in short, all the rest of the instruments, is so characteristic and so masterly that no one now-a-days can seriously think of undertaking to surpass him. To be sure he often taxes the [illegible] to the utmost [illegible] demands of [illegible] what is impossible to execute [illegible] the most accurately the technical peculiarities of the instruments, but he had penetrated [illegible] deeper into the very [illegible] of Bach. Whether [illegible] competent [illegible] such as Joachim, who actually maintains that Bach was far before his age in all that he has offered for the violin [illegible] prepared both in thought and practice, all the possibilities of later technical developments. Now [illegible] supposed that he was less well acquainted with the nature of that material for which he wrote the most extreme things [illegible] and conceived the human voice—for that, too, is an instrument in its way—and that he used it more [illegible] as if it were something comparatively [illegible]? The principal hindrance which the singer meets in Bach's [illegible] the traditional method of singing. Bach's vocal writing rests upon the ground of the old German music, which [illegible] early period attached more importance to the words [illegible] to make them the precise basis [illegible] melody. In [illegible] the contrast of the German and the Italian school in this sense is clearly set aside.

4. The next number of the Magnificat brings us a Duet between the Alto and the Tenor [illegible], 12-8 measure, to the words: "Et misericordia a progenie in progenies timentibus eum" (And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation). Here again Bach shows himself a deep interpreter of the words of the text with a fine knowledge of the human heart. The tender mercy of the Lord [illegible] on those who fear him in a [illegible] or masterly outlines. The voices are supported by the string quartet—the violins and violas muted, the former doubled by the flutes. In this duplication the violins and flutes exchange their brilliant and sober tone-colors, as if Bach meant to indicate the at once elevating and soothing influence of the divine mercy on the heart that turns toward it. At the words: "timentibus eum," the instruments are entirely silent and leave the accompaniment to the Organ. The concluding turn of the voice parts is startlingly effective through the astonishing boldness of the modulation.

5. The following Chorus forms a grand contrast to the mild Duet. Its far-reaching powerful main theme majestically enters [illegible] compass of an octave and a half first brings the words "Fecit potentiam" (He hath showed strength). Against this "potentia," spreading itself in all directions, full, truly mobile, Bach [illegible] sets [illegible] the words "in brachio suo" (with his arm), which seems to embody an opposite and yet kindred element. A compressed force, self-poised yet tensely strained. The main theme, entering first in the Tenor, is attended from the outset by smart rhythmical blows of the other voice parts, with which the orchestra—but [illegible] trumpets and drums—[illegible] tive beats. Then the Alto [illegible] while the Tenor develops the counter-motive "in brachio suo," and the other vocal and orchestral parts continue their strongly rhythmical movement. The theme is next handed over to the Second Soprano, then to the Bass, afterwards to the First Soprano, and finally to the orchestra. The voices, however, which have already [illegible] from that rhythmical figure more and more as the orchestra [illegible] takes an ever freer attitude in the richest contrapuntal forms, so that shortly before the entrance of the main motive in the orchestra they [illegible] all engaged in fully independent motion. Meanwhile new accessory motives have introduced themselves on the word "dispersit" (he hath scattered), symbolizing it in pictorial forms. The Continuo, for its part, supports this wonderful structure in rhythms proper to itself and admirably corresponding to the character of the whole. At last one of the accessory motives of the "dispersit" remains alone upon the field and exultantly throws out [illegible] shrill shout broken short off the word that completes its sense: "superbos" (the proud).

And here occurs a case which for the first time gives us occasion to express a modest doubt as to whether Bach has done the best thing. The text of the Vulgate gives the words "dispersit superbos mente cordis sui" (He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts) as if they belonged together, and therein follows the Greek original. Bach on the contrary separates them in the most violent manner, breaking short off at the word "superbos" and, after a long pause, setting against it, in a solemn Adagio, the words "mente cordis sui." But perhaps the master was misled by the not precisely classical Latin, into referring "sui" not to "superbos" but to God. In that case he might possibly have attached to the whole passage the meaning: "He hath scattered the proud—with the breath of his mouth." Construing the text in this way, the musical course of the sentence is now fully justified and of perfect beauty. If this explanation does not satisfy, there would scarcely seem to remain any other, save to ascribe to Bach the bad taste of having wished to glorify "the proud" by the most mighty and sublime means of expression. We do not them to be at all competent to tackle the question, and gladly leave it to abler hands.

4. The chorus is succeeded by a Tenor Solo, in F-sharp minor 3-4 measure which in its sorrowful flatness shows a marked feeling. It treats the text: "Deposuit potentes de sede et exaltavit humiles" (He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.) Here too Herr has not allowed the obvious [illegible] to escape him, and has known how to present them energetically and characteristically enough.

Music in Boston.

Our season begins a little sooner and so much addressed to Boston, as to the Western country and the world at large. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, whose sphere has ever been the quiet one of classical Chamber Music, being now in the era of a Western tour of some three months, will "inaugurate" their 19th Season on Monday evening with a concert in the great Music Hall. To their friends here this concert means Good-bye for a while, Auf Wiedersehen! What is "inaugurate" in the aforesaid Western tour? It is as if the Thunder (four little earnest, unsensational Quintette Club up there among the brighter but not severer stars) should "inaugurate" that midsummer torch-season by inadvertence up from that sphere to rescue them! the sweet soul-secrets and concerts! We wish them true success, and that they may leave good seeds of the true as they will, —what is it to any leap-ring memories! to the best Music of trials which they have been accustomed so long to interpret here.

The concert in the Music Hall, large as the place is, and better suited for an Orchestra, promises to be a really good one. Besides the Club itself, consisting of Messrs. W. H. SCHULTZE, CARL MEISEL, THOMAS RYAN, H. M. HEINDL (a new member) and WULF FRIES, other good artists will take part, namely Mr. C. PETERSILEA the pianist, Messrs. De Ribas oboe, ELTZ bassoon, HEINDL horn, and STEIN double-bass; and a Quartet of singers, Mrs. H. M. SMITH, Miss RYAN, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY and Dr. M. W. WHITNEY. The programme is rich and for the most part classical. It contains two large works: the Nonetto by Spohr, and the seventeen Septet by Hummel (Mr. Petersilea at the piano). The Quartet: the canon from Fidelio and a couple of Mendelssohn Quartets are completely vocal pieces surely and still fresh. The two ladies will sing solos by Meyerbeer and Schubert, and Mr. Fries will play a 'cello and Mr. Heindl a flute solo.—The Club will return before New Year and then we trust we shall have new classical Quartets, Quintets and Trios in the Chickering "Chamber" as of old.

The Harvard SYMPHONY CONCERTS will begin on Thursday afternoon Nov. 21, at half past three o'clock. They will soon be formally announced. Meanwhile we may say that they will be of the same general character as before, presenting only the best in Symphony, Overture Concerto, &c.; except that the space hitherto occupied in each concert (often the larger half) by the Piano will be more limited, and the vocal element called in oftener for variety. The Orchestra, in spite of the absence of the Quintette Club in the first part of the season, bids fair to be larger and better than ever before. In certain parts it will be, and the string department considerably strengthened, if dispatch of season delays warrants us hope as ending.

The PAREPA ROSA concert troupe (under Mr. Harrison's management), composed of nearly the same elements as before, will visit Boston early in November. There is a chance too that THEODORE THOMAS and his Orchestra from New York, may give a few concerts in our Music Hall in the latter part of October. The more the merrier, if they will play good Symphonies, and for these best, as they have according by them.

The Great Organ is still played every Wednesday and Saturday noon, and occasionally on Sunday evenings. There have also been some more first programmes of late, particularly from of Mr. Paine, from Philadelphia, and of Mr. J. K. Paine. All our best organists take turns in hibernate.—Other movements are not yet developed. We may count it certain that the Handel and Haydn Society will move heavily through its reserve; that the pleasant Wednesday Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union will come along in due time—we hope there will be many of them this last year; and that the various classical Chamber and Piano Matinées and Soirées will be as numerous and more choice than before. For one novelty Mr. Kreissmann has an idea of bringing out Schubert's very remarkable "Omlan" songs,—a capital idea, which we heartily advise him to put into deed.

CONCERT IN MILTON. The Choir of the Unitarian Church (Dr. Morison's) under the spur of a zealous Rector in the person of the genial Colonel of the Governor's Cadets, Dr. C. C. Holmes, and aided by an energetic staff of musically cultivated ladies, has made the abounding Blue Hill suburb worthy by famous hereabouts of late. But that amateur concert (or professional either) has seldom occurred in a "country meeting house" as that of Saturday afternoon, Sept. 21. It was remarkable in the character of the audience largely composed of refined persons, thronging in over all the roads from pleasant neighbouring towns and from the city. The musical assemblage of fine cultivated voices (mostly amateurs) and the well selected programme were not the whole attraction. There was a fine new Organ, built by Hook, to help defray the cost of which was one motive of the concert. Under the skillful hands of Mr. Wilcox it furnished the accompaniments and very sweet, rich, organ-like in the best sense instances of well contrasted colors proved. Three fine excellent sopranos beside Bronx, alto, Mr. two fine tenors a thoroughly schooled basso. Howlett he also the very select choir, and Wulf Fries's cello completed the following selection with admirable effect throughout:

Introduction. Organ	Wilcox.
Trio. From the Mass	Haydn.
Jerusalem. Thou that killest, &c.	St. Paul.
I will Magnify Thee. Trio	Rosenthal.
Jerusalem. Tenor	Gounod.
Lord have Mercy	Pergolesi.
Mores a Gayr. Duet.	Handel.
Recitative: Again the Lord Dread. [illegible]	[illegible]
Ave Maria	Schubert.
Cello Mondo	Mendelssohn.
Duo
My Heart ever Faithful	Bach.
Trio	Curschmann.
Prayer from Der Freyschütz	Weber.
Part Song	Hatton.

The "Jerusalem," air, the rapturous Bach song ("Faithful, mein Herz") the solo in the Inflammatus and other important passages, were sung by a young lady from the South, who has been spending a year in Boston, whose voice and good here mentioned in these columns. Her promise thus has yet sprung up among us. Sweet, rich, large, thoroughly musical and sympathetic, that voice is also of great compass. While the whole nature is truly and womanly musical. We had hoped more from her in the coming season for our Oratorio and higher concert music; but she is not to be so easily sung and we have lost her. We do not feel she shall be a name here until love the other the possession of mind. Lighter solos who sang "Angels ever bright and fair," the Prayer from Freyschütz, the Ave Maria &c. Mr. Wetherbee gave a song by Pergolesi with artistic life and true expression. Mr. Langmaid put fine spirit and was admirable in the Mendelssohn duet. The fine Trio, with cello obligato, and Hatton's "Spring Song" (so seldom heard of late) was beautifully sung by a young tenor undergraduate at Harvard. We wish we had room to speak of more. It was all good.

New Glees.

THE GLEE-SINGING: A New Glee Book by L. O. EMERSON. Boston: O. Ditson & Co., 1868. pp. 200.

The American musical mind has a wonderful leaning to grave verse. The first efforts of composers are devoted to the production of some new book of this sort whose chief glory it is to be so very like some already existing model as to be out of the recall of adverse criticism. The tremendous volume of tall psalm tune deluge, that has poured upon us within the last thirty years in many long Gothic in countryside. Tunes in every conceivable style, and no style whatever else before. Tunes pretty, tunes ugly. Tunes high, and tunes low. Tunes in flats, tunes in sharps. Tunes strong—tunes weak. The Lord's how preponderant!

And then consider the use which these tunes serve. Although all nominally "sacred," scarcely one in ten was ever sung in church. They are really used as singing-school glees. Glees they really are, most of them, despite the "sacred" words.

And the Anthems. What an amount is there for some one to settle! Or all the trembling composers has contrived as many to render up their account? Who can tell! Each weary page of musical platitudes as we have had to wade through! Accordingly to the well-known theological formula the "strength" of these works is "perfect weakness." And yet, despite this mediocre of Bat, we have become stronger. Taking the various church collections as a whole, we see that the recent works manifest an improvement over their predecessors, both in manner and in technical execution. The only advancement, if there has been, consists in an improved taste, namely of the religious conventions of the earlier authors. And this is unavoidable; for as one there is mercy in [illegible] books. The conventions of the present is a purer any conventions, not a religious.

Another good sign of the present state of taste is the greater attention given to Glees. Twenty years ago the singing of glees was almost unheard of in New England. A little later the English glees began to be sung, under the auspices of Dr. Mason and Mr. Geo. J. Webb. But who writes easily will glees were these! In point of figure to sing one of these glees was to do more mischief than to any High Mass. Good to be sure. But improper! After a while however Americans began to be manufactured,—and some, compose.

The dollar fee under which these early writers labored went no slight. Some of them had no knowledge of counterpoint or musical form, save what little they had got by "cross-contemplation." Yet they did as well as could be: a period;—perhaps, better.

The American Glee has generally been one of two things. Either a sprightly melody so harmonised that the accompanying voices do nothing but accompany; or a very blind and uneven imitation of Mendelssohn's Part Songs, a ort now valuable kind of glees. The kind first mentioned is poor stuff. The efforts to be mirrored on that feature went want out. Some of the parts have anyone work, save the soprano. The glees of the second class have suffered most of all from the ignorance of their composers. Mendelssohn's Part Songs were composed by one thoroughly versed in all the resources afforded by simple and double counterpoint but we [illegible] logic. To him also, the various musical forms were well known and he knew just how to employ each one, as to what he use to suit the purpose required. Will our composers in general there has been no such knowledge. Thus too he had genius, which we have not yet.

In the work before us there are a fine many Glees. All of these are new except perhaps five which are European. Of these new ones Mr. Emerson claims 48, and Mr. E. H. Southard 35. The remaining 13 are from miscellaneous sources. It has been a great pleasure to the writer to examine this book, and it must be a still greater pleasure to see it: for the work is, in general, good. Mr. Emerson has a good number of popular, easy pieces, and quite a number of still more beautiful ones in a somewhat German style. Mr Southard is well known as a thorough master of musical composition,—a man who knows how to express his melodic ideas; he is also known as a composer, facile in ideas, fresh in invention. The present works from his pen are beautiful, and fully sustain his reputation. Young students in this kind of musical structure are pointed, with pleasure, to the tasteful form of the more extended of these glees. It is worthy of study to see how nicely the entities are preserved in the period relations, no less than how well each voice is kept occupied with something — fully pertinent to the subject in hand.

We cordially welcome the entrance of the "Greeting" upon their success. W. S. B. M.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK unfolds a programme for this winter long as Leporello's Catalogue,—and as almost everything seems to be here in the hands of one man, the impresario Harrison, we present we are not capable [illegible] the same spirit of [illegible] these out quests. Not only has he captured the Parepa Rosa couple with all their party who have already "completely incorporated" (advertising critics, invariably sumptuous) the season by a concert at Irving Hall in the old salon manner Harrison style, but he has taken [illegible] and announces a series to be given in Steinway Hall [illegible] by his bank much larger still as follows: Nov. 30, "Creation;" Dec 12, "Elijah;" Dec. 23, "Messiah;" Jan 26, "Samson;" Feb. 20, "Judas Maccabaeus;" March 13, "St. Paul;" to which add Mr. Bristow's "Daniel" for the first time.—Then again, that wide-awake manager has secured [illegible] concerts the "he pianist" of twenty years ago, Leopold de Meyer of "Marche Marocaine" memory musician eccentric, nearly to the Italian who [illegible] very unexpectedly the papers say made his descent into the musical market of New York a few days ago. He is to play at Steinway Hall a limited number of nights, beginning Oct. [illegible] with Parepa, Rosa, and Thomas's orchestra assisting.

Said Thomas and orchestra also revolve round the Harrison axis. His programme of Symphony Soirées announced, a worth copying:

1st Soirée. Symphony in D (first time) by Bach (Emanuel?); Aria from Gluck's Armida (first time) sung by Mme. Parepa-Rosa; Introduction from 3rd act of Cherubini's Medea (first time); Recit. and Aria from Mozart's Figaro, Mme. Rosa; two movements from Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B-flat minor (first time); 5th Symphony of Beethoven.

2nd Soirée. Symphony in D (No. 1 in Breitkopf and Härtel edition) Haydn; Piano Solo, by Leopold de Meyer; Concerto in C, op 121, Beethoven; Piano Solo; Schumann's 2d Symphony in E flat.

3d Soirée. Beethoven's 4th Symphony; Piano Solo, De Meyer; Symphonic Poem ("Les Idéals") by Liszt (first time); Piano Solo; Overture to Genoveva, Schumann.

4th. Overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; Scena and Aria, op. 65 (first time), by Beethoven, sung by Mme. Rosa; Ballade ("Der Mayern Fluch," Uhland) by Bülow (first time); Aria by Spohr; Second Symphony in C, by Schumann.

5th. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Aria from Weber's Oberon by Mme. Rosa; "Gretchen," Kennlichkeit from the Faust Symphony by Liszt; Songs by Mendelssohn and Schumann; Overture to Benvenuto Cellini (first time), Berlioz.

We have named, of course, only the more prominent features of the too ambitious Harrison-Rosa-way-Thomas concert scheme. Still outside of these ravishing scenes lie the classical concerts of the old Philharmonic Society and the Chamber Concerts of the Mason and Thomas Quartet, whose programme we have not yet seen. Also Maretzek's Italian and Bateman's French (Offenbach) Operas, both of which began (we dare say, were "inaugurated") this week; and we dare say the "rendition" were fine and much applause, &c., was "decreed" in the critics. The Italian opened on Monday, with its best, Don Giovanni, with Parepa for Donna Anna; Miss Hauck, Zerlina; Mlle. Ronconi, Elvira; Bellini the Don; Ronconi, Leporello; and Naragli, Ottavio. Bergmann conducted. On Tuesday, I Puritani, with Signora Persiani, Bellini, Antonucci, &c. Wednesday, Handel's Orfeo, for the new tenor Pascoli, with Parepa, Bellini, Naragli, &c. Thursday, opening night, with Don Giovanni, in Brooklyn; Friday, Il Giuramento to say Don Giovanni ensemble.

MR. [illegible] is establishing Chorus Classes in New York, an excellent plan for qualifying large numbers of persons to take part in Oratorios, Cantatas and [illegible]. We congratulate Vassar College (at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.) in obtaining the services of so superior a man as Mr. Ritter as Director of the Musical Department in that large and liberal institution, which is an female education an equal footing with that sought for by young men in colleges.

The local "Conservatories" are the rage in New York as elsewhere. There were [illegible] of them before, [illegible] best business, and [illegible] of those one new one, that of Mason and Thomas. Philadelphia has caught the fever and announces modestly an American Conservatory.

Herr Abert.

Herr Eckert has now given up the directorship of the Opera at Stuttgard and is succeeded by Herr Abert. The latter highly esteemed for his theoretical and practical talent has firmly won his spurs by the success of his first [illegible] work, Astorga, in those now produced in 1866 at Stuttgard, and since in [illegible] theatres throughout Germany. The history of this composer is singularly interesting and romantic. Born in 1832, [illegible] in Bohemia, he was destined by his parents to become a priest, and was early educated in a Bohemian convent. In this convent his passion for music interfered his theological studies, and ultimately determined the young student to quit the convent and place himself under Kapellmeister Kittl, in the Conservatory at Prague. The progress of Abert in composition was rapid, and his first grand Orchestra Symphony produced and played before the Professor in 1851 first brought his name before at Prague. The following year, 1852, Abert was engaged as contra-bassist in the Royal Chapel and Opera at Stuttgard. In this school some pieces can be mentioned a number of the grand masses, and subsequently completed a second and third grand symphony. The logical [illegible] moved in strictness, and presenting the persevering youthful symphonist brings forth his first essay, "Anna di Landskron." The opera was given in Stuttgard in 1858. Encouraged by the success of this his first actual drama, Abert produced in 1862 his second opera, "Le Roi Ensor," which made the tour of Germany. In 1863 after appeared his grand "Symphonische Bilder," "Columbus," which spread the fame of Abert to Belgium, France and England, in all of which countries the composition was played with more or less success. Having achieved popularity in orchestral and lyrical composition, he soon succeeded in chamber music, with a Quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello.

The crowning effort of the Bohemian contra-bassist however was the complete success of his third opera "Astorga," which just had its large season at Kapellmeister at Stuttgard. The romance part of the life and love history of the gentleman than that of the hero and wanting the order of priesthood and struggling for success as a musician. By his talent, education and amiable character the young Bohemian soon became popular in the society of Stuttgard, and all a well respected son of the Bohemian [illegible] a consent that awakened a general sympathy and led to their happy union. The wife of Abert is the daughter of the rich and popular proprietor of the yard and hotel that bears her name—Marquardt. Being herself a dilettante and fond of music, Marquardt is very proud of the distinction earned by his gifted son-in-law, and carry a kind of [illegible] at [illegible] poet, the friend of all of a guest interested by the scene, and a most generous hospitality at the soirées which are frequently organized during the summer months, and presided over by the present Kapellmeister Abert.—Orchestra.

Recent German Operas.—Reinecke's "King Manfred."*

The second act proves to them how Manfred's thoughts still turn on getting possession of Chismonda. He is in his palace and sends out a page to discover the abode of the beloved. In vain does Eckart remind him of the dangers which threaten his crown on the part of the Romans and French alike; in vain he asks Helena to exhort him to reform; he bathes the anxiety of her and Eckart about throne and empire, and, weary of the wife puts her away. Meanwhile the Cardinal with the banished noblemen have learned of Manfred's purpose of abducting Chismonda, and the latter is left to wait for the king, who comes with Eckart and a few attendants into the cloister garden; but Eckart kills one of the ringleaders and puts the rest to flight. Manfred frees Chismonda and brings her to his Love Court.

In the third act the returning party are awaited in Manfred's palace, where already many devoted country people, besides a gang of ill-disposed sailors, have gathered to see the festivities in preparation. Helena, to avoid this painful meeting, betakes herself before Manfred's return to the castle at Benevento. The Love Court marches in, the king in the midst thereof disguised as Bacchus, and in his train a troop of Saracenic maidens, which are to be explained by the circumstance that the Saracens, still to be found about that time in lower Italy, were in alliance with Manfred. Now come jubilation, dance and feasting. Then the Cardinal appears and pronounces the sentence of excommunication against the King. Part of the company desert Manfred, the rest stay by him.

The fourth act brings us nearer to the catastrophe. Chismonda is no longer willing to be merely the King's [illegible]; she will be Queen herself. But Manfred, to whom the serious side of life has powerfully presented itself, rejects her claims; he has gone back to the true love, the love of his wedded wife. But while he is marching forth to fight his enemies, Chismonda broods over a scheme to poison the Queen. Without the battle therefore, again for once, through the aid of the Saracens, decided in Manfred's favor. Could he only control himself or stay with the army as Eckart advises him, the victory might be followed up; but a dark rising song drives the King back to Benevento. There (in the fifth act) sits the Queen, her heart full of anxiety and yearning in the lonely hall. Chismonda glides in to her in the disguise of a pilgrim and is about to offer her the poison, under the pretext of preparing a love potion for her. Manfred steps between them and prevents the crime. The King is reconciled anew to his wife. But in the meantime his enemies, through treachery have got possession of the most important places, and are pressing nigh the royal palace. Deserted by the Italians, Manfred can rely only on the Saracens. He fights and falls. Chismonda, in a swoon, is borne back by the victors to the cloister. The Queen shrieks of the cup of poison over the corpse of her dead husband. Charles of Anjou is proclaimed King.

It will be seen that the libretto avoids all mention of Manfred's children. The figure of Chismonda is only created to show the influence of the King, and represents the tragical guilt thereof. The King's end, apostrophizing the dear dead at the last with words of lofty eulogy, puts himself to death, whereas history tells us that she languished through long years of imprisonment. It cannot be denied that the book on the whole is happily invented and musically effective. Every lung is [illegible] shows a sufficient motive. Episodes are as far as possible avoided. Nowhere is there any weight [illegible] to move as to make, where there is [illegible] of constantly so full and out as [illegible] for action. The language, although not wholly free from reminiscences, [illegible] easily apprehended euphonious, musical, and, without suffering from extravagance and redundance, is yet for the most part in a lofty vein.

In regard to the musical treatment, the composer has, in the first place, disregarded all the received models. He has composed his text all through making almost no use of recitative secco, but making for the most part singing recitative. But he has brought the special lyrical elements of the poem into a free musical form corresponding to their musical requirements. In this he has of course had to employ repetition of the text, but on the whole he has done it discreetly and perhaps too sparingly. Ensembles and postludes he has introduced only at the beginning or the close of single scenes, and these are mostly independent in their contents.

From all this it will be seen, that the composer was perfectly clear in his own mind in entering the road he took, and that he has followed it consistently and—we do not hesitate to add—successfully. The earnest way in which the composer has treated his task both in respect of melody and harmony is coupled with so much grace and [illegible] that one's enjoyment is never for an instant disturbed. The rhythm, without being striking is appropriate. The vocal writing shows the all-practised master, and so has the instrumentation. Perhaps it has occurred only [illegible]—also, in the interest of the composer as well as for our own [illegible] we are looking out for any weak moment—that he may have too anxiously avoided all that could have looked like an intentional culmination of effects.

As we go over Reinecke's opera in our memory, it is with joyful satisfaction, we confess, that we have met with no dramatic work for a long time which had such a succession of beautiful and interesting parts as this as "King Manfred." The two larger instrumental pieces which occur in the opera are each admirably effective in its way, and the public gave unanimous acknowledgment by summoning the solid and yet very brilliant Overture made up of motives from the opera, with long continued applause, and by requiring the prelude to the fifth act to be played da capo. Conspicuous in solos and effect are: In the first act Chismonda's Aria, the entrée of Manfred and the Duet following between Manfred and Chismonda. In the second act the Duet between Manfred and Helena, particularly at the close, where Helena [illegible] the chorus of maidens: "[illegible] in der Halle," the Romance of Manfred: "Was weilst du in der Lenzesnacht," the Duet between Manfred and Chismonda. In the third act, the Ballad and the concluding chorus. In the fourth act, the aria of Chismonda, and that of Manfred "O Siegesruf," with its tranquil melting close, the Duet between Eckhart and Manfred. In the fifth act the Ballad of the Pages, the Cavatina of Helena; the closing scene with Helena's touching departure.

"What?" I hear it said "An opera in the Italian repertoire has scarcely ever more than six or seven numbers that are musically tolerable and effective in the great public, and here in this German opera you talk of eighteen or twenty?" Yes—so it is! and for this reason we desire and hope that "King Manfred" may keep its place in the repertoire as long as the incomparably weaker work of some favorite Italian or Frenchman, though Reinecke be "only" a German!

The Fugue as an Art Work.

BY W. F. A. [illegible]

I.

1. The specific problem of this paper is to answer this question, as far as we may, namely:—What is the true rank of the Fugue as a musical work of art? Let it be understood that throughout this paper we understand by the term fugue the Fugue in its highest development, which is reached only at the hand of Bach; for the fugues of this Master are, we think, more individual and more free than others, and approach more nearly to the ideal of the fugue.

In this discussion we must build up our reasoning on axioms, intuitions, and postulates, about which opinions do not differ: for we have no authoritative treatise on musical taste.

2. The first question which meets us is: What kind of impressions or ideas may we get from music? To this question generally stated, John Ruskin has answered:—

"All sources of pleasure, or any other good, to be derived from works of art, may be referred to five distinct heads.

"I. Ideas of Power.—The perception or conception of the mental or bodily powers by which the work has been produced.

"II. Ideas of Imitation.—The perception that the thing produced resembles something else.

"III. Ideas of Truth.—A perception of faithfulness in a statement of facts by the thing produced.

"IV. Ideas of Beauty.—The perception of vanity, either in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles.

Digitized by Google

"V. Ideas of Relation.—The perception of intellectual relations in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles."

In musical application the significance of these terms is thus taken;—When we perceive a musical work to have employed great technical or artistic powers in its production, we receive "ideas of power." Likewise from a virtuoso performance we receive "ideas of power"—namely, of great mental and bodily powers employed in the performance or in its preparation. This kind of impression is in itself noble. We are so constituted as to take pleasure in any exhibition of power either bodily or mental, and the more worthily the power is exerted, the more worthy is our delight.

Secondly. When we perceive a musical passage to imitate something,—as, e.g. a bird-song, or one voice to imitate another—we receive "ideas of imitation." Haydn's "Creation" abounds in passages designed to imitate or suggest sounds in nature. The ideas of this class are regarded as less noble than any others for reasons that we have not now space to consider.

Thirdly. A musical work depicts or suggests certain emotional states. In proportion as any particular emotional state is distinctly suggested or impressed upon us, do we receive "ideas of truth."

Fourth. In what Ideas of Beauty consist we have not now room to show in full. Reference is made to the paper on "Upon Music" in No. 640 of this Journal, or still better to the second volume of Ruskin's "MODERN PAINTERS," which volume alone to any student in Æsthetics is worth more than the price of the entire set. It must suffice here to say that in the contemplation of good music we experience very great pleasure, "not dependent on any direct and definite exertion of the intellect." This pleasure results from a perception of the beautiful, which may be merely of the blending or contrasting of tones of different timbre, and in the happy forms of melody and harmony, or may consist in an unconscious perception of spiritual types suggested by the music. Among the traits of typical beauty are these:—Infinity, Unity, Repose, Symmetry, Purity and Moderation. These elements are typical of traits in the Divine. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that beauty of the kind first mentioned (blending of tones, etc.) is of physical relation only. The latter is a higher kind—a beauty perceived by the moral nature.

Fifth. Entirely distinct from the pleasures already enumerated is the perception of the relations of design, significance, and fitness, between the different parts of the work. All the satisfaction we experience in tracing the manner of modulations, the happy resources (considered as a device of counterpoint), the various resources of counterpoint, and the relation of successive melodic periods to each other,—the satisfaction derived from all these and many like sources, draws from "ideas of relation."

3. Again, with reference to the words "subjectively" as some would say, all the impressions just enumerated may be classed into three divisions:—

I. Sensuous Perceptions.—The music sounds well, or it does not. To this class belong all questions of consonance or dissonance, tone-color, rhythm—all questions of hearing.

II. Intellectual Perceptions.—These are "ideas of relation," and "ideas of power," perhaps also "ideas of imitation," as enumerated and defined in the preceding chapter.

III. Emotional Impressions.—We perceive the work to depict certain emotional states and our own feelings are elevated or depressed in consonance therewith. To this class belong the "ideas of truth" and "of beauty," according to the former enumeration.

4. It is now proper that we inquire which of these kinds of ideas is most noble, if, indeed, there be degrees of rank among them.

Now with reference to the classes of ideas enumerated in the second chapter it will be said, that the three last named are regarded as most noble, and of these all are in some degree essential to any true work of art. Truth is of course essential to any real nobility, but is hardly a fit subject of comparison with other elements. On the other hand, I cannot resist the conclusion that ideas of beauty are more ethereal, more angelic, more divine, than the simple perception of the intellectual relations of parts, however complicated or masterly those relations may be. And as this system will hardly be controverted by any person of artistic soul, we may consider it as accepted.

With reference to the enumeration in the third chapter it remains to say that the two latter sources of pleasure (the Intellectual and the Emotional) must be regarded as superior, or of a higher order than the first. For by the common consent of enlightened mankind, those enjoyments which appertain exclusively to the physique are considered to be of a lower order than those which belong to the intellectual or emotional nature. The body perishes with the using. The soul is immortal.

5. We are now prepared to approach more closely to our main question, which we daily ask: How, in general, shall we determine the rank of a work of art? Ruskin has given a general formula of answer to this, in "MODERN PAINTERS" Vol. I. p. 12. (First American Ed.) "The art is greatest, which conveys to the mind of the spectator, by any means whatever, the greatest number of the greatest ideas; and I call an idea great in proportion as it is received by a higher faculty of the mind, and as it more fully occupies, and in occupying, exercises and exalts the faculty by which it is received." If this be so, and if the conclusions arrived at in the preceding chapter be just, it follows that those compositions are greatest which most abound in Ideas of Beauty, of Relation, and of Truth.

Thus far we seem to have come safely on our journey, but only now have we reached our main question.

II.

We have endeavored to show on what principles the rank of art works is to be determined. The general result at which we have arrived is that musical works are greater in proportion to the ideas of beauty and truth they communicate, rather than in proportion to any impression of masterly skill in counterpoint they may give us. In the discussion of the same question therefore, (namely as to the rank of the fugue) it becomes necessary in the first place to enquire What are the traits of the fugue? And then from a comparison of these traits with the general principles already deduced we shall be able to solve our problem, to our own satisfaction at least.

E. The grand question is: What is the true position of the fugue in the world of musical art? Now this question is not one already determined (as some might hastily assume), as is evident from the fact that different composers—acknowledged Masters, too—have placed very different estimates upon the Fugue. Some have ignored it entirely. Others have cultivated it—Mendelssohn, for instance—only as a severe exercise in composition. Others, again, have employed it more largely than any other style of composition, as, for instance, Bach.

2. And here I pause to remark that in my use of the term the Fugue is not a distinct musical form. For I use the word "form" to signify "any plan in accordance with which several successive periods of melody are connected so as to form one whole." The form is the plan of period-relation of the work. The Song-form, Rondo, Sonata and Fantasia are distinguishable musical forms. Fugue is a system of counterpoint; and a Fugue is a composition in which the counterpoint is managed in accordance with the laws of that system. It is not the plan in accordance with which the melodic periods follow one another that distinguishes the Fugue from other compositions, but the manner of the counterpoint and that alone. Any work in which the voices bear strict fugal relations to each other is a Fugue. Yet it is possible that a work be a Fugue and still be, as to its period-relations, a veritable Sonata. Bach's organ fugue in E flat (the so-called St. Ann's, I believe) is almost a Sonatina.

3. And this leads us to a closer survey of the noteworthy traits of the fugue. The one great feature of the fugue is the counterpoint. It is this, as we have seen, that names the work. It is indeed the culmination of counterpoint. Cherubini says:—

"Fugue should be written to the present time. Fugue is the perfection of counterpoint. It should comprise not only all the resources supplied by the different kinds of counterpoint, but many other devices peculiar to itself."

"All that a good composer ought to know may be introduced into fugue; it is the type of all pieces of music; that is to say whenever the piece is composed, so that it be well conceived, regular and conducted with good attention—it should without bearing precisely the character and form of a fugue, at least possess its spirit."

The fugues of Bach do have well marked individualities of emotional tone. But they do none of them suggest distinct emotional states, or impress us, and elevate or depress the emotional condition of the listener to consonance with themselves, so decidedly as do many other works—certain of Beethoven's Sonatas, for instance.

Fugues are grand. Even the easy ones make an impression of power. They are restless, and when they cease it is not from an apparent finish of necessary conclusion reached, but rather of arbitrary pause. For a fugue which "played, is not played out." You are conscious of no reason why it might not go on indefinitely—or at least, as long as the counterpoint "holds out." It has a determined purpose, which is, to worthily magnify a given subject. In its extent and in the determination of its period relations and paragraphs, it is strictly a fantasy.

4. Agnes. That last expression of Cherubini ("pioneer in spirit") calls us back to the delightful Editorial fantasy "About Fugues" in No. 186.

Certain compositions do possess much of the fugue spirit, yet are not strictly fugues. For example, the Finale of Beethoven's A flat Sonata, Op. 26, has much of this spirit. Now what impression does this Finale make upon us, as compared with other movements of the same work? The first movement, the Andante with variations, is full of soul. The Scherzo is purposely of small spiritual weight, in order to release the mind from a last procedure, and preparatory to what follows. The third movement is the solemn Funeral March—a composition which with perhaps two or three others stands first of its kind. Now steps in the lively Finale, quick, impetuous, even mirthful. Two of the previous movements are full of spiritual meaning. While counterpoint has had a fair share of attention, it has been employed only in strict subordination to the "inner light." Impressions of Beauty and Truth have been foremost in the composer's intention. But now it is time to relieve the attention so severely tasked in the devotion, and the resources of counterpoint are employed with a liberal hand to awaken impressions of delight more of the Intellect than of the Emotions. The melodic contents are significant, it is true, but they become infinitely more so in the manner of elaboration. This movement is needed to restore the spiritual equilibrium. From the whole Sonata, the soul awakes as from an elysian dream.

4. To conclude. From good Fugues we receive great pleasure. But it is a sea to me that between the Fugue and Sonata there is a fundamental and radical difference, other than of form or counterpoint. A Sonata is a grand metaphysic tone. A Fugue is a grand piece of work. It may be a soul picture, too. But it is of a soul that is restless, striving after infinite development—a worthy work, yet stiff after all, a Becoming, never Is. To hear a good Sonata, rests me; a fugue invigorates, clears the head, but does not seem to me to afford rest. The grand task of the sonata is, to convey "ideas of beauty"; of the fugue, "ideas of power and relations." It follows, therefore, as the former paper said, that the fugue is in a way "less noble than other forms of musical art, in so far as it so premises less" of soul "than they."

That the Fugue does express less of emotion but more of intellectual contrivance than some other varieties of music, is a matter of concurrence among the majority of thoughtful musicians. In any nation the number of those who do not coincide with this doctrine, may almost be counted on one's fingers. Now we can receive great pleasure in contemplating a neat problem in mathematics; but who ever would seek in it one of the wonderful amount of emotional expression and spirituality that is latent therein, we are reminded of the just remark of the poet, that

"Options sharp would take Tomes,
It's not a thing that can't be done."

That such options are possessed by any, is to the "oft very obstinate ones on the party" a matter of profound admiration!

London "Music Halls."

(From "The Broadway.")

No institution has ever proved more thoroughly false to its early promise than has the "Music Hall." We were told when the idea came first into fashion, that its encouragement would exert a beneficial influence over the progress of music amongst the lower classes; that many people who then spend the hours of the night in dissolute indulgence at the public-house, would, in time, be allured from their vile orgies, and that the souls of many a fellow creature would in general become ennobled through the agency of art! In fact we were told all sorts of things which, perhaps, we did not believe; and which being at all events, have proved by time to be not less fallacious than the great majority of good visions.

When the Canterbury Music Hall came prominently before the public and set an example which has now been followed all over London—you may say all over England—the principal attraction which was put forward to catch the multitude was a musical selection from some well known operatic work. The performance, we are bound to confess, was somewhat coarse, but it was not wanting in a certain brilliancy and dash, and as there were one or two singers of passable merit engaged for these selections, we have no doubt but that with care and judgment the character of the entertainments might have been raised and the taste of the public, as a natural consequence, improved.

Destiny has, however, willed it otherwise, and the Music Hall as it at present exists, is mischievous as the one which it pretends to uphold. Operatic selections, it is true, are still to be heard, but they are, as a rule, so badly sung and vulgarly accompanied, that it were better for the cause of art that they should be omitted, and in many cases, they appear to have died away—unheeded and unregretted—from the programme.

Nothing is listened to now-a-days but the so-called "comic songs," and in sober earnestness, we must express our astonishment that human beings endowed with the ordinary gift of reason, should be found to go night after night in order to witness such humiliating exhibitions. It is quite impossible to name anything equal to the stupidity of these comic songs unless, indeed, it be their vulgarity. A man appears on the platform dressed in outlandish fashion, and ornamented with whiskers of luxurious length and hideous hat, and proceeds to sing seven other verses of pointless twaddle, interspersed with a blatant "chorus," in which the audience is requested to join. The audience obligingly concurs and each one bears his contribution to the general harmony as some of the verse he happens to know best. It subsequently occurs that one of these heroes of song is received with perfect silence, and under such circumstances it might not unreasonably be supposed that the actor would refrain from making his reappearance before an audience who do not appear to have afforded unqualified satisfaction. We are all, however, liable to be deceived, and no matter how slender the amount of the success achieved, the gentleman who occupies the chair will announce, in sententious accents, that "Mr. So-and-So will oblige again"—which he accordingly proceeds to do. In a blatant manner, some alarming and, if possible, more hideous than on the previous occasion. This process of musical treadmill is continued until the exhausted singer has sung four songs, when (if he merely refuse to sing any more) he is set free and allowed to carry, over other Music Halls, the depressing influence of his talent.

It might be fancied that in 'hearing' a song from one of these hapless ones of which we must have reached the lowest pitch of jocular destitution. In this it is not so; for however deep the pain we endure from the male comedians, the suffering which we experience at the hands of the "serio-comic lady" is even harder to bear. Her very title is sufficiently a misnomer, for there is no glint of seriousness in her performance, while as for comedy—Heaven save the mark!—she knows not the meaning of the word. She appears on the platform and, with many leerings and shrill voice, howls forth songs about "'tis in the Clouds," or some "swell in Pall Mall," or, perhaps, she will tell you a domestic occurrence in which omnibus conductors or policemen, or costermongers form the important features. Wanting alike in point, grace, or humour, these songs can have no purpose save to indulge the degraded taste of the majority of those who nightly fill the Music Halls; except such of the audience as have been crammed to the lips that they would hear a rational performance, there can be but one feeling—pity.

We would gladly refrain from attacking women, but in this case, we cannot be silent, for we are satisfied that these songs are not only very stupid but extremely mischievous in their results, and those who sing them must not claim to hold any consideration on account of their sex, which they have outraged by such unseemly and unwomanly performances. Generally a woman likes hope to the last; might linger when all else is gone; but it is to "serio-comic ladies" have no vestige of feminine influence that we condemn them so unseemly and unwomanly.

Whilst on this subject we are reminded, perhaps by contrast, of Mlle. Thérèse, the diva of the Alcazar in Paris and, so far as regards painful comparisons we are bound in truth to say that our remarks have no reference to her; her presence, which, in a different walk of art might have enabled her to obtain a high position as an artist. As it is she is only a Music Hall singer—but such a one! No more can set her in the same rank, but not according to the mere amount of talent evinced by her. That her sphere of art is a low one—perhaps the lowest—no one will deny; but her pre-eminence in that sphere is unmistakable, and, at the risk of shocking some of our readers, we venture to think that many queens of song, now before the public, whose careers are cherished by lovers of the opera, will feel themselves matched and outdone before Mlle. Thérèse meets her equal.

But let us leave the heroine of the Alcazar. In England there are numerous representatives of her genre, but we will seek in vain for anyone who can afford the least idea of her merits. We had a twofold object in referring to the Parisian Café Chantant, and although the French Music Hall is liable to reproach in certain matters we think that some things might with advantage be transplanted to England. In Paris you will find in most cases a little orchestra of efficient performers who enable nearly through one to two overtures, a waltz, or a march, and so forth, and who, if need be, are fit to play a better class of music in this style. There are generally singers of some pretension who are equal to the proper performance of romances and operatic airs, and, in short, the class of entertainment is such as respectable folk may take pleasure in hearing. We wish that as much could be said for our Music Halls! Until, however, the entire organization of these places of amusement is remodelled, and until decent music and fair skill replace the ground which is now occupied by buffoonery and vulgarity, no good result may be hoped for.

We have spoken somewhat plainly in this matter, and there are one and possibly more of these Music Halls which may not justly come under the strictures which we have passed upon the institutions in general. Of the exceptions which strike us, the Alhambra, with its well-mounted ballets and capital scenery, may be cited as one, whilst the music rooms known as Evans's in Covent Garden constitute the other. In the latter case, the audience consists of men alone and the entertainment is made up of songs, glees and part-songs, executed by a well-trained choir in which will be found boys with fresh and lusty voices, which it does one's heart good to hear. There was, it is true, a funereal comedian there, whose name, we fancy, was Mr. Harry Sidney, but if we are right, he has taken his solemn character, and so at Evans's the visitor will now chance to hear good music well executed. The establishment is admirably conducted, and as for the 'beaming proprietor,' may his shadow never be less, and may his hospitable board never be empty!

It still happens that we have not touched upon the same absent question of the evil influence exercised by the majority of Music Halls as they are now conducted, and we have purposely refrained from doing so. If the morality of a Nation is to be attacked, the best course is to make, in the first place, its appeal to its common sense. We have endeavoured to point out the utter stupidity and worthlessness of the entertainments which are to be heard at these places all over London, and it remains for the public to contribute in quota towards a general reformation, so that, in time, the Music Hall may really furnish a home for music instead of being, as at present, an insult to the art from which it has filched the name.

The Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein.

(Correspondence of the London Musical World.)

The meeting of the General German Musical Society held at Meiningen during last August proved one of unusual interest, as tending in some measure to show what is being effected in Germany by musicians of the present day. The society, which is under the immediate patronage of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, owes its existence mainly to the efforts of the Abbé Liszt, was founded at Weimar in 1861 for the furtherance of musical art by the establishment of musical festivals, the revival of the less familiar works of undeserved neglect by great masters and the production of new works by living composers. Unlike our English festivals which are thereby projected in aid of some charity, in our encouraging

Contrary to expectation, though an ecclesiastical as well as a Hungarian colouring is faithfully maintained throughout the work, there is no lack of beautiful and simple melody. When treating sacred subjects, Liszt has fully proved in this and other late works not only his willingness to abjure his former eccentricity, but also his ability to appear in a simple and natural light. The possession of such qualities as melody, simplicity, and general effect [illegible] St. Elizabeth [illegible] work which, I am inclined to think, will some day be accepted as the best and most original of its kind that [illegible] for this note has appeared since Mendelssohn's Elijah.

Musical Correspondence

Philadelphia, Sept. 30. Early in October there is to be opened in Philadelphia a school of music upon the plan of the European Conservatoriums. "The American Conservatory of Music" the institution is called and from the [illegible] upon which all the arrangements for a thorough course of study seem to be made, we may safely anticipate the achievement of much good.

A very wise course of study is to be pursued, no student being allowed to pass from the lower to the higher grades of classes without first undergoing a thorough examination. Much benefit can be derived by the study of the various branches in classes, and the school will also afford the best opportunities for private instruction.

The departments of Violin Instrumentation and Direction of Orchestra, and the German school of singing are under the charge of Mr. Carl Gaertner, the well-known violinist and composer. The Professor for Vocal music, of the Italian school, is Signor [illegible], late of Rome, who comes to us from New York with a high reputation.

Mr. James Pearce, graduate of Oxford College, England and now organist of St. Mark's church of this city will teach Organ, Theory of Music, Harmony, &c. Piano lessons will be given by one first professor in classes and private, and advanced pupils are also to have the opportunity of studying classical works with [illegible] and orchestral accompaniments under the direction of Mr. Gaertner.

Connected with the school is to be a library of musical works free to the use of pupils and to those [illegible] by the President and Trustees. There will be lectures delivered upon interesting musical subjects, and modern Languages and Elocution will likewise be taught.

Our musical public as well as the students of the Conservatory will enjoy the fine classical concerts to be held at the Hall of the Institution. The "Philadelphia Classical Quartette Club" purpose giving twenty matinées directed by Mr. Carl Gaertner, commencing Saturday, November 1, and there will be also four grand soirées. Both matinées and grand concerts are given for the purpose of instructing and [illegible] the taste of the students, the Conservatory tickets being entitled to free admission.

A [illegible] we both [illegible] as one calculated to effect much in a good cause. The earnest student has greatly needed such opportunities for study and [illegible] what he is [illegible] ambition. Your readers shall be duly informed of all matters of interest concerning the Conservatory, its concerts, lectures, &c. that come under the notice of the faithful recorder. Umpire.

New Haven, Conn. Oct. 4.—The "Heavenly maid," whose abode here in the city of Elms during the summer has been deep and distressing, has once more [illegible] her own.—This late act [illegible] occasion of a concert by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, whose name and fame may not be entirely unknown to the Bostonians.

Here are the selections which they offered us on the evening of the 3d last.:

[illegible]

It will be seen that the programme is somewhat meagre, including but four good compositions; and even this list was curtailed by Mr. Fries, who very coolly informed the audience that the Beethoven Andante as old not be given, it having been put upon the programme "by mistake."

But but masterly playing of this Quartet is well known and it hardly need be said that, despite the above mentioned occurrence, the concert proved a very enjoyable one.

We cannot praise too highly the manner in which Schubert's "Tema" was played, the only apparent imperfection being a certain roughness in [illegible] some of the finer passages; nor do we speak coldly and casually of this darkly beautiful "song of death" whose wonderful strains seem to [illegible], again and again —

Why is not Schubert better known as a composer of instrumental music?—and why are not Schumann's always understood?

Mr. Eichberg's rendering of [illegible] fine concerto was thoroughly artistic and deserved the tumultuous success which it received.

With regard to Mr. Schultze's violin solo, we would observe that wherever prominence is taken by the performance of such classic trash as "The bird on the tree," certainly it [illegible] of his reputation as an artist; and furthermore we would, in all kindness, suggest that when a player is encored there exists—in some minds—an alleged prejudice against his responding with a selection the length of which very much exceeds that of the one first performed.

In Bridgeport, on the 11th ult., Mr. C. F. Daniels began a series of Pianoforte Recitations, or "Matinées," and the following programme, which will commend itself to all observers:

Mr. Daniels was assisted on this occasion by Miss [illegible], a [illegible] of rare ability.

Of the next matinée—which will be given on the [illegible] inst.—this is the programme:

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Théâtre Italien appears to absorb all the interest connected with music in the capital at the present time. And the attraction is almost entirely due to Mlle. Adelina Patti, if we are to credit the Parisian journals, who are unanimous in declaring the fair singer to be a greater favorite than ever, and to have proved herself entirely worthy of the [illegible] of favoritism. In addition to Amina, in La Sonnambula, Mlle. Patti has appeared as Norina in Don Pasquale, and Rosina in the Barbiere. In the latter opera the young prima donna had for her coadjutors, Signor Gardoni as Count Almaviva, Signor [illegible] as Figaro, Signor Scalese as Doctor Bartolo, and Signor [illegible] as Don Basilio. The Figaro is [illegible] and [illegible] the new Basilio, notwithstanding his fine voice, had not depth or gravity enough for the role. On this account the great air "La Calunnia," was the weakest thing in the performance. Mlle. Patti sang exquisitely, and made the old furore. She introduced in the Lesson scene the Laughing Song from Auber's Manon Lescaut, and being encored gave the romance of Mme. de [illegible] "[illegible]." Mlle. Patti has also played Violetta in the Traviata. [illegible] It is said she is rehearsed for her part [illegible] Elisir d'Amore is announced in that [illegible] is [illegible] the popular diva has no [illegible] opera buffa of [illegible] Don Desiderio will be revived for her with Signori Gardoni, Scalese, and Mercuriali and Mlle. Rosello in the other principal parts. M. Bagier had intended to produce Tancredi with Mlle. Grossi as the hero, Mme. Laura Harris as Amenaide, Signor Gardoni as Argirio and Signor Scalese as Orbassano. Rossini, however, it is said, objected so strongly to the revival of his early operas—especially alluding to [illegible] Tancredi—that the intention is dropped, and the manager will have to look for a [illegible] Il Trovatore will be produced for the debut of Signor Morghini [illegible] and Mlle. Patti will sustain the part of Leonora for the first time. Mlle. Dreano [illegible] of the Conservatoire, made her début recently on the stage of the Opéra Comique as Isabelle in Le Pré aux Clercs. She somewhat disappointed her friends, but she was terribly nervous, and by no means did herself justice. Her appearance, however, pleased [illegible] and her voice is described as of fine quality and well trained.—Mme. Miolan Carvalho, it is said, is about to leave the stage. This intelligence requires confirmation. The popular Parisian cantatrice appeared, for the last time before her month's congé, at the Théâtre Lyrique as Juliette, in M. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette. She goes to repose herself after the fatigue of the season and will no doubt return for the winter season. There is no reason whatever why Mme. Miolan-Carvalho should quit the scene of her triumphs. Mlle. Christine Nilsson will belong to the Grand Opéra by the time she returns.

London.

On Saturday the Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace were resumed under the direction of Mr. Manns. These concerts have long been [illegible] a [illegible] high place among [illegible] for public favor, and the [illegible] and [illegible] manifested in their arrangement is found greatly to the honor of Mr. Grove and the Directors who [illegible] Mr. [illegible] as the forerunner of the programmes Mr. Manns chose a strong partiality for Schumann; and [illegible] has done so to introduce Schumann to the public by whom this master is little known, the selected some of the works best likely to exhaust the German composer's [illegible], the weakness is but little [illegible] to one who has so powerful a regard for his composition and whose efforts to familiarize them to a British public are always [illegible] if occasionally unsuccessful. True to his musical creed, he opened the winter season with a movement from the beautiful ballet music which Schubert wrote for "Rosamunde." In this a lovely andante in G major, in which the air is given to the wood instruments on a pedal bass, is specially fine; and this, together with the succeeding ballet air in the same key, received excellent interpretation at the hands of the executants. But those who seek a meaning in music, and demand that a work, rounded and complete in itself, should express a certain conception, prefer to its [illegible]—ballet-music [illegible] a piece finished even to the frame and glazing—must be utterly puzzled by these excerpts from a large work. Here is the entr'acte without a hero in the key to it—where is the drama [illegible] which is the only key? If Schubert's music is to be considered illustrative and [illegible] we must know the subject of that illustration—the plot of the drama, otherwise we cannot say whether the composer has succeeded in his purpose or not. Mere fragments, without indication of their purpose and purport, are to be taken only for what they are—broken pieces. Besides this ballet music we had the Scotch Symphony played exceedingly well and the overture to "Der Freischütz" equally satisfactorily performed. The vocal part of the programme was given to Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock and Mr. Cummings. The second lady did remarkable justice to the cavatina sung from Benedict's "St. Cecilia," "Father whose blessing" and was even better in a charming song from Mr. Sullivan's "Sapphire Necklace," an unpublished opera. This air was encored. Miss Edith Wynne also sang one of Sullivan's compositions and Mozart's "Voi che sapete." The Palace has benefited during the vacation by improvements made in the orchestra and auditorium, and the band has been augmented. This Saturday we shall have Beethoven's B flat symphony, Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille" overture, and an selections from Gounod's "Colombe."—Orchestra, Sept. 28.

Professor Sterndale Bennett's new cantata, "The Woman of Samaria," was finished with extraordinary haste, a portion of it being left incomplete until the last moment. Before sending it to press the composer has wisely resolved to revise a large portion of the work, and to rewrite some numbers.

VIENNA.—At the Carl Theater, Dittersdorf's opera, Doctor und Apotheker, first produced in 1786, has been revived with incontestable success. The music though somewhat old-fashioned, and redolent of the periwig period is exceedingly fresh and pleasing, more especially the charming duet "Verliebte brauchen keine Zeugen," the finale of [illegible] "Formaliter," and the septet of operatical finale. But there can be no doubt that the admirable manner in which the opera was put upon the stage, sung, and acted contributed a great deal to the triumph it achieved.

ITALY.—The following are the titles of the new operas which will probably be produced in Italy during the approaching autumn and winter. At Milan—Gianni de Nisida, Petrella; [illegible] Cagnoni; Il Bello del Villaggio (buffo) Dell' Argine; La Tombola, the Sig. Cagnoni; La Coppa d'Oro (buffo), Lauro Rossi. Naples—Gli Avventurieri, Braga; Il Violinaro, [illegible]; Diana Anzalone, Benvenuto; L'Esperienza mensurata (buffo), Filippi; Mefistofele (grand fairy opera), Boito. Whether any of these works will ever be performed in any other place than that in which they will be produced may, judging from what Italian opera composers have written of late years, fairly be doubted.

DRESDEN.—The management purpose producing during the coming season Gluck's Armide, Alceste, and Iphigenia in Tauris with new mise-en-scène for each. In the way of absolute novelties we are to have Der Zögernde Brief, by A. Lanner, and Mignon, by Ambroise Thomas, with Mlle. Lorm, as the principal female part. Nothing is yet concluded, I believe, as to the production of M. Gounod's last work, Roméo et Juliette. In connection with the Royal Opera-house I may mention that Herr Wachtel, on his return from a long course of absence, has received, in recognition of his services at the Court Theatre last winter, a very handsome present from the King.

The Victoria Theatre is to open early next month for an Italian opera season. The manager Signor Pollini has already arrived. The principal artists engaged are Signora Baruchi; Signora Rosa Poli of from the Academy of Music, New York; Signora Morensi, Signora Ruspali, Signor Armandi, from Naples; Signor Bernasi; Signor Adriano Pasolinno, from Palermo; and Signor Corsini, from Milan. Signor Marchesi, also, will be a member of the company. The season will open with Verdi's Ballo in Maschera. This will be followed by Cimarosa's Il Matrimonio, by Ricci; Amore, by Mercadante, and an opera by Petrella, all three novelties for a Berlin audience.

The members of the Berlin Berliner Sangerbund, an association including Erk's Gesangverein; the Melodia; the Cäcilia; and the Akademische Liedertafel, recently gave their annual summer-festival in the gardens of the Schützenhaus. Besides a variety of songs the programme included Mozart's Hirtenkantate, and a comic scene by E. S. Engelsberg.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

IV.

9. The following number, an Alto Solo, in E major (4 measures again) is a strong contrast. Two flutes, the Continuo and the organ falling in occasionally accompany the melody to the words "Esurientes implevit bonis et divites dimisit inanes" (He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent away empty). The Aria has that expression of mildness and repose which wins our ear so beautifully without wearying by monotony. The flutes move mostly in sixths and thirds, holding fast to an extremely peculiar rhythm, and only now and then are offset against each other in ingenious play. The words "implevit bonis," and then again "dimisit inanes" are expressed in a masterly manner; the hungry ones ("esurientes") have as it were a cornucopia of blessings poured upon them, while the rich ("divites") come out empty with a barren figure. The course of the whole aria completes itself so naturally and quietly, the direct intervention of the Highest in the fate of mortals has so many heart-winning traits, that one is almost forced to complain that the beautiful number should glide past so swiftly.

10. The charm of the last piece is one that moves upon you immediately. Bach follows it up with a conception full of deep significance, which transports you into remote times, into another world: a movement which may well be regarded as forming the very central point and kernel of the whole. The primeval melody of the Magnificat, which the Church used also for the Benedictus,—its origin dates back into the 7th century—appears now in the oboes as cantus firmus, with three female voices (two soprani and an alto) mysteriously playing about it, to the words "Suscepit Israel puerum suum, recordatus misericordiae" (He hath holpen his servant Israel in remembrance of his mercy). It gently strikes the clavicembalo marks the fundamental harmonies, rather hinting than actual sounding them. The cantus firmus floats mildly glimmering, like a star over the voice parts, luring them on by a soft attraction to itself. The vocal writing, on its part, hovers and fluctuates towards it in lovely imitations, the several voices taking up the thread and passing it on to one another in artful involutions. All seems to draw life and motion from the primeval sounds. For the two lines of the Choral the master uses two portions of accompanying matter: that is, to the first line the voices sing the "suscepit Israel puerum suum," and to the second line the "recordatus misericordiae." [illegible] of the text, again, find their peculiar musical treatment. The motive to "suscepit Israel puerum suum" is employed directly and in the inverted form, a mode of representation which answers characteristically enough to the helping hand of the Lord; the "recordatus misericordiae," on the contrary, develops itself without the use of such artistic means, and so all the more effectually glorifies the eternal mercy and compassion.

Although the voice parts in their circling movements sometimes cut across each other, yet these momentary hardnesses are always mitigated by the independent individual movement of each part, and rather serve to lend to the whole piece a certain extraordinary and mystical stamp. And this may have been precisely Bach's intention. The sense of just these words which describe the unfailing mercy of the Lord towards his servant Israel, with the venerable tones of the old Magnificat or (in the sense of the Church) the still more significant Benedictus is surely not an accidental one and points to such a conception.

If now we direct attention to the contrast of this number to the Chorus "Omnes generationes" of the same part, how in the two Christianity is first presented in its world-disturbing and then in its world-redeeming aspect, we thereby gain a view point of vision which shows Bach's immeasurable greatness in the clearest light.

The form and substance of the piece just analyzed have reminded us repeatedly of those imperishable words of Luther, which have such convincing efficacy because they proceeded from the deepest insight. He says:

"Where the natural Musica is sharpened and polished by Art, there we first see and recognize with wonder the great and perfect wisdom of God in His wondrous work of the called Music, in which this above all is strange and wonderful: that one voice sings the tenor simply along with which three, four or five other parts are sung, which as it were with jubilation playing, and springing around the said mere melody in all sorts of ways and sound, do marvellously embellish and adorn the same, and lead off as it were a heavenly dance, meeting each other friendlily and fondly hugging and embracing."

Powerfully confirming what precedes, there now sets in a Chorus, in D major, alla breve, to the words: "Sicut locutus est ad patres nostros, Abraham et semini ejus in secula" (As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham and to his seed forever). Suitably to its contents, this text is used for a vocal fugue, energetically supported by the Basso Continuo and the Organ. That Bach is the unrivalled master in the fugue form is universally agreed. And so here too he solves his problem with a playful ease and perfect skill. To the marrowy main theme "sicut locutus est ad patres nostros" are one by one added various secondary motives, the first with the words "Abraham et semini ejus," the second with "sicut locutus est," and the third with "in secula," which all come together at the last entrance but one of the theme in the bass. The significant harmony of word and tone needs scarcely to be mentioned.

Bach's fugues are commonly written as a Counterpoint of as many kinds as there are voice parts employed. By an apt use of these the master with the simplest means often reaches the greatest effects. In general he works out his main theme in three, four or five parts, and gives to each single part a character as independent and as individual as possible; this material, almost exclusively, is discussed throughout the further course of the movement. Accordingly one might believe that here, after all, the mechanical prevailed rather than the organic. Up to a certain point this may be admitted; but then we must not overlook the way in which Bach knows how to invent his themes; he breathes into them such an elastic energy that in all positions and relations they appear always fresh and new.

Towards the end the fugue moulds itself somewhat freely, and thus admirably prepares the character of the concluding number.

Leopold de Meyer.

A REMINISCENCE.

Twenty-two years! Much is changed on that time. Especially in the Art enthusiasms of a young people only beginning to become artistic. It seems in a curious (in one sense sad, but in a better sense encouraging) to compare the present lukewarm interest in brilliant virtuosos, with the excitement which our first season of Italian Opera and two years before the (this became so very common. Ole Bull, for instance, and Leopold de Meyer—what a romantic Boanerges each was in his way! Later on how much too much for us earlier. The latter has suddenly re-appeared in New York, has been playing in several concerts, and the newspaper critics find him as rare a player and of as strong a magnetism as ever. Perhaps! But it is that whole kind of thing that fades out such much more fatally. Who cares now for the showy Fantasias, the "Marche Marocaine," &c., however wonderful as executions, when he can listen even here in little Boston to the finest and the rarest that there is in the classics of piano-forte power, with half-a-dozen capital pianists for interpreters?

There certainly was something remarkable in the playing of De Meyer; and we are tempted to look back 22 years and recall part of our record of a memorable evening. It was long before Thalberg or Jaell or Hatton or any of the famous ones had come; and it was when the modern virtuoso compositions, the Thalberg Fantasias, &c., were comparatively new to us with hands to leave them run.

The wonderful pianist had no sooner established himself in commodious and elegant quarters in Boston than the musical crowd were bidden to his rooms to have a preliminary taste of his quality. Some forty gentlemen were assembled, musical professors, amateurs, dilettanti, editors, in short the various [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] little musical world. With what feelings we went may be judged from the views we have lately expressed respecting the whole modern tendency of music. The [illegible] was [illegible] of the order which makes triumphal processions through the world. Its true Holy Land has quietly [illegible] from these thronged public routes, its miracles are far less dazzling, its celebration provided [illegible] reserved. Bach and Beethoven never had the success of these cosmopolitans; [illegible] were too deeply engaged. We were prepared to be astonished and delighted to hear something which might compare with Liszt and Thalberg in point of execution, though not perhaps in deeper qualities. We were not disappointed.

The genial, hearty manners of the man established at once a most free and familiar relation between him and his guests. Hospitality and comfort did away with all stiffness, and created that happy harmony of circumstances in which every mind finds itself into its own easiest natural attitude, so that there is no glow and nothing to [illegible]. So every one must cease to be a [illegible] and forget that he has any character to stand upon, and listen like a careless all-accepting child,

Lobe's Catechism of Music. Translated by Fanny Raymond Ritter. New York: Schuberth & Co.)

Lobe, as a writer on musical composition and aesthetics, is widely known and admired, but he deserves especial commendation for the clear and concise manner in which he has performed the difficult task of arranging the subject matter of this "Catechism." We do not know of any work, which in so equally small space, supplies the elements of music in the manner so comprehensive and satisfactory a manner as this. Of the merits of the translation we need not speak. Madame Ritter's name is a sufficient guaranty that her task has been performed with conscientiousness, good taste, and musical understanding. We regret that the little work has not been more correctly printed; [illegible] on the title-page we find "Bend" [illegible] for "Breadway." A more carefully revised edition should be issued by the publisher.

LOWELL, MASS.—The Citizen has the following item:

VOCAL MUSIC IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The committee on music presented a communication [illegible] their past [illegible] of the success attending the introduction of music in the public schools, and the committee in order which was adopted providing that they be [illegible] as [illegible] for each each of the [illegible] schools.

NEW YORK. Ernani, Lucia, Othello and the Ebreo are the operas for the week. MARETZEK'S first novelty for the season will be Don Bucefalo by Cagnoni, and is to be produced soon.

The first public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society will be given at the New York Academy on October 26th. The Society has just elected its officers for the year: President, Professor and Doctor R. Ogden Doremus. Vice President, U. C. Hill. Conductor, Carl Bergmann.

The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn announce a first rehearsal for Wednesday, October 23d. The first concert will take place on November 16th. The pieces to be performed are Beethoven's 5th symphony, op. 67, in C minor, Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain," [illegible] Austrian National Hymn" [illegible] orchestra, Haydn, and Mendelssohn's "Trumpet Overture." M. Theodore Thomas is engaged as conductor for the season.

The St. Louis Philharmonic Society is reorganized for the winter season, under a new leader, Mr. Egmont Froehlich. The first concert was announced for Thursday.

The French Opera has taken a firm hold on the affections of the New Yorkers, and is doing a much better business than Maretzek's Italian company. Offenbach's opera, La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein, [illegible] at each performance, by the [illegible] of the [illegible] singing and [illegible].

La Grange [illegible] appeared at the Academy of Music in [illegible] on Wednesday and Thursday, in the Operas of "The Barber of Seville" and "Don Pasquale." The remaining members of the troupe are Susini, Mancusi and Sarti.

A complimentary benefit was tendered on Tuesday evening to Miss Caroline Richings at the National Theatre, Washington, where she has been acting [illegible] her new [illegible] engagement. Benedict's Opera, "The Lily of Killarney," was produced on Wednesday by the company for the first time in this country.

BEETHOVEN. The following brief description of our old friend and fellow worker's good works, found in the Church Choirmaster and Organist (London) will gratify our readers.

Chronologisches Verzeichniss der Werke Ludwig van Beethovens. Von ALEXANDER W. THAYER. Berlin: Ferd. and Schneider.

Ludwig van Beethovens Leben. Von ALEXANDER WHEELOCK THAYER. Nach dem Original Manuscript Deutsch bearbeitet. Erster Band. Berlin: 1866. Ferdinand Schneider.

Mr. Thayer's interesting and valuable chronological catalogue of the works of Beethoven, so frequently of late [illegible] under our attention by the authors of the analytical programmes of the "Monday Popular" and Crystal Palace Concerts, has at length been followed by the [illegible] of the first instalment of his long-promised Life of Beethoven. As has seldom happened in the case of a new work, this has appeared in the form of a German translation of the original English manuscript. The impossibility of procuring a publisher for the publication of his work in English and [illegible] suggested the unusual course to the author, [illegible] the alternative must have been the relinquishment of the post he holds as American Consul at Trieste. Disappointing as this course must be to many English admirers, the work when it appears in English will doubtless be all the more perfect for the fact of its having been preceded by the German edition; the publication of which, Mr. Thayer expresses the hope, will, by leading criticism, not only enable him to substantiate the truth of doubtful points but provide him with additional particulars. From the[illegible] circumstances, which, as is well known to those who are most interested in the matter, the accomplished American amateur has for the last sixteen or seventeen years devoted himself to collecting materials for a biography of the great German composer, it is easy to believe that his book [illegible] nothing as, in fact, the truth of which [illegible] to verify. Having to the [illegible] and the unreliable character of all the existing biographies of Beethoven, just such a work as Mr. Thayer's gave ... to be a long-completed want needed. Its early completion and its appearance in English, are therefore much to be wished for. Only a small portion of Beethoven's [illegible] is [illegible] in the first volume; as far as it goes, this is vividly depicted with due [illegible] exactness, in a plain, straightforward and most interesting manner.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH MUSICAL TASTE.—In nothing is the obvious difference between the French and the English character more striking than in their musical tastes. The music of [illegible] [illegible] which have produced [illegible] [illegible] with us, and we ourselves exhibit no special preference for the works of our native composers. At the same time, the musical taste of [illegible] very decidedly in the scale of Germany rather than to that of Italy. The Sedanah's world [illegible] the heart of the nation is with the German: from Handel to Mendelssohn and Schubert, and in every concert at which the taste of the more intelligent classes of English society are consulted the predominance of Germany is almost universal. In France, everything is different. The programme of the music performed at the Paris Exhibition building on the 13th of July was such as would be simply impossible in England. With the exception of [illegible] from Judas Maccabeus, every one of the eleven pieces to be performed [illegible] the composition of a French man, [illegible] German or Italian who wrote for the French stage, or who has made Paris his permanent home. Gluck and Meyerbeer represent the former, and Sacchini the latter class; while the rest of the pieces are the work of the [illegible] French writers—Boildieu, Auber, Gounod, David, Adolph Adam, and [illegible]. Of the specimens [illegible] a operatic exercise [illegible] Iphigenie en Aulide was [illegible] known to represent the orchestral [illegible] of his day; the short selection from Armide is [illegible] that could be used for performance by a monster band and chorus being light and [illegible], and [illegible] of grace, [illegible] grace. For the performance of such a thundering piece as the chorus of [illegible] we [illegible] [illegible] contrast between these two specimens of [illegible] and of the smiling, heart-beating [illegible] in Les Danaides, [illegible] the selection from Roi de Lahore has only one [illegible]. But to make the music of one of the greatest of [illegible] composers sound poor [illegible] and formal [illegible] is easy enough, and [illegible] the aid of a blare of brass instruments and beating of drums and cymbals, and French composers [illegible] to be respects than those of any nation. But to play these compositions, crashes in contrast with the pure and simplicity of Gluck's orchestration is as serious [illegible] as was ever made at an English concert at the Eng [illegible] provincial festival. And not less than that can scarcely be said.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Since the death of the Prince Consort, the Queen has played only sacred music, and that chiefly on the harmonium. The [illegible] musician who taught her this instrument is now engaged in arranging for [illegible] for Her Majesty's use all the modern oratorios by Costa, Schachner, &c. The arrangements are also [illegible] to be published.—Athenaeum.

The London Orchestra says: "The Americans are to have a great musical festival next year in Boston. Several of our concerts [illegible]—among them Mrs. Sherrington—have been applied to by the promoters, and it is anticipated that the old country will be worthily represented among the principal artists taking part in the scheme."

The "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

BY A. OULIBICHEFF.

(Translated from the German for this Journal.)

We come now to Mozart's last and most perfect creations in the Symphony kind: the works in G minor and in C. They are almost twin sisters, for they were produced only a month apart. Although these sisters are incomparably beautiful, they differ none the less in features and in character. A dilettante of the eighteenth century would have compared the younger to Minerva, accompanied by Apollo and the Muses, and the elder to Venus weeping over the death of Adonis; and he would have recognized in the one all the attributes of the heart, in the other all the gifts of the mind.

* * * * *

The sum of all kinds, all expressions, all contrasts, has bequeathed in one last work, in which instead of the elegiac ode (Symphony in G minor) with its most sorrowful outpourings, we find the Dithyramb raised to the highest pitch of splendor, of enthusiasm, of sublime Pindaric intoxication and bewilderment. The Symphony in C shows on what glorious inspirations lifted Mozart's soul from the things of to-day to a better morrow, in the midst of the sorrows which he has just related to us (in the G minor), sorrows inseparable from a doomed and already wavering life, from which each one of his masterworks took away with it a part, and of which already he began to feel the end so near.

One ought believe that the Symphony in C had been designed to glorify some extraordinary event in the annals of the world, some exceedingly happy and ever to be remembered victory! The kind singing pomp of the orchestra, which makes itself remarked from the much bee in all its might, decidedly denotes the joyfulness of victory as the general character of the work; but the Theme, which precedes this outbreak of victorious joy, is double. It consists of a sort of proclamation or fanfare, upon which follows a little questioning phrase in tied notes. That is the main thought, the fruitful theme, which by its developments engrosses upon the great jubilation of the Allegro a quite peculiar stamp of spirituality and conveyes itself to the soul as a presentiment of something after I know not what intellectual height which the poet hereon to reach, but which he only reaches toward the end of the Ode. There is nothing more majestic and more splendid than the expansions, transformations and analyses of the two fragments of this theme. The one resounds like the cascade of a forest brook, which the echoes in multiplied tones repeat to the mountains; the other figure, ever passing under different forms, the goal for which it strives, now flows under in the bass, now floats aloft upon the melody, and now gathered up in a powerful unison it mounts and descends by major harmony through the bits which are firmly held by the extreme voices of the orchestra and supported by the long-drawn tones of the trumpets. An incomparable, sublime effect. The middle portion one of the most beautiful examples of worked music, is for the greater part made out of an accessory thought. This is the previous, not to be forgotten song of the violins, with an accompaniment in pizzicato which, first heard in the Dominant, now transposed into E-flat major and treated as a subject, here foreruns the contrapuntal matter. Toward the close the song reappears in the Tonic as melody with new charms.

Andante, F major, 3-4 time. Whether the slow tempo follows a piece of energetic or of sad expression or comes in after the outburst of a jubilant enthusiasm, like the first Allegro of our Symphony, it always indicates that moment of repose of rest, of recreation or of intermission, which succeeds a spell of strong emotional activity. Here the suspension of the Ode, the Andante, gives us the image of a tranquil blissfulness, the pure height of enchantment. The theme, full of the most ravishing expression and as singable as a piece written for the voice, composes less tone than Mozart commonly allows to the actual thought with its modulations, in the putting together of the parts and the comes from the superabundance of accessory thoughts, the number and the peculiar euphony of the concurring motives. This succession of dim and odd details, mingled with long passages of dissonant syncopations and remotes, these phrases still sculptured in all their repetitions and sentences, spread over the piece a sort of twilight, while the ear hears itself with rapture, as the eye does as a thicket which the sunbeams penetrate perpendicularly, illuminating, sub-effing and peopling it with a thousand luminous forms. From time to time, though, some great opaque clouds obscure the blue of heaven. The soul feels the sting of a sudden pain, painful syncopations trouble the harmony; the Minor steps into the foreground and reigns through a succession of short-breathed and affrighted phrases; but these vapors without water, these unsubstantial shapes of terror, the humors of a moody mind, vanish as swiftly as they came. The sun prevails over all these impotent half-wills of the fleet weather; his radiant face reappears with the theme, and the heart soon sinks all of the beams of an unspeakable bliss. Mozart must have been satisfied with his Andante; we too are satisfied and very much so; though candidly we must confess that we prefer that in the G-minor Symphony.

After the composer has rested in this sentimental modulation, full of charm but very lyrical spirits unhealed since, and breaks forth with impetuous, truly buoyant in the Menuet, Allegretto, 3-4, which they commonly take Allegro. It is made after the technical pattern of the older one in G minor; apart from the difference of the ideas, which is very great. The same nimble, bony motives fill the two parts of the piece; but in the first they are presented in a simple melody, and in the second, which is much longer and more interesting, the composer has submitted them to the difficult test of wonderful contrapuntal play, after which comes a Coda of the wind instruments, not less wonderful than that in the other Menuet. The Trio is a graceful profile, and short galité by some energetic phrases in the Menuet, in which the obstinate tone, the E, blown in the octave by the trumpets, produces the finest effect.

Who could count the abominations which the learned ones of that day might have found in the Finale to the Symphony in C? How the fearful fugue with four subjects must have hunted their poor brains! This was neither BACH nor HANDEL, it was none of their acquaintance; it was MOZART. Where could they have found a measure for him, who had shattered their square and compass? Some of these criticisms have come down to us as monuments of their confinement fragments which we have noted elsewhere will suffice to give an idea of the difference between the old fugue (strict and regular) and the free fugue of Mozart, which does not subject itself to the methodical periods of the close and adorns nature of style. When we spoke of unity with variety as essential conditions of the fugue, we recognized that variety involved two principles: canonical imitation and contrast of melodies. Bach had exhausted the first means; Mozart understood how to turn to advantage from the second, which constituted more than aught else to lend the fugue a new organization. Mozart, who was not a less thorough-ephred canonist than Bach, but who was far more inventive [?] and incomparably bolder, wove into the contrapuntal web melodies so different from one another that one hardly conceives possible that they could legitimately stand side by side; and when the ear has finally concerned itself, can still take whether it can satisfy the ear. A general doubt, which the assertion soon turns to authorization. This Finale consists of four themes, which really do not look as if they were made to dwell together. Let the reader convince himself:

At the end of the piece the composer brings them all four forward, and the answer to no one of them is wanting. The union of imitation and contrast certainly could go no further.

With such modulation, full of boldness and of genius, with such freedom of style and incredible power of combination, with themes so opposite in character and outlines, with an orchestral accompaniment, in fine, consisting of [illegible] them to twenty [?] ... instruments after Mozart's manner the Fugue must naturally have expanded its effects and rendered itself applicable far beyond the almost limits ever dreamed of by the contrapuntists old and new. The fugue is no longer the mere abstract expression of mere art of counterpoint; it can become picture, translate itself into scene, paint a battle or anything that is positive, without any danger of falling into that kind of music which requires a programme.

To keep to one example, what then is the finale in the Symphony in C, which dazzles him who read and studies the hearer dizzy? It seems to me, that the Allegro is the sequel to the Grave (representing the emerging of Order out of Chaos) with which "The Creation" of Haydn begins. Light has illumined the abyss; the laws of creation are in full force; suddenly the elements, indignant at the new yoke, attempt a gigantic revolution to win back the old anarchy. Fire, Air, Earth and Water one by one desert their appointed places and commingle in the vortex, in which the germinating Order seems to sink forever; a sublime spectacle to contemplate, like every great rebellion of matter against mind, its ruler. But the propensity to relapse into chaos has been frozen; it serves, like order itself, the final ends of the eternal wisdom. The elemental forces may melt into one inextricable mass (the fugued portions of the piece), but they hear a voice which calls to them "Thus far and no farther" and in a moment all is disentangled, and the young universe comes forth victorious and beautiful from the midst of this frightful confusion (the portions composed in the melodic style upon the same motives.)

Here we see the fugued style come out from the psychologically included in and abstract expression, within which it had so far confined itself; and by its union with the simple style produce splendid analogies, to which neither the one nor the other could have attained singly. In this way Mozart seems to us the last word of the Flemish school, the greatest tendency of musical Art. Bach, who perfected the Fugue so far as it was possible within the strict limits and the partly conventional forms, which the contrapuntists of the seventeenth century had prescribed to him, lifted the style to a very lofty height of grandeur and of science. Our hero enhanced this grandeur and this science by the wonders of his orchestral accompaniment and by the expansion which he gave to the principles of contrast. He understood how to make the fugue on the highest degree melodious and expressive while he made it free. The old scholastic would have in pieces in his hands, and out of its ruins sprang his last and richest treasure, the queen of fugues, the work of works, the overture to Zauberflöte.

* * * We have recognized a material analogy in this Finale, with the ways which Haydn has adopted in the Introduction to the Creation. But all musical resemblances of this sort necessarily have their roots in a psychological analogy, inasmuch as the phenomena of the soul always find their correspondences in the phenomena of the outward world; accordingly in the Finale we may find the triumph of Order in the final supremacy of a thought, but wavers for a time amid the many and the formidable images hanging [?] at once. From lyrical enthusiasm the poet has passed into the state of ecstasy and clairvoyance; what he at first related, he now sees; his power of will, at first active and full of thought, becomes passive and mechanical; he seems to obey an influence from without, which subjugates, transports him, carries it him with vast illusions and whispers in his words, of which he is the mere echo. The human event, which he has been glorifying transforms itself into the second sight of the poet with the whole series of causes that have induced it, with the whole chain of consequences that must spring out of it; the past, the present and the future appear to him united yet clearly distinguishable, in the indivisible point in which they come in mutual contact, to reproduce each other and thus die. The mind yields itself to contemplation of the divine origin and foreordination of events, of the motive springs and directions, of forces and counter-forces, of the cooperation and the conflict of sympathetic and hostile influences, of the whole wonderful mechanism, in which at first it is aware of nothing but a vast, inexplicable confusion resolving into the form, according to one first analogy of moral order.

We see that nothing yields itself to interpretation more than the ideal meaning of pure music, and especially the meaning of a Fugue. Every one can explain it to himself in his own way, according to the chance the image which the hearing may chance to awaken in him. But whatever interpretation one may give to the Finale of our Symphony all will agree in one thing, that it will dazzle those who see it (in notes) and that it must make dizzy those who hear it; a dizziness of wonder and enchantment. One must needs hear the music to believe it possible; it seems not to be, if studied with the eyes.

An impartial but timid criticism might perhaps ask, whether Mozart has not exceeded his genius in this singular composition, in order as he may to be gigantic and sublime; whether we do not find in it an excess of boldness and transporting power; an excess of combinations and figures, of learned harmony and canon, a monstrous largeness in the laying out of the plan and details of the piece, a feeling of attention even to weariness, an overloading for the ear, and now and then an obvious and culpable contempt of the rules which still stand in force? The reader may be one who would refuse, with the whole force of his conviction and his musical sympathies, to join in such a judgment. Does not this music give one all that he can properly demand of it? Is it not in fact on one tenor of the sacred, which moves almost like delirium, denoting a degree of intellectual clairvoyance foreign to the normal state of man? Is it not that tremendous and eccentric power of thought, that shatters all his own forms of speech to remember them in new words, new constructions, like the things themselves which the poet has to say to us? Is it not in a word, the Dithyramb raised by music to its highest efficacy? In our view the Fugue in C is the masterwork of Mozart in the Symphonic kind and the highest expression of the kind itself, the highest standpoint. It is also the last effort of our hero in this branch of Art. Since Mozart could no further go, he composed no more Symphonies, and left to his followers the glory of lifting this kind even to the Drama, and of characterizing these productions by descriptive titles which the heavens never could have thought of.

[The author here proceeds to draw the often rising proclamation of Beethoven, in which we will not follow him. It is quite as remarkable as his appreciation of Mozart, and quite as blind as that is (to borrow his own word) "clairvoyant."—Ed.]

The Welsh Eisteddfod.

The origin of the Eisteddfod, or Congress of Bards, cannot be estimated with any degree of certainty. The general voice of the learned, however, places it in the time of Gruffydd ab Cynan, who was famous for encouraging poetry and music. About the year 1100, this Prince, seized a number of the most accomplished musicians from Ireland to assist him in forming a code of laws for reforming, he managed and correcting the art and practice of the Welsh bards who happened for a long time had indulged in the worst licentiousness always. Prince Gruffydd was Irish by birth, and had a natural leaning towards the music of his country; but in none of the annals of Welsh society can be satisfactorily traced at so early a date than his reign, and to the 24 measures of instrumental music conformable to the laws of harmony were proposed and settled at a congress at which he presided more than all some show of reason. It is for this the merit of having increased the most ancient and beautiful of the tunes attributed to Cambria, and of having thus introduced the art of written music in contradistinction to that of simple improvisation. A further coloring is given to this presumption by the strong resemblance in style between the oldest Welsh and Irish tunes, and by the frequent employment of the minor mode in both. The question now is impossible to decide, nor has it any direct influence on the real statement of the Eisteddfod, which was a triennial assembly of the bards for regulating and amending the laws of poetry and music; conferring degrees on their professors, and resolving on the rules of chief bard, the successful candidate for which occupied the chair of the Eisteddfod, a seat more worthy and skilful one himself should be found to displace him. These meetings, so early 1100, were held at Aberffraw, the Royal seat of the Princes of North Wales, at Dinevawr, the castle of the Princes of South Wales, and at Mathravel, the residence of the Princes of Powys. Notice of the Eisteddfod was publicly announced a year and a day in advance. Twelve umpires were selected by the candidates. These umpires were all ... in the Welsh ... in poetry, music and heraldry. It was their office to propose a subject for the bards to sing upon in any of the 24 metres, satire, personal abuse, and amorous effusions being forbidden. The bards were allowed a certain time to compose their poem, in place of some ... they recited or executed ... before the umpires. The unsuccessful candidates were obliged to acknowledge their defeat in writing and to pay homage and fees to the victor, who was installed forthwith in the chair of the Eisteddfod as supreme head of his art. The personal attendance of the Prince at the meetings and the liberal conditions imposed upon the candidates rendered the bardic honor a great distinction. Before the musical bard could claim to be drawn, the highest and ..., he was compelled to study three years as a neophyte, three as a graduate, and three as a bachelor; at the end of which period he was styled Dysgybl Dysgyblaidd or Master of Music. The fourth and last degree, that of Doctor (Pencerdd Athraw) was obtained after three years further application. A bard thus distinguished was expected to know 40 colons, 4 cadences 20 cyfeirdd, a cwlwm 24 measures and a gosteg, to understand all the subtleties and modulations of harmony, especially the 24 measures; and to explain them as they were written in the Llyfr Dosparth or book of musical divisions, to compose canons which practised bards should be unable to criticise; and to describe all the properties, dormant and sub-dormant notes, diatonic notes, data, or 4 changes, and every change of movement through the various keys. The cwlwm was a symmetrical piece of music with words; the colon, a fundamental subject or theme; the cyfeirdd a composition in harmony (or parts); the cadenza "masterly" piece of music (a somewhat vague definition); the caniad a song or tune; the gosteg, a prelude or overture. Thus every doctor, to be worthy of his diploma, was forced to exert himself in the composition of a tune, or rather to labor and ingenuity which now-a-days would puzzle the Eisteddfod men of any acquirements.

If the doctor was a harper he was supposed to know the three "famous" measures and the three "sea" measures, and to be able to play them in such a faultless manner that the established doctors should unanimously pronounce him competent as a performer, a composer, and a teacher. The caniad appear to have been the most elaborate and perfect pieces of music. The term "Eisteddfod" sometimes applied were equal to the term referred to [illegible] subjects; the three term applied were equal to the four [illegible] "one only" pieces. What originally [illegible] their powers, or what kind of pieces they were, it is impossible to make out; the memory of the bardic blessings have left them enveloped in obscurity. As there appears to have been a prescribed number of such, so many suppose them to be as formulae, resorted to the distinguishing of the bards were [illegible] to adapt as the basis of their own compositions; and hence we may say that the Welsh, and all their boasted genius for music, like the Scotch and Irish, trusted to a long succession of [illegible], but the art generally where they found it. They produced a great many tunes of [illegible], and the names of their authors and the dates of their compositions may only be guessed at through the [illegible] of the [illegible]. It is probably those ones are for the most part would accommodate them to would please an antiquity [illegible]. Amidst a [illegible] originality of style the [illegible] of attempting any national [illegible], the majority of them is a powerful argument against those who [illegible] that the early bards were [illegible] of counterpoint and harmony. All that the most assiduous exploration has been enabled to make out of the subject of the past [illegible] to establish the shadow of a shade the other way. If the Welsh knew harmony at all, it must be a harmony of the rudest kind. It is not too confidently [illegible] that they were considered skill in choruses in [illegible] but with the difference, we have seen no ancient specimens of their earlier music which seem to agree with the opinion. The Llyfr Ddysgeidiaeth, which contained all the acknowledged principles of the art, is what the Welsh [illegible] as a [illegible] for music flourishing period might have afforded such; these musicians [illegible] by the [illegible].

From what we have adduced, which at first sight would appear a great deal, it may be gathered that it rises to the highest musical doctrines recorded on the part of the aspiring bards, it is more sufficient to be known by heart a certain number of formulae [illegible] formulae, and always sufficient to be able to pronounce in the compass [illegible] of one sound, or, in fact, or if an instrument, to play these formulae upon the harp, the only instrument hardly esteemed by the bards, and considered the pipe, the most [illegible] three-stringed harp, and the tabor which [illegible] played, with a somewhat [illegible] influence. It is history of both of music we [illegible] and Church, the [illegible] and they are so as well as cheap, [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] are regarded as a corruption of the ancient [illegible], but if we are to reverse Giraldus Cambrensis, secretary to Henry II, who wrote a Welsh [illegible] in the century [illegible] to one [illegible] [illegible] or at least they having begun and ended in the key. Giraldus [illegible] the [illegible] did not sing in unison like the musicians of other countries, but in parts. We [illegible] that [illegible] however, [illegible] are merely the necessity of Giraldus as the capability of judging. His own account leaves no [illegible] of [illegible]. He says (according to Edward Jones, author of the Musical and Poetical Relicks of the Welsh Bards, as an [illegible] of [illegible] of Welsh music), "In a company of singers, as many different parts and voices are heard as there are performers, who all at length unite with organic melody in one consonance and the soft sweetness of B flat." That there should be as many "voices" as performers depended, we presume, on the self-ignorance and ability of the singers to make themselves [illegible], but that there should be so many parts to [illegible] another other. We are aware that Tallis, Bird, or Bull wrote in some in 40 parts, as a feat of skill, but we never heard of any body of singers attempting to [illegible], as any set of [illegible] [illegible] to hear it, as a trial of endurance. To write closely in four parts requires the most profound acquaintance with the laws of counterpoint, and the highest facility in their application—while some, that [illegible] parts renders good harmony impossible and so [illegible] [illegible] and confusion. We very much doubt whether the Welsh bards were a bit more skilled in part-writing than the Greeks, and we are quite sure that the excited Giraldus was perfectly ignorant of the matter. What he could discover "softer and sweeter" in B flat than in any other single note, moreover, we are at a loss to decide. It is a pity he did not attempt to explain his sensations more minutely.

One of the earliest and most famous Eisteddfods was that held by Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, in 1177 at Cardigan, where, in a friendly contention, the poetical bards of the north, and the minstrel bards of the south, were the victorious. At this assembly the most extensive privileges and franchises were conferred upon the bards. Music seems to have attained the highest perfection, according to Welsh authors, in the course of the 12th century and by means of the Eisteddfod was preserved from degeneration until the death of the last Llewelyn, and the imputed massacre of the bards by Edward I. in 1284—an event commemorated by the poet Gray in one of his most celebrated pieces. From that period until the year 1400 no record of the Eisteddfod was there. The bards appear to have devoted themselves particularly to inciting every rich and powerful chieftain [illegible] of [illegible] its [illegible] the [illegible] to be presumed the same family of the Welsh in tracing their descent to the remotest antiquity. The warlike deeds of the famous Owain Glyndwr gave a momentary revival to the spirit of the bards, and some poetry dedicated to that mystic hero, whose name [illegible] been made familiar in the mouths of men by Shakespeare, the bard of all countries, is still extant. But it was Henry VII, a Tudor, and a liberal patron of the bards, who revived the Eisteddfod, after a lengthened period of [illegible], and on the 26th of July 1523, Henry VIII. [illegible] the proclamation of poetry and music, [illegible] Eisteddfod held at Caerwys, in the county of Flint, "according to the old statute [illegible] [illegible] Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of Aberffraw." Again, after a long interval, Queen Elizabeth appointed commissioners to assemble an Eisteddfod, at the same place, in 1568, when Symwnt Vychan was created the chief bard. The same commissioners summoned another in 1581. At these meetings the skilled bards were [illegible] to their rights, and to [illegible] [illegible] the "not worthy" were commanded, on pain of being "apprehended and punished as vagabonds," to betake themselves to "some honest labor and [illegible] [illegible]." How wo [illegible] a statute be received in these days, when a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] and every degree [illegible] [illegible] their competency, or incompetency, without some [illegible]. It is probable that one or two further Eisteddfods were held in Elizabeth's reign, but the last Welsh harper of any celebrity, whose name we find recorded, was [illegible], of Glamorgan, who died at Keston in 1587. In the reign of George II., we read of one Powel, a Welsh harper, with whom the great composer Handel was so [illegible] that he wrote [illegible] for him, and [illegible] [illegible] harps [illegible], although, in some of his oratorios, he [illegible] use of the [illegible]. Can this Powel be the same as the Powell of whom we once had occasion to speak in a history of the Festivals of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester? The [illegible] of [illegible] for the Eisteddfod was [illegible] by Elizabeth in 1581 from which period until 1789 the Congress of Bards was discontinued. In that year, however, some influential gentlemen of Wales, with considerable exertions, succeeded in making the [illegible] celebration of an Eisteddfod as held at Caerwys, and premiums were offered to the most skilful competitors. Since then the institution has been maintained with few interruptions in the chief towns of the Principality by its votaries. About 30 years ago Mr Parry (Bardd Alaw) made the experiment at Denbigh of uniting some of the modern attractions of music with the ancient ceremony of the Eisteddfod. He was violently opposed by the mediæval Welsh party and of course by the Welsh musicians, who preferred keeping the matter in their own hands. He effected his purpose, however, after some pains. Italian and also English were among the singers, and a selection of sacred and secular music was performed, in which these celebrated vocalists were [illegible] by an ample orchestra and chorus. The innovation was rewarded by complete success, and the only wonder is that Mr Parry's example has not sooner led to good results.—London Musical World.

Cheap Music.

(From the London Orchestra.)

Among the many instances of cheap production within the last forty years, there is hardly any more conspicuous than that of printed music. It is, likewise, moreover, this peculiar feature, that whereas in most articles which have been greatly reduced in price, cheapness and inferiority are combined, in the supply of musical works the best and most classical are procured at the least cost. A Vocal Score of the "Messiah," which originally cost two guineas, can now be procured for a shilling; while the half-crown ballad of old is nearly marked at less than three or four shillings and is actually sold to the public at half that price. The trading production in vogue is fashionable; [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] cheapened, but the true lover of the art may indulge his taste at less than a tenth of the expenditure formerly necessary.

There are still, we believe, one or two old publishing houses who rejoice in a limited clientele who pay the full marked price for the music they purchase; and the accounts of some few antiquated Societies are swelled by the music supplied to their [illegible] being charged at the rate [illegible] on them [illegible] paper; but, as a rule, no one now thinks of paying more than the "half-price" at which music used formerly to be supplied to professors alone. The commencement of this reduction dates from about the reign of our Sailor King, when those who wished to economise were accustomed to purchase "new music at half-price" of a publisher named Wheeler in Soho-square. [illegible] publications were mostly non-copyright, were incorrectly engraved, and badly printed; but he drove a thriving trade for some time. [illegible] success brought another publisher into the field—a Mr Walker—in the same locality. Mr Walker was an educated man, and a man of taste; he was also an author, and the romance of "The Three Spaniards," at existing as the most sensational novel of the present day, was a marvellous favorite in the old circulating libraries. Walker produced a much better article than Wheeler; more correctly engraved, and with better paper and printing. His chief success lay in books of airs from Italian operas, easily and effectively arranged by Diabelli and others. These would be looked upon as contemptible in the present day, but they suited the powers and tastes of the bulk of pianoforte players of the time, and were the chief means—in the dearth of operatic barrel organs and music halls—by which Italian opera airs became known to the public.

In Sacred Music Mr Vincent Novello, whose influence in that department was [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible], [illegible] on abandoning the "half-price" system, and reduced the marked rate on the title-pages very considerably; the step was unpopular for a time with the profession, who feared their profits reduced, while the increased sale amply compensated the publisher for what was practically but a very slight reduction to him. The public, however, were great gainers, though the [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible] by indications of the "Reduced Price," a practice still in some cases continued by the present firm.

In a totally different direction, a movement was progressing which has had the greatest influence in rendering cheap music available for the masses. Moveable types had been in use in England and Holland for music printing from the early part of the [illegible] century, but they were exceedingly ugly and only available for the simplest kinds of vocal music. This method had been greatly improved [illegible] in Germany, and one or two of the German founts had been brought to England. The result is the early numbers of the celebrated "Harmonicon" was printed from one of these founts, which was subsequently entirely remodelled by Mr Clowes and rendered more available for general use. Three important serial works printed from this fount were published at one time, the "Musical," intended to inaugurate a complete edition of Handel's works, by Messrs Jones & Co. of Finsbury Pavement; "Sacred Minstrelsy," by Parker; and "The Musical Library" by Charles Knight. Both the last-named were under the supervision of Mr Ayrton, and contained excellent selections of music free of a somewhat too fragmentary character. At that time, however, the class to whom these works appealed were by no means inclined for large doses of classical music; and it was perhaps [illegible] to the weakness of the attempts that Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Haendel and others were tolerated at all.

None of these three works achieved any permanent success. Handel's works reached only "The Messiah" and "Acis and Galatea," and some years afterwards, when Mr Surman [illegible] "Judas Maccabæus," and commenced "Samson" and "Jephtha," neither of which, however, got beyond the first number. The "Sacred Minstrelsy" reached only two volumes, and Mr Knight's work came to an end after eight volumes—four instrumental and four vocal—had been published.

Shortly after this period, Mr Davidson of Whitefriars paid much at a very low rate sheet music printed from moveable types, with great success. Pains were taken to fit the public taste, and though not being confined to any particular school, and among merely as profitable that [illegible] well the sale [illegible] was successful, and to this day his publications have a constant sale.

The circulation of these several works made known, however, the great advantage of using types instead of pewter plates where large numbers were required, and from that time the use of the former method has been continually increasing, enabling the production of standard compositions at a price ludicrously low as compared with that of the same works printed from engraved plates.

We have no space to chronicle the cheap publications of following years, and we therefore pass on to the present time. The large publishing houses have been always reluctant to cultivate cheapness but Messrs Boosey took a leap in the dark in the [illegible]

[illegible] of their "Musical Cabinet," and have no doubt been rewarded at the happy result. It generally needs but a leader to take all the music publishers in the same direction, yet only Messrs. Chappell followed the example for a long time. Though Chappell's "Musical Magazine" has hardly been as successful as the other contemporary, there can be no doubt that generally it has been a success. Such publications make quantity and bulk their chief ground of appeal to the public, a dangerous plan where occasional failure is possible; for in many cases the last issue [illegible] of their issue [illegible] of others. The quantity of paper and printing in some of these works is enormous for the shilling which buys it. It has been quite needless, also, except for the purpose of [illegible] competition. Another large publishing house, however, has now taken the field in the same cause, and Cramer and Co. having laid the public under heavy obligations by reducing the price of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] supply of cheap [illegible]. Availing themselves of the type and printing with which they have printed [illegible] edition of Cramer's "Pianoforte Tutor" at a tenth of its original cost, making it the first number of a [illegible] "Educational Course," which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] one of the [illegible] works of modern times. The [illegible] to be provided for at a half the price of Boosey and Chappell's works they have already produced their "Vocal Gems," of which more may be learned in our advertising columns. And much more is promised in the same direction.

Of cheap Psalm and Hymn Books the same [illegible] and some hesitation [illegible] the chance offered and succeeded at the impossibility of finding a really good one. The one which now [illegible] the largest run are "Merrow" and "Hymns Ancient and Modern," [illegible] would be difficult to find a worse Hymn book than the one, or a worse Tune book than the other. We fear there is no speedy hope of the want of a really good book being supplied.

There is a sub-heading on our subject to which we have not even alluded, [illegible] to the excellent collections published under Mr. Hullah's auspices, and to much scattered part music spread and sent in [illegible] cheap form. The cheap publications of the Tonic Sol-fa schools [illegible] [illegible]. We hope to return to the consideration of these and other matters on a future occasion. In the interim we may congratulate the general public—and the public [illegible] [illegible] on at the amount of healthy and available material which modern times—unlike the cheapy City clerks—quite independent of any projected Cheap Reading Company and which promises to increase in quality in proportion as its [illegible] is increased.

Dr. Louis Veron.

The world of celebrities and literature has lost a [illegible] of art in its widest and most various forms—[illegible] were the attributes of Dr. Louis Veron, the Frenchman who has just closed a long and eventful career, that he might [illegible] the story of adventure as a [illegible] [illegible] that had not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. And there he was a Frenchman and a Parisian [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In order to tell Veron's eventful career [illegible] A physician, a quack, a [illegible] manager, a [illegible] [illegible] the keen favourer of the success of Napoleon's schemes, the supporter of the coup d'état, the zealous champion of the Emperor, a [illegible] and a protector, and the promoter of Meyerbeer in the French public [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] more [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]? What many were, a Frenchman, and a young Frenchman too from a [illegible] [illegible] thirty years to be [illegible] of [illegible], opera houses, [illegible] and [illegible] keep [illegible] [illegible] and retire with a modest fortune of £200,000! But Veron did this, and [illegible] [illegible] expected and—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] height of [illegible] in the [illegible]. His start was made by marrying the widow of a [illegible] [illegible]—the pâte Regnault—he then being a [illegible] [illegible]. He had gone nothing [illegible] [illegible], beyond which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his marriage with the [illegible] widow gave him the first start. On the [illegible] he invested those [illegible] [illegible] which afterwards secured [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he pulled out [illegible] the pâte with [illegible] [illegible] and today by [illegible] [illegible]. So much would have contented most [illegible] men, not Veron. He forsook medicine and went in for journalism, accepted an editorship and became a pal-

Moure. He founded the Revue de Paris; joined the Constitutionnel; introduced Halévy to the world by giving his works first light in the columns of the Revue. What bold and brilliant service he did in this arena can scarcely be measured; what warfare carried into the camp of the critics, what royal [illegible] [illegible] against [illegible] journalism, what breakings of ice and fierce against England, cannot be accurately determined, for much of Veron's writing was ephemeral—aided the stream of its power. But Fortune gave him a large [illegible] for bringing out Italian [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] introducing to the world Meyerbeer and Taglioni. Successful as he had been a medicine and [illegible], he [illegible] equally well in the career of [illegible] management. It is a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a special career in the records of [illegible] art. In 1831 he became manager of the French Opera and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] through the [illegible] [illegible] to Nassau [illegible] [illegible] brought out Halévy's "Juive" [illegible] "Huguenots" and "Robert le Diable"—[illegible] La Sylphide [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Nourrit and [illegible] [illegible]. Few years of these [illegible] labors, and he retired of opera management, not not before he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a fortune or [illegible]. Then living [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] In Assembly and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] M. Thiers, in the Constitutionnel, [illegible] fought for the Opposition; but after [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he turned the other [illegible]—the [illegible] Emperor [illegible] [illegible] M. Thiers overboard and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the approaching Empire. After [illegible] Napoleon was [illegible] Veron's services remained unrewarded, and in despair he abandoned politics and threw himself [illegible] [illegible] a Frenchman's and a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] patronage. He became a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so he had once [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] of a [illegible] of the [illegible] of France. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he expended from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and anecdotes were countless. In this peaceful manner he passed all Saturday last, when surrounded by friends and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he received the last [illegible] of the Church and calmly died. His career was [illegible] that of a Frenchman—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] wherever he undertook. His [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] brought him [illegible] brought him money, the money brought him opportunity in the [illegible] of a [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] a few years [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Each step was a rung in the ladder which led to enviable notoriety [illegible] to fame [illegible] [illegible] and if we measure Veron's life by the service he performed to the musical art, we shall find that it achieved results which can never be [illegible].—Orchestra.

Charles Gounod.

Whilst the growing favourable of "Romeo and Juliette" is still fresh in the public mind, [illegible] may we come a sketch of the life of [illegible] [illegible]—a man [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] been achieved in the face of many [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible], in the treatment of the [illegible] [illegible] of Shakespeare has been very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the masterpiece of Goethe. Charles François Gounod was born in Paris, June 17, [illegible]. He studied counterpoint at the Conservatoire under Halévy, the [illegible] and [illegible] of "La Juive," and received [illegible] in [illegible] composition first from Lesueur, and afterwards from Paër. In 1839 he carried off a second prize at the [illegible], and in 1839 obtained the [illegible] [illegible] for his cantata "Fernand." Being chosen in consequence of his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he proceeded to Rome and devoted himself to a careful study of ecclesiastical music. In 1843 Gounod [illegible] Vienna, and had performed, in the Church of St. Paul, a mass in the style of Palestrina, for voices only. Returning to Paris, he was appointed maître de chapelle to the church of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and until 1851 remained in comparative obscurity, it having been announced that he had taken holy orders. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the Athenaeum [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to M. Viardot, the author of [illegible] [illegible] works on art subjects, [illegible] [illegible] a concert given at St. Martin's Hall [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] compositions by an obscure [illegible] [illegible] Gounod. The writer stated that the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of no other composer, ancient or modern, either by its form, its melody or its harmony; that it was not new, if by such a term was meant [illegible] or [illegible], and yet old in the sense of dry and stiff; but that it was the work of an accomplished artist, and the poetry of a new poet. He then proceeded to remark that an evident and real impression had been produced upon the audience, but that it was from the music itself, and not from the reception accorded to it, that he felt justified in predicting for its author a far from common career. The paper from which the above is quoted was inserted in the Gazette Musicale de Paris, January [illegible] [illegible], and aroused the more curiosity [illegible] [illegible]

"Sappho," his first attempt at a [illegible] composition, was then [illegible] and [illegible] to be produced at the Opera. On April [illegible] of the same year it was performed for the first time, but its success was not equal to that anticipated for it by the composer's friends alone, in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], it [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], a [illegible] [illegible] of conventional forms, an [illegible] of stage effect, and a want of [illegible] of [illegible] in the [illegible]. In plain language, "Sappho" was a failure, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the entire work, and in latest [illegible] [illegible] a brilliant [illegible], convinced [illegible] critics that M. Gounod might safely [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In 1852 some [illegible] [illegible] for "Ulysse," a tragedy by M. Ponsard, were performed at the Théâtre Français. They were also performed in London about a [illegible] [illegible] for the benefit of the University College Hospital. The composer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], either by [illegible] of the [illegible] or by [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] and the chorus "[illegible] [illegible]" was the only one by which any [illegible] impression was made in London or Paris.

In "La Nonne Sanglante," a grand opera produced for the first time on 18th October, 1854, it was [illegible] [illegible] that M. Gounod had made [illegible] [illegible] as a dramatic composer, especially in respect to arrangement of [illegible] and instrumental [illegible]. On the [illegible] it was [illegible] and in parts decidedly weak. The features of [illegible] comprised a [illegible] in the last [illegible] [illegible] the whole of the second act, and an air and duet in the third act. "La Nonne Sanglante" was performed [illegible] [illegible] and was succeeded by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a setting of Molière's "Le Médecin malgré lui," produced at the Théâtre Lyrique in [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible]. The score [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the first act, an [illegible] chorus of wood-cutters [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] song for the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] passages, and a [illegible] [illegible] satisfactory overture. The instrumentation is charming throughout, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] constructed, and an affectation of antiquated forms [illegible] the flow of graceful and expressive melody. More than once [illegible] we meet a [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] "Faust," and were the comedy more accessible to operatic treatment "Le Médecin malgré lui" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and "The Mock Doctor" [illegible] achieved a greater measure of success than it enjoyed.

On the 19th March, 1859, "Faust" was produced at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris, but by [illegible] [illegible] with the success to which its merits entitled it. The French public seems slow to appreciate [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] phases, and the verdict of Germany was required before Gounod's masterpiece could be accorded a genuine welcome.

"Philémon et Baucis," a three-act opera, performed for the first time at the Théâtre Lyrique on the [illegible] February 1860, [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] chorus of Bacchantes, frequently performed at the late Mr. Alfred Mellon's promenade concerts and a few other agreeable morceaux [illegible] [illegible] known; but the subject of the drama is [illegible] and real inspiration is less apparent in this work than in most others from the same pen.

"La Reine de Saba," a grand opera with a [illegible] [illegible] has never succeeded anywhere. It contains many [illegible] features of [illegible] and as regards [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] superior to "Faust." It has occasionally been performed in a [illegible] form at the Crystal Palace [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] "Irene." It includes a magnificent march and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ballet music, and one [illegible] [illegible] choruses. As a whole, however, it is deficient in variety, a fault chiefly referable to the character of the [illegible].

In 1864 "Mirella," an Italian version of the French "Mireille," [illegible] by M. Michel Carré from the pastoral "Mirèio," was produced with partial success at Her Majesty's Theatre. The [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] by the author never became popular, and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and some of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] proved [illegible] brilliant

In Paris "Mireille" was afterwards compressed, and brought out with some success in a three-act form; but it has been a stranger to London since the season of its first performance.

M. Gounod, as we have already stated, originally gave his attention to church music, a style of composition that he has turned to account largely in [illegible] and "Faust," and more sparingly in "Mireille." He is the author of masses, psalms, and motets for a single or double chorus, for voices alone, or combined with the orchestra. The grand mass of St. Cecilia has established its claims as a favorite both in London and the provinces, [illegible] with organ and harp accompaniment being given periodically at one of the fashionable west-end churches. "Tobie," a "sacred drama," a setting of the psalm "By the waters of Babylon," and some minor pieces, were performed for the first time in England a little less than a year ago, but without creating any favourable impression.

In his dramatic compositions the author of "Faust" exhibits considerable variety, rich and luminous orchestral colouring, [illegible] powerful choral effects and a remarkable spirit of poetry. His recitative is usually expressive, but he fails as regards breadth of form, and dramatic [illegible]. His melody is [illegible], but seldom strikingly original; conventional forms are to a certain extent disregarded, and there is an evident distaste for the elaborate finales affected by writers of the Rossinian school. In "Roméo et Juliette" appears the adoption of a theory indicated in "Faust" and "La Reine de Saba," and exhibited with so very pleasing results in the "Lohengrin" and "Tristan and Isolde" of Richard Wagner. The [illegible] of the future is the subordination of sound and the other arts to poetry, a doctrine [illegible] illustrated in the second and fifth acts of M. Gounod's latest opera.

It may be added, in conclusion, that the subject of our sketch married one of the daughters of the late M. Zimmermann. In 1852 he became manager of the "Orphéon," a choral [illegible] of the Communal Musical Schools in Paris, but he has [illegible] resigned his post [illegible] to composition. A new comic opera, [illegible] by him a year or two ago, has not yet been completed; and it is a matter [illegible] to learn that M. Gounod should now be [illegible] his energies on a musical drama [illegible] "Francesca di Rimini."

Every one who has travelled during the last forty years through the beautiful country of Thuringia must certainly have met with an old man who belonged, so to speak, to the characteristic figures of the landscape. Many persons may not so much as have heard his name, but merely have carried away with them the recollection of an individual somewhat deranged in mind; others, however, may have made themselves acquainted with the history of "the old Capellmeister," as he was always familiarly called. One thing is very certain: the old man led a restless wandering life, and was everywhere to be found and everywhere at home throughout the length and breadth of Thuringia. In figure he was thin, of medium height, and bent a little forward. Thinly and poorly clad, he went about carrying under his arm a paper parcel, which contained music for sale. His high, broad forehead, and noble features, however, stamped him as no ordinary man, and a closer examination discovered that [illegible] expression of the eye [illegible] a sure sign of previous or present mental derangement, and [illegible] as [illegible]. [illegible] would naturally [illegible] anything of the sort, and if [illegible] he was reminded of it, his blue eyes flashed in a truly [illegible] manner. For forty years the old man wandered [illegible] about Thuringia, besides taking long and [illegible] journeys elsewhere. [illegible] in the course of [illegible] of such a striking personage [illegible] were an indispensable part of the landscape. Any one fortunate enough to hear the strange old man, who had [illegible] perhaps, not long before, a piece of bread for a few [illegible]—sitting down [illegible] the organ, could not help feeling that [illegible] genius [illegible]. Such indeed was the case. In his younger years, [illegible] in the full strength of youth, Louis Böhner, for he it was who [illegible] the old Capellmeister, [illegible] among the most remarkable professors of the musical art, and was the object of great [illegible].

Thuringia, in the duchy of Gotha, where he was born on the [illegible] January 1787, was the principal [illegible] during the forty years of his restless wanderings in Thuringia. His first musical studies were pursued under his father, an organist and parish [illegible], and [illegible] in composition [illegible] himself. His attention was directed mostly to the scores of Bach, Fasch, [illegible], [illegible] Haydn and Mozart [illegible] and [illegible] theatrical orchestra. It was not, however, till he went to Erfurt, in his [illegible] year, to attend the Gymnasium there, that he followed any regular plan in his musical studies. Soon after he [illegible] the [illegible] for his [illegible] revealed. The [illegible] of Thuringia was at that time [illegible] in Gotha, [illegible] in order to [illegible] under Spohr's direction. Spohr took a great liking to him, soon perceiving [illegible] of appearing as [illegible] at the Court of Gotha, and very soon the young man had [illegible] music-master. In the year 1808 [illegible] Jena, where he remained two years. [illegible] with [illegible] music and [illegible] the [illegible] the spring of [illegible] his pilgrimage. His great concerts [illegible] towns. At [illegible] more than usually [illegible] to proceed to Vienna, but his place [illegible] his passport and not been [illegible] by the Austrian Ambassador at Dresden, [illegible] at Linz, he returned to Nuremberg. [illegible] with open arms by the friends [illegible] and [illegible] quite at home. He remained in this town [illegible] during which he resided, free from care [illegible] of a friend [illegible] composing and playing in public very [illegible] continued to [illegible] west and more. His works met with the most decided [illegible] and were [illegible] by the leading publishers, such as Breitkopf and Härtel, Hofmeister, etc.

Whether it was that the death of his grandmother and grandmother of his father and mother, and of several of his brothers and sisters, [illegible] in rapid succession, proved too [illegible] a shock for him, or whether [illegible] experience and [illegible] other [illegible] obscured the [illegible] of [illegible] one thing is certain: his [illegible] began more than [illegible] proofs of [illegible] derangement. The [illegible] highly [illegible] by every one [illegible] manner, [illegible] when [illegible] I must [illegible] that, under such [illegible] he was found to be impossible to remain longer by his friend's hospitable hearth, but fled from out into the wide world. Henceforth he never more found repose. At that period [illegible] the Fury of War [illegible] and [illegible] a profession [illegible]. We see [illegible] in his flight, without stopping long anywhere, through Wurtemberg, [illegible] Switzerland, [illegible] and [illegible] larger towns. [illegible] through Wurtemberg and Bavaria, he again reached Leipsic, where he made a long stay. His concerts at the Gewandhaus [illegible] and Gottfried Weber [illegible] the [illegible] Böhner gained [illegible] great honors and considerable sums of money [illegible] to Weimar and Gotha, performing at the Courts of both places. In spite of all the [illegible] his [illegible] and so the overlooking [illegible] with which the [illegible] the [illegible] at Leipsic, [illegible] to remain in Leipsic, [illegible] and [illegible] go forth to seek an [illegible] future.

He proceeded in [illegible] by the way of Frankfort to the Rhine and [illegible] the bold [illegible] beyond the boundaries of Germany. It seemed as though [illegible] were [illegible] for him the [illegible] and [illegible] of Life, but [illegible] would [illegible] it. Böhner first [illegible] his steps to Hamburg. [illegible] Bremen and Oldenburg, whither he made some few trips, he met with [illegible] the [illegible] his great [illegible] and his [illegible] performances. The [illegible] he [illegible] in Hamburg [illegible] him [illegible] and [illegible] his reputation, [illegible] a brilliant welcome [illegible] year in Copenhagen. He [illegible] in the [illegible] and lectures. He [illegible] at Court, and was the King's guest. [illegible] of his [illegible] that we [illegible] the fact of his throwing [illegible] and of [illegible] house [illegible] the most refined [illegible]. All Copenhagen, particularly the female world, had paid him the homage of [illegible] besides [illegible] he [illegible] on that without bag or baggage, and [illegible] long time wandered about on the high roads or in the forests. At length he [illegible] at Copenhagen, and embarked for Rostock. Thence he walked to Schwerin and from Schwerin to Hamburgh. Never until he had [illegible] he did not even then [illegible] a house, but every day walked almost [illegible] Without stopping anywhere he pursued his romantic way through Hanover, [illegible] and Northeim to Gotha, and the reader may conceive [illegible] he [illegible] his luggage, and it included several valuable manuscripts [illegible] him, though [illegible] he had sent it off by the post from Copenhagen. How terrible his journey must have been may be inferred from the fact that once in the neighborhood of Hamburgh he was nearly swallowed up in a swamp, having [illegible] lost his way in a wood, at dead with the [illegible].

From this time he settled in his native town of Tonndorf, if indeed, "settled" is the correct term for it was now that his restless [illegible] up and down Thuringia began [illegible] which lasted almost without interruption from the year 1820 to the year 1860, the year of his death, and [illegible] to be known to both old and young as "the old Capellmeister." There are numerous episodes and anecdotes [illegible] of him during that period. It is [illegible] from many of them [illegible] he suffered more or less from delusions, but in spite of them these spoke the highly gifted artist, who in [illegible] and [illegible] could not entirely forget himself and all around [illegible] the sense of [illegible]. "Full of [illegible]" says his [illegible] friend, [illegible] von der [illegible], "were his [illegible] of [illegible] when [illegible] he frequently could [illegible] for days and nights [illegible] which [illegible] uninterrupted [illegible] Had he not worn the [illegible] of a beggar he might have been [illegible] the most experienced [illegible].

For forty years, that is up to 1860, did he wander thus restlessly about. At the beginning of 1860 (on the 28th of March) he died rather suddenly in Gotha, in consequence of a severe cold caught on one of his peregrinations which he had been induced by [illegible]. His friend, L. Storch, [illegible] in the Gartenlaube. Böhner felt deeply offended because the occasional fits of mental derangement to which he was subject had been too plainly hinted at by his friend. He determined to go to Leipsic for the purpose of persuading the editor of the periodical to [illegible] biography. All the arguments of his friends at Gotha were unavailing to [illegible] from his project. He started, but got no further than Erfurt, whence he was obliged to return to Gotha. After [illegible] his bed for a short time, he expired, [illegible] that report which he did [illegible] in life.

His compositions are numerous. They [illegible] the [illegible] light spirit [illegible] great model, Mozart. [illegible], [illegible] productions, which he sold in manuscript during his wanderings. At any rate, many of his small songs have been [illegible] by [illegible] in Thuringia, [illegible] many [illegible] a Thuringian folk's-song [illegible] him. We will [illegible] only of the [illegible] "[illegible]" etc. [illegible] perhaps, [illegible] what foundation there is for the report that C. M. von Weber borrowed some of the finest melodies in Der Freischütz [illegible] "Bridal Chorus" for instance, from Thuringian folk's-songs [illegible] from Böhner. Though the [illegible] Weber did not reap in [illegible] that does not say that [illegible] of [illegible] might [illegible] retained a [illegible] of his [illegible] reproduced in his own [illegible] have been reproduced at the proper time. Böhner himself [illegible] to have expressed [illegible] on this subject. Many of his orchestral compositions deserve to be rescued from oblivion, [illegible] very [illegible] superior to the mediocre productions with which the managers of our [illegible] Garden Concerts are accustomed to [illegible] us.

Carl Sentz is giving [illegible] orchestral concerts in Philadelphia. The orchestra is large [illegible] and [illegible]. The performance [illegible] of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn, though Wagner sometimes finds a place.

Mendelssohn's Reformation symphony is to be produced in London.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

(Concluded.)

V.

11. With the "Sicut locutus est" Mary's song of praise is properly ended. But for a more definite rounding off of the Magnificat, the verse: "Gloria Patri, gloria Filio, gloria Spiritui Sancto! Sicut erat in principio, et nunc, et semper, et in secula seculorum. Amen," is added, each verse summing up the whole in a grand broad feeling.

This concluding piece is divided in its outward structure into two main parts, the first taking the words "Gloria Patri," &c., and the second the "Sicut erat in principio, (As it was in the beginning) &c. The five chorus parts, accompanied by the orchestra with the exception of the trumpets and drums, which only come in at the "gloria Spiritui Sancto" and the organ, break out at first in a short, energetic exclamation: "Gloria!" Thereupon the Organ, tasto solo, holds out the deep A as organ-point upon which now an unprecedented tone-picture builds itself up. The Bass followed by the other voice parts at intervals of half a measure, unfolds a short further accompaniment a strongly soaring triplet figure, which, after traversing three bars, plunges into the "gloria Patri" flashing on with super-earthly splendor when the orchestra again falls in with all its might, resuming that loud exclamation. These sweeping events are repeated on the organ-point D again reversing the order in which the voices enter, in the "gloria Filio" and then again upon the organ-point B, but with a new motive in the "gloria Spiritui sancto."—The voices in the eager rush of their ascent so storm where God seems to tumble over one another until the need of consonancy again unites them upon far-resounding forte chords; they seem to wish to take heaven by storm, but to sink upon their knees, not crushed but jubilant, before this eternal splendor. And here right clearly Music claims the power proud to itself alone, of representing highest transcendental moods as a reality; the expressive faculty of other arts is very far from reaching in that direction.

After this introduction follows the second half of the above, with the words: "Sicut erat in principio, et nunc, et semper et in secula seculorum. Amen." Bach here turns back to the opening number of the work letting its leading motive float before us once more in a condensed form. The satisfactory rounding off thus given to the whole work is worthy, in keeping with the preceding scene of perfect beauty.

Having thus subjected each single number of the Magnificat to a special consideration with an attempt to show its high worth, it now remains to us to consider the work as a whole. The fuller the discussion has been thus far, the shorter we can afford to make it now.

Each one of Bach's works shows the most consistent and decided mood, one thought, one tone of feeling running through the whole. To our time, pre-occupied so greatly by particulars, it is almost incomprehensible how the old masters, with all their love of detail, knew how to keep the eye always clear and free, so as never to neglect for that the general fundamental relations and their harmonious connection. Those artists' feeling was altogether unitary—a pure, transparent atmosphere spreads itself unclouded over their works; a uniform light, the refraction of the artist's own calm soul, pervades the world, with all its images, of their creation. Nowhere do you perceive aught that is accidental or superfluous; on the contrary each one thing so necessarily conditions every other, that all seems to have sprung as from a common central point. Our Magnificat confirms this observation. In all the variety that it affords in single parts, in the most violent contrasts that appear each other in spite of the ever growing climax, there still reigns in the whole a childlike naiveté, which solves all difficulties in its play and in complete unconsciousness dares to attempt the highest and achieves it. Bach was really a whole man, whose sense I [illegible] contradictions; in the detail of his work he loved to bring it together as a [illegible] and crystalline, rejecting everything extraneous so stubbornly with him the largest relations unite in one whole, which suffers nothing inharmonious to bear part in it.

Before such true greatness all criticism ceases; it can only yield itself a tender listener and observer to the wonderful achievements of the Master. If I can answer to negative attributes, be sparingly on such works it may interest to add it all the more positively for that. In this sense we permit ourselves a few passing remarks.

In form the Magnificat is distinguished from many other church works of Bach by the particularly concise short form both of the choruses and solo songs. The latter especially show a great precision of contour: if the ground form of the Aria, the true da capo, is perceptible, still it appears in few [illegible] than actually worked out. This was partly conditioned by the text, which in the single verses offers but little of occasion; partly by the general course of the work, which in its very nature moves on steadily and depends thereby.—In the same way the choruses, perhaps with the exception of the first, are kept more condensed and compact, and give most valid proof of what self-limitation Bach was capable upon occasion.

The treatment of the vocal parts must be called in general very happy and successful. Nowhere is the singer obliged to make use of the unusual registers of his organ; he can preserve its strength and freshness to the end. The melodies are for the most part easy to take up, always impressive, and thus facilitate an expressive rendering.

The orchestra, likewise, offers no especial difficulties, with the exception of the trumpets, of which to be sure things are expected which our modern technique can no more accomplish, all is convenient of execution.

Accordingly, so far as the work itself is concerned the way is made smooth for bringing it fitly before the world; and we trust that it has only needed these hints to help secure it this its good right. It is certainly high time to work against the whole repertoire by of taste by the revival of these and similar creations of the olden Art. The performance of the Matthew Passion through Mendelssohn was an epoch-making act, which woke to new life the darling child of the Bach Muse lying in the stiff sleep of death: may such deeds soon be done, and in great number, with regard to similar works of the Master! A work of Art first gains its true significance when it can actually exercise before all the world the power which the artist has lent to it. He has done his duty, now let those, who call themselves his followers, do theirs! The public can only be the gainer by such efforts. * * *

Symphony Concerts.

The feasts of great orchestral music now come round again. The Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, which have won so good a name by keeping up to their mark so truly for two or three years past, began again on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 7, with a larger subscription than before already secured and with prospect of a very interesting season. The programme of the opening Concert, partly by design and partly as a short way out of unexpected difficulties in making up a programme, on account of disappointments in the hope of solo artists, will be an experiment. For once it is proposed to give a regular Sorba programme, after the model of the Symphony Soirées of the Royal Orchestra, which for many years have invariably consisted of two Symphonies and two Overtures,—nothing else. In this case, however, the strain of constant listening to full orchestra (imaginary to a great extent) will be relieved by a choice vocal solo between each Overture and Symphony. Whether such a selection can prove enjoyable to a whole audience depends entirely upon what Symphonies and Overtures are played. They must not be too long, nor "heavy" (in respect of poetry meaning heavy) and they must be well contrasted. These conditions, we think, are answered in the selection of this programme.

PART I.

Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," Op. 124	Beethoven.
Tenor Aria from the "Seraglio,"	Mozart.
Symphony in C, ("Jupiter")	"

PART II.

Overture: "In the Highlands,"	Gade.
Songs,	Schubert.
"Scotch" Symphony	Mendelssohn.

Here the course of the first part is of the older classical period in its highest bloom; while that of the second is modern and romantic, in its way also of the best. Both Symphonies have long been popular and always taking with a Boston audience; each is full of life, variety and sparkle in itself; for a good Symphony is not merely one long piece, it is a well contrasted variety of pieces which relieve one another by contrast of rhythm, mood of feeling, colour and whole character;—so much so that a Symphony is in itself the best type of a true programme. It is mere fancy, therefore, when people talk of the monotony of listening to a good Symphony! Besides, a Concerto is in form and length and genius (where it has any) a Symphony; and it is yet in place of the usual piano or violin Concerto that we now put the second Symphony: the only difference being that there is not the extramusical, personal interest about one artist brought virtuoso-like into the foreground.

All of the four pieces are new to these Concerts, and the two Overtures are wholly new to a Boston audience. That by Beethoven, written for the opening of a theatre in Vienna, is exceedingly grand, broad, solemn, almost churchlike in the beginning with prolonged passages for the first horns, the bassoons, the 'cellos, &c., tasking the full powers of the orchestra, which work themselves up by degrees into an accumulating ... another one, that finds vent in a rapid finale with a vigorous, quaint Handelian sort of theme, that is wrought up contrapuntally together with a second theme. It cannot fail to arouse and please. And it may be interesting to compare this ending of the Beethoven Overture with the Jupiter fugue Finale with four subjects to the Mozart Symphony which follows.

The Gade Overture: "Im Hochland" is a short, delicious, perfectly characteristic and piquant tone-picture,—one of his most genial and happy works; no better prelude could there be, we fancy, to the Scotch Symphony of Mendelssohn. —As for the vocal pieces, the "Cavatina" aria from the "Entführung aus dem Serail," is both as song and orchestral accompaniment about the loveliest and richest of all Mozart's tenor songs, and we believe the person has been found to sing it as it should be sung.

Should the experiment of the two Symphonies take well with the audience, it will afford a capital resource whenever a new plan of programme is urged, once and over again mentioned, by ... the world allow us to hear as many more good Symphonies in the course of the winter; especially would it furnish the long desired opportunity of hearing more of the light and cheerful ones of Father Haydn; one of these would always give good appetite for a Beethoven or one of the more modern.

The matter of the rest of the eight concerts is not yet all determined. Of Symphonies we shall probably have (and perhaps in this order, as small unless there should be two given in one concert) the No. 4, in B flat, of Beethoven; one by Haydn; the D minor again of Schumann; the great one in C by Schubert; another one (in B flat) by Gade; the first (in B flat) by Schumann; and finally the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which next to reach ... and made too deep an impression last year to leave any excuse for letting such an experience lie unimproved.

Among the list of Overtures will be Cherubini's to Medea, and perhaps some others. CARL ROSA is to prepare for Beethoven's Violin Concerto, which he will no doubt render in as exquisite a style of art as he did that of Mendelssohn. Mr. LEONHARD will play Chopin's E-minor Concerto; Mr. LANG the first of the five Beethoven Concertos, the only one that we have not yet heard. Mozart's Concerto for two pianos will be contributed by Messrs. PARKER and LANG; and there is hope that we shall hear again the great E-flat Concerto of Beethoven, that by Schumann, &c., for we have other masterly interpreters who have these concertos and cannot spare them. Mrs. CARY, too, will give us some more of the sincere, deep melody of Bach and others; and other songs will be announced from time to time; for it is proposed this time to keep the piano-playing within more moderate limits, one piece only in a programme, and that of course with orchestra, and to call in the voice more often if the fine voice, when found, gives out too easy.

Mr. ZERRAHN is earnestly schooling his Orchestra, which will soon be larger and stronger than ever before. Certainly the wind department is materially improved, and the strings will be at least as many and as good as before, and are likely to gain in number and quality as the concerts go on. We shall greatly miss the Quintette Club, to be sure; but they will reassure their places are long. Yet, means will be found to make their places good, even if the Association have to "call spirits from the vasty deep."

Meanwhile, large as the subscription has been, there are plenty of good seats left, and every one now taken goes so far toward building up the orchestra into the full strength and proportions which Beethoven and the Music Hall demand.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY. The Teachers of this thriving young Institution gave their pupils and friends a musical treat, on Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 16, in the Tremont Temple. Mr. TILTON opened with the smaller Bach Fugue in G minor on the Organ, which his not sound as if in very good condition,—at least it cuts in ... in the Organ of the Music Hall. Three movements from Schubert's wonderful B-flat Trio (op. 100), were excellently well played by Messrs. EICHBERG & SUCK and LEONHARD, giving us more study for such a pleasure that such a trio could be so large a room. Mendelssohn's "Zuleika" and Schubert's "Fischer" were sung in a sweet, sincere, with good conception, but timidly by Miss FULLER. Next came a sentimental cornet solo, (Salve Maria by Mercadante) skilfully played, with excellent tone, by Mr. ARBUCKLE, well accompanied on the piano by Mr. SHARLAND. Messrs. Eichberg and Leonhard followed with the Adagio Cantabile and Scherzo from Beethoven's Violin and Piano Sonata in C minor, op. 30, No. 2. Mr. KREISSMANN sang the tender Aria "Unis dès la plus tendre enfance" of Pylades in Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, and, according to the ... grotesque Organ variations on "Old Hundred." Schumann's impassioned "Du meine Seel," instead of "Sangs" (as set down on the bill) by "Franz." The whole ended with Mr. Eichberg's Ave Maria, for violin, piano, cabinet organ and alto, played by himself, Messrs. Dow, Thayer and Suck. Mr. Kreissmann's song pledge may well have been disappointed by the intermission of these Variations! And indeed all the classic pieces were somewhat ... of unsuited ... suffered by intermingling with such things as that and several solos. That the taste of the crowd, so fresh and innocent to look upon, was very juvenile and unripe, was plain from the fact that the solo encores were awakened by the cornet and the pedal heavy-shows on the Organ. With a little easy modification it would have been a nice concert.

MR. PECK'S "GRAND SACRED CONCERT" last Sunday evening drew a large audience to the Music Hall, which has been so long under his faithful superintendence. There were not a few good things in the Concert, and some that would have been good by any name but "sacred." Sig. FERRANTI'S frank, genuine Buffo that he is, proved up to nothing else, must have had an awkward sacred feeling in a queer position. But it is not so much the fault of the singers as the concert-giver that all the concerts on a Sunday have to make believe sacred. It is the fault of the Law, or rather of the remnant of the law, of the strict Sabbatarianism which a part of a free people insist upon imposing, upon the whole, who may be as religious, as virtuous and as wise as themselves for aught they know or have any right to assume. Certainly it is a tyrannical invasion of the rights of that which, we have life and with all first of all be free; and which, however the many of the Churches, knows how to use without abusing freedom. Is the experience of old Europe, Hus so ... worth in comparison with ours? And dare we pretend that all the genuine prevailing piety of a people is on our side of the Ocean? One somehow people may be more compelling more church-going; but are they better than the Germans, who spend their Sundays cheerfully, the ... children of the Faith? Can there not be also here Heaven, symphonious truth, in a Symphony or Opera, and send home one in ... thought, devotion and sermons? It is at least worth thinking of.

Still, Sig. Ferranti is delightful to hear where there is no pretension of seriousness. As it was he exchanged the Rossini "Don Magnifico" for the Mozart "Non più andrai," as if that were a whit more sacred! He also sang Mozart's "Fisherman." While we are upon the men, we may as well say what a part ... having there is in Mr. HALL's noble bass, and with what power and grace he sang the "Pro peccatis." Mr. MACDONALD, too, was heard in his deep, firm tenor in ... from Elijah; his singing gives good promise, though maturity of style is yet a good way off.

CARL ROSA seemed as popular as ever. He has gained in purity and sweetness of tone since he was here last, and played the "Trille du diable" of Tartini very beautifully, as well as the Andante Variations of the "Kreutzer Sonata" with Mr. Lang; the performance was highly sympathetic on both parts. The "Moto Perpetuo" playing of Professor WALLACE was rather a great curiosity, the tones exquisite.

But the chief feature of the concert was Mrs. BARTON'S singing. Her rich contralto has lost none of its freshness while she has been abroad; but she has ... ... that which ... been a sound ripe noble style. Truly we have not heard "He was despised" sung with such classic melody, beauty and ... yet ... expression, such absence of forced pathos, for a long time: she let the music tell its story in its own way, and showed us the higher kind of art, compared to what is called pathos on the operatic stage. Mrs. BARTON sang "Show me thy ways" by Torrente, and the "Quis est homo" with Mrs. Kempton, with always telling voice and easy manner, though a little coldly. And we were much pleased with Miss BARTON's voice, style and feeling in the English song "Ruth and Naomi."

NEW YORK.—The Philharmonic Society announces the large features of its programmes for the five concerts of the season. The orchestra, we said, will be increased to one hundred active members. Here is the list:

Nov. 16.—Symphony, "Pastorale" by Beethoven; Overture "Manfred," Schumann; Poème Symphonique, "Mazeppa," Liszt.

Dec. 21.—Symphony in C, Schubert; Overture "Othello" (1st time), Rhine Overture; Calm Sea and Happy Voyage, Mendelssohn.

Feb. 1.—Overture "Jessonda," by Spohr; Choral Symphony No. 9, Beethoven.

March 7.—Symphony No. 1, in G major, Mozart; Introduction to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn.

April 11.—Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Schumann; Poème Symphonique, "Hamlet Festklänge" (first time), Liszt; Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

NEW ORGAN, for the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Elizabeth, N.J. The Messrs. Hook have just completed an instrument for this church, which is so remarkably successful as to be worthy of a more than passing notice. For several days it has exhibited at their factory to admiring visitors by ... leading organists and won the highest praise from both performers and audience. On Tuesday the 15th inst., ... fine and all of which its qualities were ably displayed through a very wide range of music by Messrs. J. K. Paine, J. P. Tuckerman and J. H. Willcox, of Boston.

The organ is enclosed in an elegant and imposing case of black walnut of much originality and beauty of design, displaying richly six delicately decorated front pipes of sixteen feet, and contains the following registers, pipes and appliances.

The pneumatic action is applied to the great manual, by which the touch, even with all the couplers drawn, is made as light and easy as that of a grand piano-forte. With this action the keys, instead of acting directly upon the pallets, are only required to open small bellows (one to each key) which instantly expands and lifts all the valves belonging to the keys pressed down, as it applies to the register action, able to remove the stops required. Over the great manual and within easy reach of the fingers of the player there are three small ivory knobs by which the Swell and Solo manuals can be coupled to the pneumatic action when desired, a contrivance of the greatest utility and convenience. There is also in each instead a blank draw-stop with all its appliances and conveyances (including room on each wind chest for future additions whenever desired. This provision is of great importance as these remains nothing to be added but the pipes which may be chosen.

In the power and grandeur of its diapasons, the sharpness and resonance of its reed and harmonics, and the proper quantity and quality of its reed stops, to give boldness and character, as it believes are tones not to be surpassed by any previous efforts of its talented builders.

The effect of the full organ is particularly satisfying, so clear and brilliant—distinct—in its quality yet withal so well digested and balanced, that no stop has undue prominence, and to listen to it is a continual pleasure. The 16 ft. Open Diapason on the great manual imparts great dignity and the Doppel Flöte and Flute Harmonique great breadth and fullness to its full-organ tone, and the Viol di Gamba gives a peculiar crispness and pungency to the o eye of eight-feet pitch. The very complete Pedale, with its six stops affords a full, abundant support to the grand pyramid of tone, and yet contains stops of rarely beautiful tone, perfectly adapted to the accompaniment of the softest manual stops.

Among so many beautiful and characteristic stops, so various as the Germans appropriately call them, it is hard to select any for particular mention. For some time past, however, the Hooks have been constantly improving in the voicing of string-like, or violin sounding stops, and in this instrument the stops of this class, as the Viol di Gamba in the great manual, the Salicional and Violina in the swell, the Geigen (or violin) Principal in the solo manual, and the Violone in the pedale, are so successful as to leave nothing further to be desired. The last mentioned stop is of remarkable beauty; when skilfully used it is difficult to believe that one does not hear the "bow" of the bass on the strings of a contra-basso. The Flauto Traverso in the swell has a lovely clear travelling tone, and the Flauto d'Amore in the same manual is also very beautiful. Of the reeds it is only necessary to say that they are the work of the Hooks, so renowned in their excellence in this special and difficult department of organ building.

Though the firm has erected many larger instruments, this the latest jewel in the chaplet of their noble works, seems the brightest and most perfect.

May they continue to fill our temples with better and better specimens of their art, and may our people appreciate more and more their long continued endeavors to increase its dignity and to elevate it from its former low estate, until when an organ is to be bought the question shall not be, who will build cheapest? but who will build best?

HIPPARS.

The Welsh Eisteddfod.

These meetings by which the Welsh delight to glorify themselves fancying that thereby they are maintaining "the art" of the Principality "against the world"—the Carmarthen Eisteddfod—is worse. To every one except the speakers at the musical sessions and the readers of dreary papers without value, the main life of all the exhibitions were owing to the musical contributions from Welshmen who had played who have found their art in England—such as Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Edmonds, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Brinley Richards. It is true that one gentleman earlier sat [illegible] to boast, known by the charming battle song of "The Roaring Lion" flagged to the occasion; and that an attempt was made by a section of patriots, ignorant of music, to disturb bazar performances, in order to force their way for the independent "native talent," although his exhibition might have been warranted (one concert) [illegible] and past experience condemn it to those English-tutored art to have set at large. What do the signers present, such as "Talhaiarn," make of this local protection by talking of preservation and progress and cementing insulation and dignity of national objects of prodigal Cambrian race, [illegible] of such force? The Times gets the greater glory when recounting the proceedings of the Carmarthen Musical Admiration Society, with those of former meetings at which a Grissen and a Stephens were called in to aid as of less than at Rhuddlan and that prior's Chicken. There was no orchestra this year. The triple harp seems falling into desuetude, only one competitor in the prize having presented himself. The best part-singing as in 1860, was that of the Merthyr choir. A very young lady, Miss Mockling of Swansea, is said to have distinguished herself on the pianoforte. A sensation was excited by a letter from Mr. Edmund Yates, in whom he denounced that of adjudicating the prize for the best song in English had been entrusted. This conveyed the startling fact that the ninety-three specimens submitted for his perusal were, one and all, so devoid of merit, as to be utterly unworthy of any prize. The sybils has put the real blood up, and in the true [illegible] Pedlington style, an able journalist, warns Mr. Yates to tremble and anticipate just retribution seeing that he will bring his tyros vol. Finality's Mosaicam. By way of making a crowning end on the [illegible], I am determined to ignore the unadorned judgment of the invited English arbiter, and to hand over the ninety-three poems to be reconsidered by a Welsh gentleman and lady! Mr. Brinley Richards is said to have announced his determination to take no further part in celebrations so futile and foolish. He is wise.—London Paper

—— "'Twas in May, the flowery May-time,
When the soft winds softly blow,
When the larks are singing loudly,
Nightingales responding low;
When to serve their noble ladies
Lovers with a light heart go,
That they brought me here a captive,
Here with anger worn with woe.
Long, long have I pined in darkness,
Breathing cold and fetid air,
Sun of sun and out of converse,
Not of night or day aware;
Naught to soothe me, naught to comfort,
Save one little birdling's lay,
Through the long walls of my prison
Sometimes finding airy way,
Waking round me many memories,
With delight and love aglow,
Malison upon the archer
Whose sharp arrow laid her low!"——

"If this were thy will, dread sovereign
Well—for thou art lord and king;
If it were the governor's doing,
He hath done a treacherous thing.

——"Would some other bird could find me,
Lark or thrush or nightingale,
Like a friend to soothe my sorrow,
Like a friend to tell my tale
Bred among most noble ladies,
Versed in gentle ladies' lore,
Who for me would bear a message
To my sweet spouse, Leonore!
She would swiftly send to aid me
Bread and meat and wine [illegible]
Ope the doors and break my fetters,
Gaolers' cruel hearts beguile."——

But the good king heard the story,
And the truth at once descried;
Freed the captive from his fetters,
Oped the dungeon portal wide.

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

"The Goose of Cairo."

A POSTHUMOUS OPERA BY MOZART.

In a former number of our paper, says the editor of the Berlin Echo, we told our readers that Mozart's unfinished posthumous comic opera, L'Oca del Cairo (the Goose of Cairo), had been produced at the Théâtre des Fantaisies Parisiennes, where it met with a very favorable reception. According to the Paris papers it has been very skilfully reconstructed, that is to say, the plot has been condensed into two acts by M. Victor Wilder, and the omissions in the score have been filled up in the proper spirit of a composition by the composer. M. Wilder, to whom the merit of a successful realization of the performance are due, gives the following details of the history of the opera from its commencement, and of his arrangement of it for the stage.—The Goose of Cairo is not, as might be supposed, says M. Wilder, one of Mozart's youthful works; on the contrary, it dates from the most fertile and brilliant period of his career; the period which witnessed the birth of Figaro's Hochzeit, Don Juan, and Die Zauberflöte. Written in the year 1783, the place of the opera is between Die Entführung aus dem Serail (1782) and Figaro's Hochzeit (1786). Mozart, who unfortunately was doomed to die at the age of thirty-five, was then about twenty-eight. In addition to a large number of symphonies, sonatas, &c., he had already written [illegible] operas, among which were Idomeneo and Die Entführung. It will no doubt interest the reader to learn under what circumstances Mozart composed The Goose of Cairo, and I may, therefore, be allowed to describe them. [illegible] of the score intended to be placed in [illegible] of the scene. After his travelling through a large portion of Europe, Mozart settled in Salzburg. The Archbishop had attached him to his person with a salary of 400 florins. In this small provincial town, where the great artist was exposed to the [illegible] of his master, who treated him worse than the meanest of his servants, Mozart felt his genius was being suffocated. It was, therefore, with child-like joy that he received the command to follow his master to Vienna, which place he reached in March, 1781.

Vienna was then the true home of art. Joseph II., who was passionately fond of music, had collected in his capital an Italian operatic company, which was considered "The wonders of that time, a perfectly unanimous [illegible] par excellence. "Our operatic company," says one of them, "is truly superior to all others in Germany and Italy. By [illegible] his powers through the peninsula the Emperor united all the large theatres, and engaged the most celebrated virtuosos. It is not uncommon to find our second and third singers leaving Vienna to appear as prime donne in Italy." In addition to the opera buffa, Vienna possessed a second theatre. This was devoted to German opera. Unfortunately there was a deficiency of good composers and good singers and, with the exception of a few national works, translations formed the staple entertainment of the establishment. For a short time Mozart revived it, however, by his Entführung aus dem Serail. The reader can easily imagine what a powerful attraction such a place as Vienna exercised upon the gifted young composer. He trembled at the mere thought of having to return to Salzburg. But how could he avoid the sad necessity? Leopold Mozart, his father, who had great value to the Archbishop's [illegible] hundred florins, and dreaded his soul being exposed to the vicissitudes of life. He feared, too, that the fact of Wolfgang's breaking with his master might endanger the [illegible] which he himself, Leopold, held at the Court of Salzburg. Under these circumstances, Mozart's permanent stay in Vienna became an exceedingly difficult problem. But the Archbishop's brutality succeeded in solving it. Most profoundly wounded in his feelings as a man and an artist, Mozart listened only to the voice of a just indignation. He bade farewell to the choleric Archbishop, and knocked at the hospitable door of C. Weber, whose daughter he was then [illegible] to marry. He now settled in Vienna. After he had provided for his livelihood by lessons and concert-speculations, he turned his attention seriously to the stage. His first thought of the national theatre. This was a [illegible] as there were no other rivals nor any other serious obstacles in the way. Besides, he could refer to the success of his previous work (Die Entführung). It appears from his correspondence that he had in his possession for some time a piece entitled Rudolph von Habsburg. He proposed, also, getting some one to translate a comedy of Goldoni's, Il Servitore di due Padroni, but the German theatre was in its last gasp, and the Emperor had already condemned it to death. There was, therefore, nothing but the Italian theatre left.

Mozart's most ardent wish was to write an opera buffa. Despite his innermost descent his taste drew him to Italian art, for we must not forget that, though, as the composer of Die Entführung and Die Zauberflöte, he is the real founder of the German musical drama, we behold in him more especially the important [illegible] and last representative of the great school of men like Pergolese, Paisiello and Cimarosa. Unfortunately, he had many obstacles to overcome in order to attain his end. The great thing to be first done was to overcome the prejudices entertained by Joseph II., who did not think Mozart's dramatic music very highly, and deemed it far too much for Die Entführung. The next thing was to conquer the intrigues of Salieri, who was greatly respected in Vienna and enjoyed the especial favor of the Emperor. Finally it was necessary to obtain a book. Being according to the reviewed the matter Mozart wrote, on the 7th May, 1783, a letter to his father, complaining that he had read at least a hundred Italian pieces, without finding a single one of any use. The the musical there was nothing to be done with the Abbé da Ponte, who had promised him a piece, as the Abbé was then busily engaged on a libretto for Salieri. Mozart commissioned his father therefore to come to some arrangement about a book with Varesco. If he and Varesco consented to write one, they might work together during Mozart's stay in Salzburg. In the month of July Mozart really did set out for Salzburg, as he had married a short time previously and wished to present his wife to his father. He found Varesco already at work and carried away with him the first act and the plot of the two others to Vienna.

In his ecstasy at finally obtaining a libretto, Mozart set about his task with feverish eagerness. He thus flowed easily and abundantly and the first act was speedily finished. It was not that he sought now for the first time, the whole plan of the piece, and became aware of the defects adhering to it. On the 6th December, 1783, he wrote to his father to say how "pleased he himself" was with the numbers he had composed and what a pity it would be were it to become useless performed, as might be the case, if Varesco would not consent to various indispensable alterations in the book. This letter gave rise to a long correspondence between father and son. In it Mozart detailed the subject of The Goose of Cairo, suggested the necessary alterations, and spoke very sensibly of the value of the book. Unfortunately Varesco was, to judge at least from Mozart's letters, an obstinate man, difficult to manage, and appeared moreover to be firmly convinced of the great merit of his work; in a word he opposed every important alteration. The unhappy composer was in despair both [illegible] him. Da Ponte had [illegible] with Salieri, and was ready to fulfil the promise he had formerly made Mozart; and thus The Goose of Cairo was forgotten for Figaro's Hochzeit and locked up in a dusty press with other manuscripts condemned to oblivion. If the reader bears in mind the correspondence mentioned above, together with the date 1783, which marks a new period in the development of Mozart's dramatic genius, he will easily believe that the fate to which the fragments were thus subjected was something to be deplored. In truth, if we look away from the Zauberflöte, The Goose of Cairo may take its place by the side of the master's best efforts. Happily, it was not lost. While the earthly remains of the poor great man were flung into a pit where they could never be found again, his manuscripts, carefully collected by his widow, passed into the hands of André, who purchased them en bloc for 1000 ducats. His successor, and the present owner of them, Herr André, music publisher at Offenbach, published The Goose of Cairo in 1861, and it was then I conceived the notion of producing it on the stage. Starting from the same point as Varesco's piece, with the plot of which I was acquainted through Otto Jahn's work, I constructed a completely new libretto, guiding myself conscientiously by the existing musical numbers, so that, for instance, the endings of the acts corresponded with the analogous situations in the original book. As most of the numbers written by Mozart, especially the concerted ones, were out of proportion for a one-act opera, I thought I could to extend my frame, and make the opera in two acts. It is true that this plan compelled me to interpolate in The Goose of Cairo three pieces not in the original work. Mozart wrote neither an overture nor an introduction, but at the very time he was busy on The Goose of Cairo he had an idea of setting to music an old opera, Lo Sposo deluso. He soon abandoned the project, but the overture and an introductory quartet, possessing, by a remarkable chance, a close resemblance to the first scene of The Goose of Cairo, were completed and fully scored.* That overture and that quartet occupied natural[ly] the place of the [illegible] introduction. Isabel[la's] rondo also scored [illegible] one of the master's operas, of which the [illegible] book are lost. The final trio (No. 6) concluded the first act of an opera by Bianchi, La Villanella rapita, which was produced in 1783 at Vienna, and for which Mozart, like [illegible] composed that delicious number. After doing this much, I prepared a talented musician well versed in classical music, and [illegible] to the works of genius. Mozart's mode of composing is well known. As he himself relates in one of his letters, when he was travelling, or in bed, or walking, or unable to sleep [illegible] at night, a stream of musical ideas kept flashing through his brain. Such as pleased him [illegible] trained his memory to retain [illegible] He seldom forgot them. He worked, therefore, always mentally at first, and did not take up his pen until his idea was quite matured. He then began his score, wrote the parts and the bass, and reserving for a future period the task of fully scoring his work contented himself with noting certain passages and ritornellos, marking repeats, &c. This is the shape in which The Goose of Cairo has come down to us. A talented young musician, M. Charles Constantin, conductor at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, and a pupil of the composer A. Thomas, undertook the delicate task of completing Mozart's instrumentation.

* These fragments were published by M. André simultaneously with The Goose of Cairo.

Marvellous Musical Invention.

[From the Tribune, Oct. 5.]

[illegible] Electricity is [illegible] its infancy. Its wonders has not been half fulfilled. Constant experiment is [illegible] the wondrous discoveries of its influence, and has led to the latest and unexpected purpose to which it has just been [illegible] producing music, such as [illegible] can accomplish.

The manner in which the idea of this new invention occurred to the inventor is not devoid of interest. It was first suggested to him by noticing the operation of the telegraph apparatus in the back office of Messrs. Steinway & Sons' warerooms, in Fourteenth street. Mr. Eugene Trastour de Varano, a native of New Orleans, now residing in this city and a gentleman well-known in musical circles as a gifted pianist, as well as the author of a very successful work on the "first course of Music," had a few days previous to last [illegible] and bargained with Mr. William Steinway for a [illegible] piano, on which he was then engaged [illegible] play, on which some system for working a music [illegible] by machinery. A correct [illegible] already obtained, [illegible] was not made [illegible] on account of certain contemplated improvements which the inventor had not perfected.

On the day in question, a clerk was transmitting telegraphic despatches from Steinway's warerooms, in Fourteenth street, to their factory on Fourth Avenue, when the attention of Mr. Trastour was attracted by the process. While looking on, it occurred to him that the up and down movement of the "arm," which holds the pen, was very similar to that of the motion of the human fingers when striking the keys of a piano-forte. This analogy came to him like a flash of light. He saw himself near the apparatus, and was soon lost in the examination of its different parts. He was at last aroused from his deep thinking by Mr. Steinway, who tapped him gently on the shoulder, and remarked: "You look as if you had found an improvement on this instrument." Mr. Trastour was startled by the remark, yet it is to be supposed that Mr. Steinway little thought, at the moment, that his apparatus had just given birth to the idea of the Electro Automatic Piano Player, or Pianoautomate, as it is called; which we will now describe to our readers.

The instrument to which this name has been given, is a long wooden box, of the length and width of the keyboard of a piano-forte. It is so constructed that it can be easily and quickly fastened above the keyboard of any piano-forte, by means of clamps. The box is provided with a crank, which sets in motion a magneto-electric apparatus contained within it. By introducing in an aperture, made for that purpose, the paper upon which the musical composition is to be performed, a uniform and [illegible] perforated, a series of small bars protrude from underneath the box and [illegible] striking the keys of the piano-forte, perform correctly the musical composition contained on the paper so introduced. The instrument can range from one bare [illegible] strike the keys [illegible] all kinds of degrees of strength—from the piano assai to the fortissimo, [illegible] gradually [illegible] sound, when necessary, and afterward diminish [illegible] the same proportion. It can cause [illegible] each bar to strike the key once or with [illegible] legato or staccato touch, and can produce diminuendo and crescendo passages with the help of the pedals. Each instrument has a pedal attachment, which can be clamped to the pedals. A wire connecting [illegible] attachment to the box situated above the keyboard enables the instrument to use the loud or soft pedals as often as needed.

The instrument as well as the name of Organautomate has been given to a similar one to the Pianoautomate in its construction, and is governed by the same principle. The only difference being that one is constructed to act upon the single key board of the piano-forte, and the other to perform on the three keyboards of church organs. The pedal attachment of the one is similar to that of the other, only it is longer and has more pedals to act upon.

The principle of the invention covers three different kinds of instruments: one which contains within it a magneto-electric apparatus and which is worked by a small crank; another provided with a galvanic battery and also worked by a crank; and the third requires a self-acting locomotion which performs alone without any winding up, [illegible] any battery or apparatus. In inserting the perforated paper in the aperture of this instrument, it pushes a small lever which, coming in contact, completes the electrical circuit, and sets in motion a small electric machine, and the instrument then plays by itself. When all the music [illegible] has passed through the aperture, the lever, being no longer held up, falls down by its own weight, and the electrical circuit being broken, the instrument stops of its own accord.

The most significant as well as the important part of the invention is the roll of sheet music containing the notes of the musical composition to be performed by the instrument. In fact, this roll of paper is the soul and motor of the instrument. The different operations which can be derived [illegible] can be multiplied [illegible] effects of execution on the piano or the organ which [illegible] world. Each of them is surprising. For example, the [illegible] can be made, in this manner, to run chromatic scales in unisons, thirds or sixths, from the lowest to the highest note of the key board with a velocity which would cause the whole scale to sound like the snap of a whip, although every note should have been heard distinctly and clearly. In the same manner the instrument can be made to produce the same effect as if four, six, eight or more hands were performing. It is difficult to understand therefore that the roll of sheet music for the instrument is the most important feature of the invention, and that its preparation will necessarily create a new branch of industry, a consideration which, commercially speaking, renders the invention one of general public interest.

As most of the classic overtures, operas, dances, and all new compositions will be arranged on rolls of paper prepared for the instrument, the income to be derived from the sale of the music sheet will be large. The process of preparing the paper rolls is so simple, that the perforation of a musical composition will cost less than engraving the notes on paper, as is ordinarily done, and the sheet music, therefore, be supplied at a lower rate than the present publications; and the instrument itself is so simple in its construction, that its price will enable every owner of a piano to purchase it.

The advantages of the invention will be better understood when one thinks of the number of churches throughout the country whose congregations have not the means of securing an organist, and whose organ is consequently silent; of the quantity of piano-fortes in our parlors which are dumb for want of a performer. This invention brings within the reach of the poorest church the facility of securing, for a trifling sum, the services of something more than a skilled organist; and to every parlor the possibility of constantly possessing a most brilliant piano.

The instrument will not be confined to a certain set of airs, like a hand-organ, or to a limited repertoire like a human artist, but will play, "at first sight," the most difficult pieces which may be presented, without any previous study and without hesitation.

To the student it will be a great help, inasmuch as it will perform correctly and in the requisite movement, those musical compositions which they may desire to learn. To the singer it will be indispensable in efficiently accompanying any of their songs.

For balls and parties it may even be preferred to a living artist, on account of its mechanical correctness of time in performing quadrilles, polkas, and dances.

For churches it will prove an economy, as far as the organist is concerned, and a great acquisition on account of its precision [illegible] execution of voluntaries, masses, oratorios, and hymns; also for its unerring sufficiency in sustaining a choir.

To the public it will be a source of general enjoyment, and a means of popularizing the appreciation of fine music, as it will perform any and every musical composition with all its [illegible] all the shades, accents, signs, and movements marked by the composer, and not, as is now the case, according to the whim and fancies of the different performers. It will accustom the public ear to a correct execution of the different musical compositions, and will surely cleanse the standard of musical criticism.

There can be made of the casts [illegible] all ascending passages from one octave to another should be played crescendo; those descending from forte to piano should be played diminuendo; certain notes should be played louder others softer. As the instrument is susceptible of four shades of forte and piano, can play crescendo and diminuendo, can use both pedals, and especially as the most delicate shades can be effectively expressed on the roll of perforated sheet music, it will easily be understood that Trastour's Pianoautomate will not perform like a hand-organ, a music-box, or other mechanical apparatus, but will play with taste and feeling, and effectually imitate [illegible] artist.

The invention will shortly be given to the public, and Mr. Trastour will have the honor of not only causing a revolution in the musical world, but will assuredly be entitled to rank among the ingenious inventors of the age.

Music Fancies.

When Leigh Hunt spoke of the motto of a beggar-pipe as representative of "the agonies of a man not a poet," he said we see and hear not only [illegible] but a [illegible] thing. There is Shelley and a sense [illegible] of music which cannot be, are or violated [illegible] precisely the [illegible] on [illegible] small [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] appear [illegible] to wriggle through [illegible] more desperately under [illegible] When a vagabond [illegible] a wreath with his [illegible] you must [illegible] refuse [illegible] quivering [illegible] screech [illegible] and then subdued [illegible] and [illegible] for release; but the fellow shows no mercy in "Come Dance" on the contrary, he pumps but one [illegible] up and down the scale, and seems in saving his soul with a vicious shake at the finish. Why should we not have a Society for the Suppression of Cruelty to Tunes? What base ears are not these poor [illegible] turned out! Did their [illegible] ever hear [illegible] them [illegible] brought [illegible] into the [illegible] of an organ-grinder? Would not a Charity [illegible] once satisfy the wretches! It does not [illegible] the ones we ought [illegible] at the [illegible] and [illegible] without [illegible] the degradation of the ebony [illegible] At the brass bands and their [illegible] they deserve the [illegible] It is bad enough to hear a

The man, say, is [illegible] and [illegible] about five [illegible]. The [illegible], however, are [illegible] to his tail, and the creature is [illegible], and [illegible] to go farther. Then comes the [illegible], a kick from the [illegible], a [illegible] from the street, and a knock on the head from the drum.

This cruelty is not confined to the streets. [illegible] are committed in the drawing-room, especially under cover of "variations." The victim is frequently [illegible] of [illegible] which [illegible] while the French [illegible] was beheaded. But there are exceptions. For [illegible] where a [illegible] his [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] in a [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] in a [illegible]. [illegible]

Goethe called architecture "frozen music." The expression was truer perhaps than he suspected. Dr. [illegible] some years ago [illegible] a theory of harmony and form in which there was a [illegible] and the Parthenon was made out to be really "frozen music," and its proportions discovered to have been regulated by relative proportions of the diatonic scale. The walls of Thebes rose [illegible] to the sound of the [illegible] of Orpheus. Pythagoras declared that the universe was but a [illegible]. "There's music in all things, if men had ears." The poets are never loath [illegible]. They are [illegible] to the description of a woman's face. "The [illegible] the music breathing from her face," wrote Byron of his Zuleika, and he thought it necessary to apologize [illegible]. "I think," the poet [illegible] "I think there are some who will understand [illegible] at least they would [illegible] the [illegible] speaking harmony [illegible] the idea, for this passage [illegible] of [illegible] which [illegible] to the earl [illegible] fragments [illegible] Moore [illegible] the same [illegible] "the melody and music of her face," and old Sir Thomas Browne has it that "there is music even in beauty."

The best [illegible] is [illegible] music. Of course, the man who has no music in his soul [illegible] but we have [illegible] in the words which follow the well known quotation that such a person has no [illegible]. [illegible] great [illegible] their book [illegible] A young [illegible] a flute [illegible] in a bottle. A boy has been known [illegible] working [illegible] hand [illegible] brought it home to play upon in the [illegible]. Boz. "Pray sir did you ever play on any musical instrument?"

Johnson. "No, sir. I once bought me a flageolet, but I never made out a tune."

The gentleman whose claim to be considered a German scholar rested upon the fact of his brother's acquaintance with the German [illegible], appears to [illegible] of the [illegible] in the lexicographer [illegible]. It would seem to [illegible] "bought him" the flageolet, he also purchased the airs that were hidden within it. When the "[illegible] of the literary whale" mentioned that he was subject to nervous disturbance on hearing music, and could weep at it, "Sir," said the sage, "I should never hear it if it made me such a fool."

Music, we are told, can cure sickness. Vigneul de Marville relates a story of a gentleman of distinction suddenly seized by violent illness, and beyond [illegible] of physicians. "he [illegible] called a band of musicians, and their band of violins played so well in his bodily that his stomach became perfectly in tune, and in a few hours was harmoniously [illegible]." [illegible] "I [illegible]" could be [illegible] for a pill, [illegible] pergo [illegible] but [illegible] "I [illegible]" [illegible] for a bolus!

Can music speak? We are afraid not, at least, not [illegible]. A clever man, in the Fortnightly Review, some time since, maintained that a [illegible] was [illegible] vague. "There are no definitely agreed upon percentages or [illegible] of sounds which necessarily [illegible] a clearly understood ideas to the mind. "The Original Source of Gregorian Music.

By [illegible] Esq.

(From the London [illegible].)

It is no new idea to refer the music of [illegible] Christianity to an [illegible] origin, but with [illegible] appears to [illegible] of late [illegible] to [illegible] search of the source of [illegible] Church music.

The option in that [illegible] to lie between the Hebrew and the Greek [illegible].

Now in respect to the [illegible] propagation of Christian doctrine, as gathered from the "Acts of the Apostles," we [illegible] that, while [illegible] of [illegible] in childhood those traditions [illegible] of their original [illegible] Greece or Israel.

But I [illegible] may be fairly concluded that in [illegible] (we are now considering the [illegible] of music,) there [illegible] not [illegible] throughout at liberty to follow one or [illegible] of those [illegible] and [illegible] a matter of national taste.

First, with regard to the Hebrew converts [illegible] three thousand in one day [illegible] converted [illegible] Jerusalem [illegible] "singing hymns to Christ as a god" [illegible] Is it to be supposed that they would [illegible] to the Grecian [illegible] and not [illegible] to the [illegible] ceremonial worship [illegible] Jerusalem and the [illegible] from their fathers? nay more, would they not look to the [illegible] as far as possible, [illegible] Lord and Master did when he and the [illegible] sang the Passover hymn before going out to the Mount of Olives?

I think there cannot be two opinions as to this [illegible] the [illegible] Christians.

Next, with regard to the class [illegible] from [illegible] nations in Greece or Asia [illegible] those of Corinth [illegible] when they came to be formed into public assemblies for worship, and [illegible] of their own (see I Cor. [illegible]) [illegible] "keep themselves from idols" (I John v. 21) and to "abstain from all appearance of evil" (I Thess. [illegible]) [illegible] to [illegible]

they should wound the weak conscience of the brethren (I Cor. [illegible] 12,) surely it is not to be believed that they would have recourse to the ceremonial worship of the Temple of Diana, or to [illegible] for musical airs in which to "sing hymns to Christ as a god."

Having accepted the prophets and psalms of the Jews, to them they would naturally look for aid in all that could render their services delightful or attractive. They could not but be aware of the Hebrew origin of their creed and its primitive members. Before conversion, the religion of Jesus had been to them "foolishness," but after [illegible] that was sufficient to move them in willing [illegible] for its sake, they could have had no school of music ready to hand for use so well adapted to their object as the Hebrew.

I conclude, then that the Grecian converts [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] a religious music of [illegible]

With regard to [illegible] Christianity, I seem to be [illegible] that they were obliged to choose between Hebrew and Greek sources for their sacred melodies.

If I [illegible] be shown that they derived the [illegible] through the Greeks, and [illegible] "[illegible]" and [illegible] with [illegible] their music might also have been of a Greek character.

But inasmuch as from the day of Pentecost itself there were believers who were "strangers of Rome," [illegible] the arrival of St. Paul at Appii Forum there were brethren from Rome to meet him, inasmuch also as soon shortly afterwards there were "saints in Cæsar's household"—we are certainly not [illegible] The European Christians then, of Rome, and afterwards of [illegible] evangelized from the Eastern countries, were not [illegible] Greek derivation for "[illegible]" [illegible] to their assemblies or churches—they had no [illegible] between the Hebrew school of music and an indigenous school of their [illegible] whatever this might be.

Having that choice, the same reason would apply to them for rejecting the [illegible] of idolatrous worship, [illegible] the same as that of the Greeks as the Greeks had in [illegible] to whom the Europeans were [illegible] not disciples or successors.

In confirmation of [illegible] reference may safely be made to that [illegible] of [illegible] evidence in religious [illegible] the Roman catacombs, where among the [illegible] signs we find everywhere of [illegible] to the evidence of Hebraic Scripture as "part and parcel of Christianity" and the very root of it, but [illegible] any leaning towards Grecian mythology, or even Grecian historical events or persons.

Roman Christianity was therefore, based upon Hebraic Christianity, and not [illegible] through a Grecian channel; and if Gregorian Chant [illegible] derived from the Roman Church, Gregorian music would have no connection with a Grecian origin.

The same may be said of other European nations, as Spain, Gaul, or Britain, who received the gospel from [illegible] not from Greece.

[illegible] music among the [illegible] of their [illegible] and especially of the character of those hymns for worship, it appears to be [illegible] a light [illegible] character. We may confidently assert that the Gregorian music bears no resemblance whatever to [illegible] it does [illegible] of the [illegible] of Hebrew [illegible] consideration I [illegible] that among the fragments of Rabbinic [illegible] in the middle ages [illegible] in his "Florilegium Hebraicum," there is a [illegible] to the effect—

[illegible]
The art of music among the Christians
Indeed I [illegible] called the best of all Hebrews."

[illegible] so has particularly marked a Jewish character [illegible] a phrase from the Bible narrative of Joseph in the Egyptian prison (Gen. xl. 15) [illegible] of [illegible] the cathedral services of the Christians [illegible] upon a learned Jew without reference to religious doctrine [illegible] the correspondency [illegible] and that of the ancient Hebrews.

The above observations have all been made by way of reasoning, without consideration of the technical nature of music.

Mr. [illegible] asserts that the ancient musical system of the Jews, [illegible] the [illegible] of all Eastern people, differed from the Gregorian system in the division of the scale into smaller intervals than semi-tones," but in order to assign a Grecian origin to the Gregorian much it would be necessary to show—first, that the Grecian music was not [illegible] founded upon a system of smaller intervals than semitones; and secondly, that [illegible] music was framed upon the same system in general as that named the Gregorian.

But what proof is there that "the Jewish musical system, like those of all Eastern peoples, differed from the Gregorian in the division of the scale into smaller intervals than semitones?"

In the ancient Jewish music still in use, although the minor mode is common, the intervals are not different from those of any scale.

Perhaps this was just the difference between Hebrew and other Eastern music. At any rate, it is unreasonable to assume without positive proof that the Jews [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] intervals to the [illegible]. They have [illegible] from all other Orientals in their system of [illegible] and have also invented an elaborate system of accents [illegible] [illegible] system of punctuation and of musical phraseology. Why should they not have differed from them in their development of the science of music?

It is a fact that there are extremely ancient Hebrew melodies that have been from time immemorial sung in synagogues, which can be [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible], and can [illegible] for modern [illegible], and I would recommend to the particular attention of M. [illegible] the collection of [illegible] synagogue music edited by De Sola, together with the learned dissertation prefixed to the same.

For genuineness of musical antiquity in a style not commonly known the small volume well deserves attention. Some of the airs there produced we have heard while in the East and found them recognized as those sung by Sephardi Jews of Jerusalem [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] synagogue, [illegible].

It will should not be pressed by one selection from among Hebrew [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] hymns and canticles, some of which bespeak a period of high [illegible] in the history of music. I confess that I have no difficulty in believing that the primitive Gregorian chants could have had their origin in Hebrew melodies such as the following:—

No. 1.

No. 2. Shaton.

[The double bars I have here inserted, so as to point out more clearly how easily this melody falls into the form of a double chant.]

The Hebrew synagogue music of the Sephardi section consists of [illegible] or [illegible] that [illegible] preserved in connection with the [illegible] hymns, anthems, and [illegible]. It must be remembered that Jews were settled in Spain before the Christian era, [illegible] the [illegible] of religious worship from the earliest [illegible]. It is very likely that they carried with them, as others had done at Babylon, the melodies used in the First Temple in "the Lord's song," which they would [illegible] in a strange land. It is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] improbable that they would have allowed a single note to be altered [illegible] [illegible] they would have borrowed from either Greek or Christian. Indeed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It is further to be remembered that Spanish [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] in which their ancestors used [illegible] [illegible] there [illegible] ages when [illegible] [illegible] banished thence, and some of them went back to Palestine.

The early Spanish Church music [illegible] the Mozarabic liturgy would probably furnish interesting illustrations of this subject.* It might be compared with the earliest of the Greek Church, and both with the old Hebrew music.

The result may be that all these, the Gregorian included, will be found to be [illegible] fragments of the most venerable [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the Temple of Jerusalem, as ordered by David, or even of the Tabernacle as ordered by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

* [illegible] [illegible] at Toledo, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Possibly some of this Spanish music [illegible] still be brought to light.

Offenbach.

The name which at present is most widely celebrated throughout the theatres and concert rooms of Europe is unquestionably that of Offenbach. Wedding Music and the [illegible] together, after a fashion altogether unprecedented, he has produced a class of music, half opera, half burlesque, which belongs to himself alone. The burlesques of the old school are enlivened by popular airs or selections from the operatic stage, and the music is altogether of a light kind; but Offenbach when most he [illegible] is [illegible] in earnest, and some of his best [illegible] effects are brought about by elaborate concerted pieces, such as none of his predecessors would have dreamed of [illegible] for the purposes of comedy. [illegible]. Although master of melody and harmony, he has made these [illegible] to the spirit of grotesque humor which [illegible] characterizes the present age. We may almost call the middle of the nineteenth century the age of Offenbach.

[illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] his most original genius confined to any class of the several [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. No sooner has one of his masterpieces been produced at Paris than it is at once brought out in all the German capitals, to receive the [illegible] and applause of everybody. Each of the works of a large scale which he has brought out of late may be said to be a marked [illegible]. The effect of "[illegible]" is [illegible] not yet. After being performed on every stage of continental Europe, it has furnished quadrilles for the fashionable ballroom, [illegible] for the humble [illegible] [illegible], songs and [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible]. The people of the old world may truly be said to live and breathe Offenbach.

It is not enough to [illegible] that this [illegible] [illegible] of national [illegible] is still in the prime of life and vigor. Each of his last works has [illegible] [illegible] its predecessor, and the last, "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein," brought out at the Théâtre des Variétés, is some of his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be the most successful of them all.

Jacques Offenbach was born at Cologne, on the 21st of June 1819, and at the age of fourteen he became a pupil of the French Conservatoire. In 1847 he succeeded M. Barbereau as [illegible] of the orchestra of the Théâtre Français, and [illegible] [illegible] he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] composition [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Fables of La Fontaine. These fables are, as a matter of course, [illegible] in memory [illegible] every [illegible] [illegible] in France, [illegible] [illegible] a new charm from the music of Offenbach, they soon made their way through all the best circles of French society. Offenbach had also become celebrated as an artist on the violoncello. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] only [illegible] beginning, and his [illegible] [illegible] from 1855 when he obtained the right to open his world-renowned Bouffes Parisiens. This theatre, erected in the Champs Elysées, at once became the rage of Paris; and when summer had departed and the brilliant Champs could be no longer the resort of fashion, the Passage Choiseul, [illegible] [illegible] after M. Comte became the winter home. The unsurpassing [illegible] of Offenbach has been fully [illegible] with his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his productions he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible] to European fame by travelling to England and Germany with his [illegible] company.

The pieces [illegible] [illegible] on the opening of the theatre in the Champs Elysées, in the summer of 1855, were "Les deux Aveugles" and "Une Nuit blanche." Then was begun a [illegible] [illegible] of successes among which we may notice "Bataclan," and "Le Violoneux," produced in the same year; "Tromb-Alcazar," "Le Financier et le Savetier," "Le Rose de Saint Flour," "Le Mariage aux Lanternes," all produced in 1856, and "Croquefer," brought out in 1857. These, which were operettas of the lightest kind, were soon followed by "Les Dames de la Halle," a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the famous "Orphée aux Enfers," which drew crowds for three hundred successive nights, and furnished [illegible] for a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] both in Paris and London. Other popular works are "La Chanson de Fortunio," "Le Pont des Soupirs," "Apothicaire et Perruquier," "Le [illegible] Cœnégar," and "M. et Mme. Denis," the last in 1862.

In the season of 1864–65 Offenbach achieved a triumph in a [illegible] of larger dimensions, the Variétés, [illegible] [illegible] for many years as one of the chief [illegible] [illegible] comic muse. Here he brought out "La Belle Hélène," an exquisitely humorous version of the old Homeric myth.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] greatest success is "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein," which was recently produced at the Variétés, and is now the grand success of Europe. It charms every ear and [illegible] all souls with laughter.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

LEIPZIG. We translate the following from the Allgemeine Zeitung of Oct. 11:

"Yesterday the Gewandhaus reopened its doors, which had been closed since Easter, and summoned the faithful to the first subscription concert of this winter's cycle. On entering, our eyes were agreeably surprised by a renovation of the hall, which has clad the familiar room in a new dress (Gewand), without marring its [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In the string quartet of the orchestra we were glad to see Concertmeister Dreyschock recovered from long illness. The programme, like a Welcome, gave us first Weber's Overture to Euryanthe. Its tones swiftly [illegible] with Faust's magic mantle, bore us away from the [illegible] of [illegible] everyday life into the moonlit realm of the Romantic which Weber [illegible] so [illegible] peculiarly his own domain; and the poetic [illegible] elaborated rendering of the work brought it before our inner sense with all the dreams of majesty and splendor.

"The second part of the programme, on the other hand, led us upon [illegible] classic ground. It consisted of Beethoven's C-minor Symphony, the greatest Symphonic Poem, the richest in ideas, that ever was created. Here too the orchestra followed the bold flights of the master with penetrating understanding and an accuracy hardly to be surpassed. We would only [illegible] [illegible] the trombones, that the fortissimo of the Finale, powerfully as Beethoven makes them stand out, still belong always within the frame of a Symphony and therefore must be carefully distinguished from the crash of military [illegible] music.

"Between the orchestral works two 'guests' appeared in solo performances: Fräulein Therese Seehofer from Vienna and Herr Henri Wieniawski from St. Petersburg, both for the first time in the Gewandhaus. The former is a young singer of much promise, with an agreeable soprano voice and already far advanced in her [illegible] [illegible]. She won the applause of the assembly with the second grand aria of the Countess in Figaro's Marriage, in which that Mozartish type of noble womanhood laments the loss of her youth's ideal in tones of such incomparably warm, deep feeling; and still more in the scena 'Ocean, du Ungeheuer' from Weber's Oberon.—Herr Wieniawski, a Pole, who studied in Paris and since 1860 has held the place of first solo violinist to the Emperor of Russia, counts among the renowned violin players of the present day. In Mendelssohn's Concerto he [illegible] the [illegible] of the Parisian school: elegance grace, facility and tenderness of bowing to a [illegible] [illegible] degree; equally obvious were the weak points of the same, the want of nerve and [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] energy. Wholly contrary to Gewandhaus taste was his [illegible] Fantaisie upon themes from Gounod's Faust; a [illegible] [illegible] so superficial and [illegible] so barren of all higher aspiration, the walls of the Gewandhaus perhaps never heard."

Another critic [illegible] [illegible] says of Wieniawski's Fantasia: "The [illegible] of the tastefully renovated Gewandhaus, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. His motto [illegible] [illegible], should have been covered with a curtain during the performance of that composition."

A concert has been given by Professor Hoffer at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in aid of the Cathedral Building Fund. The pieces performed were: Overture to "La Chasse du jeune Henri," Méhul; Faure's [illegible] from "Le Nozze," Mozart; and fragment from the 5th act of "L'Africaine," Meyerbeer, sung by Mme. Lucca; duet from "Don Juan," sung by Mme. Lucca and Herr Tiejen; andante [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], played by Herr F. Penny; and overture to "Le Siège de Corinthe," Rossini. Mme. Lucca was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and in recognition of the charity with which she gave her services has been presented with the honorary freedom of the City.

The following works were performed at a concert lately given in the [illegible] at Worms, Germany: Overture to "St. Paul," Mendelssohn; air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," from "The Messiah," Handel; prelude and fugue for organ, and sacred song, S. Bach; "Ave Maria," Schubert; recitative and final chorus from the first part of "The Creation"; "Ave Verum," Mozart; "Mit Würd' und Hoheit," from "The Creation"; duet and chorus from "Elijah," Mendelssohn; variations for the organ, Hesse; air from "St. Paul," Mendelssohn; and the "Hallelujah Chorus," from "The Messiah," Handel. The vocal solos were sustained by [illegible]. The organ pieces were executed by Herr Lux.

The musical [illegible] of the new journal Süddeutsche Presse is [illegible] by Richard Wagner, who has given up the idea of expounding his theories in a special journal of his own.

Foreign journals assert that Wagner's comic opera, "Hans Sachs," which was to have been given at Munich on the anniversary of the wedding-day of the composer's kingly friend, will be withheld, the work being just six hours long.

Herr Sechter, court organist and professor of the Vienna Conservatorium, died recently in that capital, at the age of seventy-nine. He was one of the most learned contrapuntists of this century, and has left a number of compositions. He enjoyed much reputation as a teacher, Thalberg, Vieuxtemps, Pauer and Döhler being numbered among his pupils. Schubert intended to study under Sechter, but his too early death prevented him.

The interest excited by the recent discovery of Schubert's manuscripts [illegible], and the knowledge that a mass of manuscripts yet remains in Vienna, says the London Athenæum, have led to the departure of a known writer with a professor for the Austrian capital, expressly for the purpose of research and examination. There has been no such treasure unearthed for some time.

Revivals of Gluck's "Armide," "Alceste," and "Iphigenia in Tauris" are announced as forthcoming during the winter season at Berlin.

The Saturday Review thus adverts to Ludwig Nohl's "Life of Beethoven": "The life of Beethoven is a subject of which the world seems never to weary, [illegible] Herr Nohl, known as a high authority on musical matters, and as the biographer of Mozart in particular, is probably as well qualified for the task as any living man, unless it be the American Thayer, whose extraordinary diligence and knowledge of the subject are amply recognized by Nohl himself. The principal claim of the latter would seem to consist in his more elaborate investigation of the history of Beethoven's youth, which he considers to have been comparatively neglected by his predecessors, and which is certainly much less known than the painful history of the composer's later days. He has collected a vast amount of detail, little of which can be regarded as irrelevant [illegible] and appropriate [illegible] on the whole [illegible] Thayer's [illegible] it cannot be doubted that this Life of Beethoven will obtain a large and deserved measure of success. The two volumes now published bring the work down to [illegible]."

To condense our German notes—Herr Joachim has been playing at Hamburg; M. Rubinstein at Leipsic. The [illegible] led by Herr Becker, who [illegible] what is called "the Florentine Quartet," have given performances during the past [illegible] with success. A [illegible] orchestra [illegible] founded by Herr Bilse, who [illegible] an English title, [illegible] "monster concerts," with an orchestra of [illegible] sixty performers. Concerts [illegible] and are being organized in aid of the [illegible] Fund. [illegible] Herren Brahms and Joachim are about to give concerts in company at Vienna [illegible]. A new Philharmonic Society is to be founded [illegible] Berlin. [illegible] one of the most [illegible] French military bands, which of late has been heard at Aix-la-Chapelle, Düsseldorf, Elberfeld, and other towns of the [illegible], to every one's satisfaction, gave a concert, the other evening, in the noble Gürzenich room at Cologne, and was received in the most cordial fashion conceivable. A pianoforte "monster" concert, [illegible] historical, was the other day given in the City of the Three Kings by M. Mortier de Fontaine. The programme consisted of twenty pieces of music, ranging between the days of Dr. John Bull and the Abbé Liszt.—Athenæum.

Posthumous Works of Mendelssohn. We translate from the Signale: "Mendelssohn's son, the young Dr. Carl Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who [illegible] Heidelberg [illegible] been appointed Professor of History there, has been resting from his autumn labors for some weeks at Baden Baden. He is at present occupied with the publication of a second series of the works left in manuscript by his illustrious father. The first of these, the Trumpet Overture, in C, (composed in 1826) has recently appeared as op. 101; [illegible] The next to be expected is a new book of Songs without Words, composed between 1841 and 1845 [illegible] will come a posthumous Symphony, the so-called 'Reformation Symphony,' which was written for the Festival of the Reformation in 1830 and [illegible] performed in Berlin and London. We have furthermore in expectation [illegible] and a Piano Sonata (composed in [illegible]) besides a Funeral March which [illegible] Mendelssohn wrote in 1836 for the funeral of Norbert Burgmüller. This fine Funeral March, arranged for orchestra, has been performed in Baden Baden, making a [illegible] the friends of music."

An important posthumous work by Schubert has been published by Spina of Vienna—the [illegible] of Lazarus. It is [illegible] on the scale of a full Oratorio, but only one part was completed; the composer did not live to get further than the death and the honors of mourning, and the grave. The [illegible] of Jesus—the [illegible] glory of the resurrection is wanting. That which exists, however, shows Schubert [illegible] in originality and beauty, [illegible] Mass in F flat. In "Lazarus" [illegible] elsewhere, [illegible] probably from a want of opportunity to hear his [illegible]. The Athenæum says it is possible to perform that wonderful fragment as it stands, but [illegible] half a dozen numbers may be made with ease.

Paris

The San Francisco Musical Monthly translates and condenses from the Paris Guide the following account of the Orphéon singing schools:

"The Orphéon [illegible] of the Communal schools [illegible] the elements of music, and by making them acquainted with the beauties of [illegible] the ear and teaches them to speak their language with a pure pronunciation. There they acquire the taste [illegible] by singing the airs of all nations. For as the Orphéon [illegible] masters and [illegible] It is also the Liedertafel [illegible] that the Orphéon has been modeled.

"The first German Liedertafel was founded at Berlin in 1808, by the musician Zelter, assisted by Goethe and [illegible] part, [illegible] Orphéon by proposing B. Wilhem as Singing Master in the schools [illegible] musical instruction, [illegible] October 1819, [illegible] It was [illegible] 1835, however, that the Municipal Council of Paris, ordered the introduction of singing into the Communal schools. Three years later singing was regularly taught in all the [illegible]

"There remained the working men [illegible] of Paris [illegible]. At the suggestion, and under the [illegible] of Wilhem, M. Hubert [illegible] In 1833 [illegible] and the [illegible] of these evening schools was able, at the end of [illegible], to sing a chorus. This [illegible] the opening of [illegible] schools at the Halle aux Draps, the Rue des Billettes, the [illegible] Argenteuil, and elsewhere; and to-day, according to official documents, there are in France, 3,243 choral societies, numbering 147,500 singers.

"The Orphéon has thus, at its disposition, hundreds of tenor and bass voices to reinforce and complete the choruses of our Communal schools.

"The more the public performances were multiplied, the more clearly manifest became the interest felt in the cause of the Orphéon. In 1842, the functions at first discharged by B. Wilhem, and afterwards by M. Hubert, devolved upon the distinguished composer, M. Ch. Gounod. [illegible] divided [illegible] the Orphéon [illegible] two sections; that of the left bank of the Seine under the direction of M. François Bazin, and that of the right, under M. Jules Pasdeloup. M. Hubert was appointed inspector of the Communal schools on the right bank and M. Foulon of those on the left.

"Such is, in brief, the history of the establishment and progress of the Orphéon.

"Every Thursday [illegible] the adult people receive lessons [illegible] every Sunday, [illegible] adults and children [illegible] The children under the charge of M. F. Bazin [illegible] at the Sorbonne, and the [illegible] of the right bank of the Seine [illegible] in the hall of the Grand Orient, Rue Cadet, [illegible]

"Every spring there is an exhibition [illegible] 1,200 singers [illegible] before the Prefect of the Seine and the Superintending Committee the new pieces which they have learned. This repertoire is very rich [illegible] composers take pleasure in adding to it every day. Adolphe Adam, Halévy, M. Ambroise Thomas, Félicien David, Ch. Gounod, Fr. Bazin and other masters have furnished [illegible] special compositions.

"Thanks to [illegible] Orphéonist [illegible] Palestrina and [illegible], Handel and Rameau, Gluck and Mendelssohn, Grétry and Weber, Mozart and Schubert, [illegible] the Communal and the [illegible] school."

A foreign critic writes: "The reprise of 'L'Elisir d'Amore' at the Théâtre Italien has recently drawn [illegible] the principal musical [illegible] in Paris. Of course, Adelina Patti was the Adina, [illegible] And this may be [illegible] in spite of the [illegible] M. Fraschini [illegible]. Nothing [illegible] graceful and refined, more [illegible] has been [illegible] boards. As to the singing, [illegible] the greatest [illegible] Patti, who was well supported by Signor Cardoni in the part of Nemorino and by Signor Scalese in Dulcamara. Signor Agnesi played Sergeant Belcore."

A short opera, "The Bride of Corinth," by M. Duprato, will be shortly produced at the Grand Opéra.

Rome.—A private letter to a gentleman in this city [illegible] the San Francisco Musical Monthly) criticises Liszt's new Oratorio, as follows:

"On [illegible] of July last, [illegible] there was given in the Sala [illegible] Liszt's Oratorio "Christus," with the accompaniment of a full Orchestra of 120 artists.

"The merit of the composition and the [illegible] may be [illegible] the following facts: [illegible] rehearsals were found necessary to prepare for the performance [illegible] when it was first performed, the [illegible] showed the greatest [illegible] and the evening ended [illegible]. Many of the [illegible] their [illegible]

"The fault of [illegible] was thrown on the [illegible] and [illegible] of their pay. During the rehearsals [illegible] the performance, quite the contrary.

The fault was not with the [illegible] but with the character of the composition. Liszt would do well [illegible] the pianoforte, on which instrument he cannot be surpassed. [illegible] without hesitation, that he is the only one who possesses the art of playing on the piano; but he ought to abandon the [illegible] of composing for which [illegible] the laugh [illegible] of Europe.

"There are many [illegible] who [illegible] as a pianist, and [illegible] will be [illegible] to confess their [illegible]

the Public opinion cannot be suppressed. I will make itself known. Neither is he given to [illegible] to perfection in everything. Liszt may run his fingers over all the keyboard; he possesses the mechanical part of music, but it does not follow that he can compose for artists.

"There are different branches now reached by different paths. Not one of them supposes the other. The real artist, the part of music and especially that which regards the human voice, Liszt has not possessed; and his works prove this to all unprejudiced hearers."

The writer says, elsewhere:

"The Bals [illegible] is a hall here at which are given concerts both vocal and instrumental in order to [illegible], and perform a little more.

[illegible] name inspired by the name of [illegible] in the [illegible] and arranged in my century [illegible] performed and to his a movement is given the name of [illegible]. That you may know what we stand in the matter of [illegible] compositions, it is only necessary to state that [illegible] performed a piece entitled a [illegible] by Liszt!"

Draping the Flag

Saturday, November 2, 1867.

Oh, Flag! that o'er my quiet home
Has often floated, now I bind
On thee a mournful badge of woe,
As thou dost wave to the wind.

In hours of joy and glowing pride
I oft have hung thee proudly out,
Seeming to fill the calyx [illegible]
The bugle call, the [illegible] shout.

Yet ever 'mid thy stripes and stars,
I saw the hero's life blood stream
As from rebellion's hands we [illegible] came
Those colors in the death-fire's gleam.

Now, purified by blood and tears
From the dark blot of slavery's stain,
I ne'er had thought to gaze once more
Upon thy folds with bitter pain.

Yet once with tears thy banner bowed
Was closely bound by mournful band
When the whole world with a deplored
The Leader, Father of our Land.

Again, and thy folds there floats
The mournful sign of household grief
(Even so slight a token seems To wounded hearts a fond relief.)

Oh, Flag, thou art unstained by tears
And sanctified by Heroes' fame,
Yet on thy record thou dost wreath
None higher stands than ANDREW's name.

I say, then, 'mid thousand other signs
Which signal through our land to-day
What being has held the State
When in his prime he passed away.

Not passed away! His well earned fame
Shall with his country's honors be Enrolled, as each true heart the sign
Of Faith and Hope and Liberty.

Music in Boston.

MR. L. F. HARRISON's first concert last Monday evening, brought back to us Madame PAREPA ROSA, and her husband with Signor FERRANTI and for a new and a [illegible] attraction the pianist whom we all thought so wonderful many years ago, LEOPOLD DE MEYER. It was the Parepa troupe somewhat shorn of its old proportions, and without an orchestra, so that there was no particular propriety in styling it a "Grand" Concert. But the Music Hall was remarkably well filled and the favorites of two years past were very cordially welcomed. Mme. Rosa's cheerful generous presence with bouquets the favor which her noble voice and song everbeamed. The voice was as clear, as pure, as all-refining as before, and the delivery as perfect; only at times, in stronger passages, it sounded a little hard, and in the strength we missed something of the old sweetness; not so at all in the [illegible] which was wondrously beautiful and even with all her artistic finesse, [illegible] and ease of execution. We wished the selections had been better; they were mostly of the very ordinary English ballad kind:—"Tripping through the meadows," by Molloy, set down as "new" but surely another specimen of that narrow "I'm o'clock in the morning" school which sells so well and employs so many manufacturers in England;—a French Romance, "Je [illegible]," by English (Irish) Balfe; a ballad or two more for encores,—all of course sung with spirit and captivating to the less musical part of an audience. The one good thing was the Duet "Crudel, perchè finora" from Mozart's Figaro, which she sang with Ferranti.

Equally ordinary and without claim upon really musical ears and feelings were the violin selections of our friend Carl Rosa, whose very presence always wins one's sympathy, and whose playing this year as we intimated before, by its greater [illegible] and smooth[illegible] and the silence [illegible] tone shows the good influence of a more quiet, settled life. But beautiful and searching as were the tones, and fine the execution, one expects from such an artist something quite different from mere Belfast Souvenirs and fantasticat Fantasias on themes from the Trovatore.

But the object of most curiosity was the pianist virtuoso, our old friend De Meyer. As he hastened upon the stage hat and gloves in hand bowing and smiling, greatly changed by years, we knew him more by the fire of the eyes and by a certain [illegible] air than by anything else. [illegible] of the piano, the old ways and manner, the characteristic touch at certain, and with passages bounding clean and limpid; the eccentric dash and energy; the bold and superfluous force thrown into the accent of a single note; the exciting promise of now and then a marked opening and then the wandering away into indefinite prolixity of ornamental passage work (for all his pieces were of his own composition); but all the time an unfailing, a [illegible] glad sense of a once [illegible] but faded [illegible] [illegible], brought back the man. He is still a remarkable player but not what he was. Yet there is enough individuality about it to make it (for a while at least) interesting. If he would only play good music! But we suppose the nervous tendency, too long indulged, has become at last an unconquerable habit, a sort of nightmare spell paralyzing the very will that would return. He did it be sure on being recalled, play a fine fair thing of Chopin; you of course recognized the features, and yet half doubted them, so little was there of the Chopin soul. For the rest, his own "Départ ou [illegible]" was delicate and tender, although somewhat commonplace, in the first part, and fiery in the second; and his Second Fantasia, opening with a really stately transcription of the Druid march, soon began to wander automatically up and down the keys in that conventional bravura, brilliant, but bringing no new thought, only at times startling by a bit of fiery accent. The Steinway piano, extremely sweet in tone when softly or moderately played, jingled as it taxed beyond its power in the strong passages.

The very rollicking rich-voiced Ferranti, put to it for new buffo songs could only put us off with third-rate ones. Balfe's "Fooline" has not grown, without which fine it weariness! and that crying scold again from Fioravanti's "Lafemmita" rel[illegible] on the quick angry reiteration of the word "Femmine, femmine!" for any witty point it has while the fine-looking was [illegible] it attempts for an artistic concert. In short the Concert as a whole, was not artistic, long as the execution was, of course, with such superior artists. In place of Orchestra, there were Organ preludes at beginning and end by Mr. Thayer and rather dry piano-forte accompaniment by Mr. G. W. Colby.

The second of the five Parepa concerts takes place this evening and the third to-morrow (Sunday); when we look for a programme at least worthy of a week day.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The habits of a fortnightly paper compelling us to go to press upon the very Thursday of the concert we cannot report yet of the first one. We can only speak from our knowledge of the programme (how rich it is how well contrasted in its two parts, we have shown in our last) and of the rehearsals; and we doubt not we shall be able to say in our next that it did not disappoint the glowing hopes of the unusually large and generous subscription audience. We have pretty well too how fine a surprise the public will have experienced in the beautiful tenor voice and the true musical spirit of the young member of the Harvard Association, the last graduate taken into its ranks, the sweet college singer of a year ago, who now makes his debut as it is an earnest where he proposes to devote himself to the best classical (Symphony Concerts) music Mr. GEORGE L. Osgood.

To the full effect of that Dedication Overture (op. 124) of Beethoven especially, as well as of the "Jupiter" Symphony the Gade "Highlands" "Overture" and Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, we do need a greater force of strings in our Orchestra. The musical means are not so great as the musical heart of Boston. But let the heart continue earnest and the means will come. Surely a public which gives nearly fourteen hundred season subscribers for eight purely classical Symphony concerts, deserves to have a noble Orchestra! And the large list has cost scarcely any effort. The simple knowledge that the good plan of pure programmes would be persevered in and that the nucleus of thought audience was guaranteed [illegible] in the very character of the Association that provides the concerts, has proved enough, as was anticipated to draw the real music-lovers in such numbers. Verily, we have not too fine a store of good classical violin and 'cello players here, when larger cities, which abound in them, show so much less of the right sort of appetite. We are sure, there is room in Boston for a dozen first rate orchestra musicians in the string department, including another fine Quartet for Chamber Concerts; and, with a little patience, they would find support here. The higher kind of occupation for such will steadily go on increasing; those who come, if they are competent, can take the first places, not a few of which are just now vacant.

The second concert (Nov. 21) reverts to last year's plan of programme—instead of two Symphonies, one Symphony and a Concerto. Part I. Cherubini's Overture, [illegible]; a Scotch song sung by Mrs. Cary. Mozart's Concerto for two pianos, played by Messrs. Lang and Parker. —Part II. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (B flat). Songs by Mrs. Cary. Overture to Oberon. The Symphony in the third Concert will be by Haydn.

The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, with selections from "Solomon," &c. for the Saturday evening, and "Samson" for the Sunday evening after Thanksgiving. We are happy to learn that Mr George L. Osgood is engaged for the tenor solos in the "Messiah" at Christmas time.

Shall we be a Musical People?

The following appeared some months since in the leading Methodist journal of this city, Zion's Herald. We can confess much sympathy with the ideas it presents; and it is certainly hopeful when Methodists begin to entertain them.

The love of music has become so widespread and so deep among us, that henceforth the Fine Art must be counted among the vital interests of this people. Music must enter largely into the education of freemen. To love freedom and to trust to that as the very soul and principle of all our institutions, the keystone of the arch of all political and social order, and yet to neglect the culture of the ideal arts,—especially that art which is the most ideal, the most free, the most spiritual, and the most sympathetic of the Arts, the Art of Tones,—why a people might as well hope to live and realize true liberty without religion. The instinct of liberty in the individual, the pursuit of one's own pleasure (what he fancies his own life,) will always be more or less in conflict with the restraints of general order; freedom of thought, the free play of the opinions and sensibilities, will affect all [illegible] in question every creed and system; the lyrical element in human nature will ever prove too strong for unmelodic dust. Positive legal enactments, positive forms of religion, moral prohibitions can do much, can at least preserve a certain outward decency and show of order; but they cannot satisfy the great thirst of the soul, which is for a real taste of the harmonious life of heavenly freedom, harmony and beauty even here in this world, amid these poor, "careless" struggles with and through the selfish spirit of the natural man.

For, after all, our creeds, our policies, our social institutions, [illegible] the very genius of the cold and means of [illegible] rule are not more religious in the image of [illegible] forms, or cogency can be said really to unite men, yet the great [illegible] of the devout [illegible] far as any to be made one consciously and [illegible] with the Life that is in God. Now in a republic more than under any system, the free play with all [illegible] in the very act of competition, the whole fight (the harsher and longer one) of individualism, bewildered and miserable for [illegible], and the [illegible] the absence of the old paternal tendency, [illegible] of government in providing for the children's play things, leaves [illegible] amusements and surroundings, gardens of Art parks, etc. makes it particularly [illegible] to the whole social [illegible] [illegible] in any [illegible] every way the culture of the Beautiful. It is not enough that we are taught right moral principles; no mere form or tests for what is good and true and beautiful; a man's entire moral life by a more unintentional, unseen, silent process than even the convictions of his mind or traditions from without, or conscience from within. Let the American people grow up with a sincere taste for harmony and beauty, taste for Art, for Music, in the highest sense; let them learn through Art the meaning of the word genial, and in this culture we shall lose the sharp, rude corners of so much that is violent, obtrusive and uncouth, so much that is prosaic, hard, pretentious, egotistic, in our national [illegible]. Scholarship in beautiful freedom is [illegible], but they are exceptional also, they are sublime and all cannot be sublime. But the sense of the beautiful in Art (and that is sure to quicken the sense of beauty in nature and in character) tends naturally to round off the sharp corners of our offensive democratic individuality; to make us forget ourselves, to supply the unseemly lack of reverence which has been charged upon us, to fill us with the instinct of harmony, good order and good manners. The [illegible] [illegible] as the very [illegible] and fibre of one's life, with a sincere taste for what is beautiful, it is less easy to offend.

Our people preoccupied so long with the first cares of laying the foundations of their political and social fabric, were slow to recognize the need of esthetic culture. Religion and a real business—these are the only interests we dared to be in earnest about. But Art, the culture of the love of the Ideal, had to come in to keep these from becoming sordid and uncomfortable. Mere amusement mere play without art or beauty soon sinks to the bestial. We must believe a place before amusement and in joy, as we do in the soul itself; we must believe in the sense that a child bears the senses in order to the soul, and to believe this we must have Art for a mediator; for Art does not, says as the Ideal informs speaking to us, through the senses. Art reconciles the spiritual with the natural. Our people are becoming alive to this thought. There is verily to be seen a great awakening among us to the need. [illegible] the divine influence of Art. A great activity in all the walks of Art is developing in this nation or people. Especially do we most earnest of art with love, is as say, even a strong desire, for that which is at once the most ideal and the most popular of the Arts, Music.

It would be presumptuous to call ourselves as yet a musical people, in the full sense, for instance that the Germans are, or that the Italians were. But there yet [illegible] in a [illegible] upon all musical opportunities, both of enjoying and of learning, a fact becoming a great sign of the times with us, the activity goes on increasing in a compound ratio, that looms most formidably ahead. Certainly it is a social fact of great significance. Its value of course is in proportion to its earnestness, and we do not believe it is a mere passing fashion. There is a deep musical movement in this community, stronger and deeper just where there is the most of general culture and the most of faith and true humanity, strongest in New England, and as much [illegible] central intellectual and moral life in Boston; and more or less all the great cities, but in the other cities we cannot help thinking the [illegible] is more an imported enthusiasm, while here it springs more sincerely from within, a deep felt want of our whole social and religious nature.

Think of the oratorios, the operas, the concerts, in greater numbers and variety than ever and of higher power quality, which our people of all classes have thronged to this winter, spending as if for a necessity and not a luxury which the question was of hearing a great artist or a great work of Beethoven or Handel or Mozart, or Mendelssohn! Think how cheerful the [illegible] taste has grown (of course there is also in a [illegible] time a large mass now of superficial [illegible] and all sorts of [illegible] up—these in every where even in Leipzig and Vienna) how many symphonies we have each season here [illegible] we [illegible] of The Messiah and the "Creation," the two only oratorios known here fifty years ago, and which led the founders of our venerable Oratorio society to couple in the titles two names so remotely related to each other as Handel and Haydn), but also of "Jephtha," "Samson," "Judas Maccabæus," "Israel in Egypt," "St. Paul," "Elijah," "Hymn of Praise,"—all such great works, and only such—for it would be hard now to revive much interest in such a work as Neukomm's "David;" think how steadily the mere sensational, "effect" music, tried here many times, as all new fashions are, has been losing ground in Boston programmes, while the true masters, those who wrought in all sincerity and [illegible]; think how the Chamber Concerts, whose one [illegible] is to rank the rest [illegible] form of Quartets, etc., for strings? Instruments, or the pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven and Schubert and other classical works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin,—works of such rare genius [illegible] almost exclusively in the mind [illegible] of mere show-pieces and [illegible] of mere [illegible] feats of execution—have hardly found concerts enough in a week to give all the artists, each with a faithful classic of their [illegible] a chance. Think how many admirable pianists, skilled interpreters of all the best that has been written for their instrument, whether solo or in concert with other instruments, have found encouragement to settle down here, both as public players and teachers. Think too, what pianos we have manufactured here—here the Chickering or Gounod are the throne of [illegible] in Europe's practice now—and what church organs, how many of them are! how large and perfect of the superbly great Organ one of the world's three or four best and largest, that stands [illegible] there [illegible] never so much quiet back ground of many [illegible] in our noble Music Hall, and think of the [illegible] and of our many halls. Then finally look at the great mass schools that have sprung up so rapidly among us;—two of them by the ambitious name of Conservatory, and already boasting three hundred and three [illegible] hundred pupils. And of the eagerness there among our young men and women, and even children to learn all that they possibly can with their means, of music [illegible] and practice. Literally success at all Nos. [illegible] and [illegible] the idea of becoming of [illegible] in [illegible]. And so, naturally, at the same time music is becoming an eminent branch of business, both in the way of trade and manufacture and profession. Verily there is machinery enough at work, and there is motive power enough behind it to work up a great musical culture here. Blindly or wisely a great musical movement is accumulating momentum at a formidable rate. The more important then, that it should understand itself, that it should recognize true landmarks, and be kept in a sound and true direction.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club concerts on the 2nd and 25th were very successful. Case Hall was filled on both nights with lovers of good music and we are safe in saying none were disappointed; for a more ready enjoyable concerts are rarely given in this city. We have no space to give the programmes which comprised selections from Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart. The thorough mastery of the Quintette Club and the delivery of [illegible] render their programmes [illegible] very nearly perfect. Miss Addie S. Ryan, who made her first appearance in these concerts, proved herself an excellent artist. She has a voice of rare compass and beauty and seems to feel what she sings. She sang a number of charming English and German ballads, in [illegible] manner.—Herr. Mus. World.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.—The 14th regular concert of the old Musical Society (Oct. 17) with an orchestra of nearly fifty had the following programme:

Overture—Magic Flute	Mozart
Song for Soprano	[illegible]
Funeral March—(Orchestra)	Chopin
Chorus and Solo Quartet [illegible]	[illegible]
Scherzo—Midsummer Night's Dream	Mendelssohn
[illegible]—Scene for Soprano Solo, Chorus, etc.	[illegible]
	Mendelssohn

We have [illegible] had seven nights of German Opera: (of course,) Martha, Fille du Regiment, [illegible] Der Freischütz, &c.

LECTURE ON THE PIANO-FORTE.—Mr. B. J. Lang, the well known musical teacher, made his debut as a lecturer Saturday afternoon in Chickering's Hall. The lecture was delivered to the pupils of the New England Conservatory of Music, but there was quite a number of listeners outside of that new large circle. Mr. Lang's subject was "The Piano." He gave its history from the earliest period, and traced its course and influence down to the present day. In relation to pianos, Mr. Lang quite disfavours in the "Squares," and hopes they may be displaced by the "Upright," the only kind, by his judgment, which should be tolerated. He thinks there are too many who attempt to learn to play the piano. None should do so who do not in some manner exhibit a talent for it. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a piano [illegible] [illegible] behind it. What should Mr. Lang see the best pianos of the world. Among the most expensive was a [illegible], and the worst from Germany. He regards those [illegible] [illegible] as unsurpassed in the world and believes the perfection of piano construction has been about reached. A Boston piano made by [illegible] [illegible] is good enough. Mr. Lang gave much good and [illegible] advice as to learning and teaching the piano. He uttered some pretty severe things against some of the music of the day and regarded miscellaneous concerts as [illegible] and [illegible]. Entertainments in which a whole symphony is given he regards as something worth while to [illegible]. In this connection he commended the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association and Orchestral Union. The music of Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, and [illegible] composers was [illegible], while the "hodge-podge" school was lashed and [illegible] of such heavy [illegible]. Touching [illegible] [illegible] articles of [illegible] known as piano music, he said they were [illegible] and ought to be [illegible]. The ordinary [illegible] [illegible] back to it, against which an occasional [illegible] could be [illegible] [illegible] worth a [illegible]. Some of the English peculiarities of playing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible]. The English have [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible], a piano playing just as they do [illegible] other [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] good [illegible]. As to the "[illegible]" of playing and the manner, he said he [illegible] [illegible]. It failed language to express [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] players and [illegible] [illegible], as they have a power to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Mr. Lang spoke [illegible] [illegible] of an [illegible] [illegible] and rather pleasant manner. The [illegible] of a lecturer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] from his own experience as a teacher. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the start [illegible] he should be crude, and he [illegible] [illegible], but the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was more than a [illegible]. Some of his anecdotes were [illegible] [illegible] and not always [illegible], but he gave on the whole satisfaction to his hearers. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But it is no injustice to Mr. Lang to say that he plays better than he preaches.—Post.

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Carl [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], Orchestral Matinées in each of which a Symphony by Haydn or Mozart is the principal [illegible]. Last week he gave Mozart's "Jupiter," which is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A writer in the Evening Bulletin thus describes it for the Philadelphians:

The name of "Jupiter" has been given to this Symphony probably to indicate thereby its [illegible] majestic character. The first movement, Allegro vivace, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by a bold, defiant [illegible] [illegible] passage for all the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], which is followed by two measures taken by the string quartet piano. Another [illegible] measure of [illegible] [illegible] from the preceding [illegible] in the harmony of the dominant [illegible]. The following period, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] rhythm, [illegible] the wind instruments [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] figures of the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] is given a [illegible] [illegible] suspension. After a [illegible] on the second of the [illegible], [illegible] a new [illegible] of [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] is produced by the [illegible] in the key of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] who [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the beautiful [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] gracefully introduced by the [illegible] [illegible] in the key of G. A [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], after a moment's pause for the whole orchestra, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], however, in the major [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible], leads to the end of the first part [illegible] [illegible] of the movement. The change from the dominant G to E [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] striking [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and frequent changes in harmony. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven's works, and they have been regarded as something new, but here, and in other places in this Symphony, we have them in the greatest simplicity and in most imposing grandeur. An eminent German critic, whom we cannot quote at any length, says: "But the inner beauty is not the all-essential; a peculiar noble thought, a solid strength and manly dignity, a brilliant marching on, are, by their daring and freedom, the characteristic attributes of the [illegible]."

The Andante Cantabile is [illegible] [illegible] F-major, and makes such a peculiar [illegible] throughout, that the violins and violas should be [illegible]. It is rich in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] particularly in the suddenly changing shading of piano and forte, which seem [illegible] [illegible] to interrupt the even, quiet flow of the melody, but in reality [illegible] the more to elevate it. The three principal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

The Menuetto Allegretto [illegible]. The Finale, Allegro Molto, a composition [illegible] the Fugue, which [illegible] [illegible] one of the distinguishing [illegible] of this wonderful composition. Mozart stands in this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Fugue form with such an elegant, free handling [illegible] [illegible] throughout. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven, Spohr, Schumann, Gade and others [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Fugue in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their strength [illegible] to carry [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] of thought and [illegible] from beginning to end of [illegible] work. But Mozart has left us another example of this masterly command of never-failing resources of melody and harmony in the wonderful overture, The Magic Flute, a work which must stand as well a [illegible] [illegible].

The last four measures of the [illegible] will bring to [illegible] [illegible] the fact that this [illegible] [illegible] already [illegible] [illegible] by Mozart in other works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A [illegible] [illegible], however, of this Fugue movement cannot be given here, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and we should be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and beautiful melodic landscapes, [illegible] a work which stands among the classics as the mighty Jove among the gods of Mount Olympus. It is a Jupiter Tonans.

NEW YORK.—Mr. Theodore Thomas gave his first symphony soirée at Steinway Hall on the [illegible] evening last. The programme was [illegible] attractive, skilfully selected and [illegible] rendered. The opening piece, a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Bach and performed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a charming piece of melody, pure and simple, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and grace. Cherubini is introduced in the third act of Medea. It is a composition worthy of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and vigorously marked out. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The two movements [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the unfinished Symphony in B minor, are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The great feature of the evening, however, was the production of Beethoven's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Never [illegible] Mr. Thomas's orchestra [illegible] more [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the interpretation of this sublime poem. It was clearly a labor of love with them from beginning to end, [illegible]. Miss Teresa Carreño was the soloist. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from Mozart's Figaro. The audience was thoroughly appreciative, and though not so large as it [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Thomas's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The whole affair was a decided success.—Sund. Times.

* Letters of Distinguished Musicians [illegible] Translated from the [illegible] Lady Wallace. (London: Longmans.)

has failed to reveal, however anxious he might have been to say it. And he has failed because the problem is an impossible one. One may note what Mendelssohn studied—how he studied Beethoven's last style, and meditated on the chord of the 13th, and analyzed Bach, and fiddled up Martin Luther's hymn tunes. The technicalities of his art may be gathered from his musical works. But that which chiefly occupied his mind, and which he attempted to explain in his letters—its moral aspect and its aesthetic principles—he has failed to make known to us.

Weber was an art critic as well as a musician. But he too only tells us what he liked and disliked, what seemed ill or well to him. He never attempted to get to the bottom of things with any fundamental principles of his art that were not merely technical. He was a genial rather than a self-conscious artist. His mind was allied to the storm-and-stress school of Schiller's Robbers. Hence he lacked the artistic earnestness of Mendelssohn. It would be difficult to imagine the younger artist ever becoming disaffectionate to a lady whom he had first loved for her artistic powers, after he had discovered that they were only mechanical and that she had no feeling for art. Weber, however, revealed his nature when he found that Caroline Brandt's views of high art did not see beyond the commonplace notion of its procuring money, coat, and skirts, did not allow the discovery to prevent his courting and marrying her. Finally, art was not much more to Weber himself. It was a delight but not a conscience. It was an end, but it was much more a means—a means to fame, popularity and wealth.

These letters, however, though they contribute very little to our musical education, are, in other respects, a pleasant reading. Mendelssohn is always delightful; his playfulness, his affectionateness, his fancy and his polish make him one of the best letter writers of the century. Weber is lively and clever. Haydn is a genial ... but a rival more of his superiority and little to shelf ... of temper. Haydn's letters are all on business. Both he and Haydn furnish short but very interesting autobiographies. Gluck writes like a scholar who knows exactly what he has to say and how to say it. All the writers were men of powerful intelligence, though their minds were devoted to that art which seems the most foreign to the intellect; and the letters deserve a place in libraries, as the records of great men.

Musicians' Letters.

From the London Review.

The growing public interest in music and musicians is in no way more evidenced than by the publication, in recent years, of translations of the memoirs and correspondence of foreign composers, which would have found few if any English readers a quarter of a century back. The letters of Mendelssohn, of Mozart, and of Beethoven, rendered by the present work and published by the same firm, have appeared within the last four years, besides, as the more general Spohr's autobiography and lives of Carl Maria von Weber and Schubert by other translators and publishers. So many publications of the kind within so short a period is sufficient proof of the increased importance attached by our reading and thinking public to an art which has for too many years in this country been considered in the light of a mere popular amusement, rather than as a possible exponent of feeling and sentiment as pure and noble as those which had their utterance in the hitherto more generally recognized forms of poetry and painting. The musician, that is, the creative musician, is now beginning to be recognized among us as holding as high a rank in consideration and exercising as high a mission, as the literary man or the artist; and all who derive any pleasure from the works of a great composer are now interested in such personal details of his career as can be gleaned from his memoirs and correspondence.

The present volume (collected by Dr. Ludwig Nohl) forms a worthy pendant to the previous works of the kind above referred to, and has a special interest as illustrating the lives and careers of five composers whose productions ranged from the middle of the last to the middle of the present century. The book commences with a series of letters by Gluck, the first of which (addressed to the Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany) consists of his comments on his own opera of "Alceste"—the work in which he first realized that art revolution which was the result of his long and mature reflection on the artificial conventionalism and [illegible] of the dramatic music of the period. The philosophic and reforming power of Gluck's mind is nowhere more admirably shown than in his communication dated Vienna, October 30, 1770, to the Duke of Braganza, to whom he dedicated his opera "Paride ed Elena." In subsequent letters, to Louis XVI., to Marie Antoinette, to Klopstock, to M. de la Harpe, and other celebrities of the day, Gluck's energetic thought and confidence in the truth of his principles and his art are also most characteristically shown, including some interesting references to the production of his "Iphigenie in Aulide," specially for the Parisian opera stage, and his well-known feud with the rival composer Piccini, which divided even members of the same family with all the animosity of a political quarrel. Rugged and self-asserting as Gluck was, he must also have been somewhat of the courtier, since in some interesting extracts given from the diary of the unfortunate Princess de Lamballe, we are told that this uncompromising composer, whose self-confidence was almost arrogant, "often told her that he always improved his music according to the impression that it made on the Queen" (Marie Antoinette). Again "he said to the Queen that the air of France had rekindled the powers of his personal genius, and the sight of her Majesty had given such a wonderful impetus to his ideas, that his compositions had become, like herself, sublime." Many such characteristic personal traits, as well as illustrations of his art career, are to be found in the interesting series.

The next portion of the volume consists of a few somewhat meagre traces of Charles Philip Emanuel Bach (born in 1714), son of the great John Sebastian, and himself the immediate pioneer of the modern school of pianoforte music. A slight autobiographic sketch gives the few leading incidents of his most uneventful life, together with a passing indication of the principles which led him to adopt a style of expression rather than of mere [illegible] combination in composition and performance.

A rather copious collection of Haydn's letters forms the next portion of the volume, the first authenticated date being 1780. A large portion of these, addressed to the publishers—Artaria of Vienna, and Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipzig—are occupied with details of his business arrangements and contracts for the price of his compositions—the amounts in most instances standing in absurd contrast to the present estimation of the works. Even after the composer had become eminent we find him agreeing with the publisher Nadermann (October 25, 1784) to supply "three new and very carefully composed symphonies, neatly and correctly written out, for the sum of 150[?] ducats, payable at the end of November." Especially interesting are portions of his diary and the letters relating to Haydn's visit to London, where he was at once received as a composer of world-wide fame. In a letter written from 18 Great Pulteney street, dated January 8, 1791 (only a week after his arrival), he says "Every one seems anxious to know me. I have already dined out six times, and could be invited every day if I chose; but I must in the first place consider my health, and in the next my work. Except the nobility, I admit no visitors till two o'clock in the afternoon, and at four o'clock I dine at home with Salomon." It was Salomon who brought Haydn to London, where the great composer produced his twelve grand symphonies at the then renowned Salomon Concerts. In his diary Haydn records his presence at the Lord Mayor's Banquet (November 5, 1791), where, among much that appeared strange to the simple-minded German musician, he noticed that "the strangest thing of all was that one part of the company went on dancing without hearing a single note of the music; for first at one table, and then at another, songs were shouted, or toasts given, amidst the most crazy uproar and clinking of glasses and hurrahs." The civic festivities of the London of that day were doubtless not a little startling to the foreign visitor.

It is not a little remarkable that none of Haydn's letters refer to Beethoven, notwithstanding that he was, for a period, a pupil of Haydn. The grand and independent originality of the younger composer, however, could scarcely be appreciated by one who, however great, belonged to a school of art in which mere classic form and symmetrical proportion were absolute essentials. This is sufficiently evidenced by the well-known story of Haydn's disapproval of Beethoven's pianoforte trio in C minor (No. 3 of op. 1), by far the finest of the set of three to which it belongs. On the other hand, there are several passages in the letters and diaries of Haydn recording his warm admiration and reverence for the genius of his contemporary Mozart, whose death, in 1791, was lamented by Haydn as a personal affliction as well as an irreparable loss to art. There is but little reference to Haydn's second visit to London (1794), also at the instance of Salomon; and the remainder of the correspondence chiefly relates to his oratorios, "The Creation" (produced in Vienna in 1798), which with the "Seasons" (brought out in the same place in 1801) formed the closing triumphs of the veteran composer, who died in 1809, at the age of seventy-seven. The series of letters, like those of Gluck, includes a copy of the master's last will and testament.

The letters of Weber contained in the present volume, consist chiefly of those addressed to his friend and fellow-pupil, Gänsbacher, much of the interest of which has been forestalled by reference to the same materials in the biography of Weber published two years and a half since.

Weber's correspondence commences with a letter dated Freyberg, December 1, 1800[?], referring to conveying to Artaria, the publisher, an offer to engrave music on stone—the practice of the then new process of lithography having in his youth for some time diverted Weber's attention from his musical studies. In the next letter, dated 1810, Weber informs Nägeli (the well-known musician and publisher of Zurich), "I have once more entirely devoted myself to art"—and, speaking of his own musical tendencies, he states, "my principles differ far too much from those of Beethoven ever to come into contact with him." The strange want of appreciation, by a man of special original genius, of the productions of another of a far higher order of imaginative power must ever remain an art paradox; more incomprehensible in the case of the innovating Weber than in the more formal Haydn, whose standard of excellence was the classical precedent of the finished creative school of Mozart. We need not follow Weber's correspondence even through what has previously been more completely traversed in the biography above referred to, further than to say that it contains interesting details of his struggling artist-life, and many passing references to his productions. The letters, however, only come down to August, 1825, nearly a year before Weber's last triumph in the production of "Oberon" in London, and his death there in 1826. The last communication given is a letter to his friend Bärmann, the celebrated clarinet player of Munich, for whom Weber wrote his beautiful duet sonata in E flat (for pianoforte and clarinet), besides concertos for the instrument.

The letters of Mendelssohn here given (now published for the first time) are mostly addressed to the celebrated clarinet player just referred to, Bärmann of Munich. They commence with the date of 1826, when Mendelssohn was seventeen, at which age his compositions had already attracted much notice. Some of these communications, belonging to the period of his Italian tour (1831) are full of that genial vivacity which was a striking characteristic of his temperament well clouded by the successive losses of parents and relatives. Other letters are from Paris (1831), and fully bear out Mendelssohn's known want of entire sympathy with French musical art—almost the only antagonism (and that too a very active one) in his amiable nature. The letters are full of agreeable gossip and playful humor, but have slight reference to any of his own or other great productions of musical [illegible]. There are doubtless many letters of more importance in this respect still withheld from publication; but, it is to be hoped, only temporarily, [illegible] accomplished a writer and so [illegible] one in an art which he loved so dearly and practised so gloriously. Of his modesty and severe self-judgment we have several traces. Even in a letter dated 1834, after he had produced many masterpieces, we find him saying, "Should I ever succeed in writing something entirely to my own mind (it need not give pleasure to any one else), then I shall be able once more to write a becoming, sensible letter, and gladly tell you about myself; but as yet I am much dissatisfied, and should like to try to write better, for my works often please others better than myself." Be it remarked that this was penned by one who had already composed symphonies, overtures, quartets, piano-forte pieces, and songs, which now rank as classical productions, and who was only then about to commence his first oratorio, "St. Paul." What a contrast to some recent instances of gentlemen making sudden dash at fame by rushing at once into public with crude attempts at this ultimatum of musical art and genius!

The volume is illustrated with good portraits of Gluck, Haydn, and Weber—that of Haydn, however, being somewhat more heavy-looking than the German likenesses to which we have been accustomed. The translation is executed with the facility and smoothness which have distinguished Lady Wallace's several previous productions of the kind; and the book should find a place on the shelves of all who are interested in music and musicians.

Decorations of the New-Opera House of Paris.

The reports of the intended decorations of the new Opera House have been so extraordinary that most people believed them to be exaggerated; but however, it seems the case, as the following list supplied by M. Garnier, the architect of the new building, to the Moniteur des Arts, will show. The paintings consist of and so rooms of [illegible], are, for the grand public saloon, ten subjects for the [illegible] of the [illegible] ... from mythology and history: "Orpheus," "Eurydice," "[illegible]," "Harmony," "Judgement of Paris," &c., by M. Paul Baudry; "Parnassus," [illegible] ... and two large [illegible] ... decorations over the dome, by the same. A [illegible] to the left of the stage, to be decorated by M. Delaunay, the ceiling with "The Glorification of Singing," and [illegible] representing the subject. The corresponding room on the other side, "Harmony," in a ceiling and three [illegible], by M. Barrias. The great saloon for the ballet, four panels representing the various phases of the dance, and twenty portraits of famous dancers, by Gustave Boulanger. Grand staircase, four subjects, "Art," "Music," "Poetry," and "The Dance," in large compartments, by M. Pils, and twelve works in enamel by M. Emile Solier representing as many [illegible] where famous [illegible] have been produced, [illegible]. A grand cupola, by M. Jules Lenepveu: "The Gods and Goddesses of Olympus," representing the [illegible] ... by MM. Félix Thomas, Lenoir, and Clairin. The above are all ordered, and the following are proposed to be added to the list:—Four grand panels, and three tympans with figures on a ground of gold, for the entrance; a grand allegorical ceiling for the Imperial saloon, and five panels for the [illegible] to the saloon [illegible] ... for the Emperor's [illegible]; eight [illegible] panels in the Imperial vestibule [illegible]; eight historical figures, each [illegible], representing the eight places which have been most famous for operas in Paris ... and eight medallions for the large [illegible] ... for the small [illegible]; twelve panels, containing figures representing as many kinds of dances, for the [illegible]; and lastly, twenty portraits of celebrated [illegible] by Gérôme, de Curzon, Chiffart, Lefebvre, Bouguereau, Giacomotti, Bénouville, Lévy, Amaury Duval, Cabanel, Baudry, Lenepveu, Bonnat, Henner, Cabanel, Delaunay, Boulanger, [illegible] de Rocques, [illegible] Pils, [illegible] Lenepveu, Ranvier, [illegible] Marguet, Corot, Levy, [illegible], Français and Daubigny.

The sculpture is to keep pace with the painting. On the principal façade of the building above, in [illegible], by M. Maillet; below, groups representing the "Dance," "Harmony," "Comedy," and the "Drama," and "Singing" and "Music," by Carpeaux, Jouffroy, Perraud, and Guillaume; and in the centre, statues representing the "Idyll," "Elegy," and "Mythology" and "History," by [illegible], Chapu, [illegible], and Falguière. On the two fronts of the [illegible] façade, figures of "Architecture" and "Industry," by Jean Petit, and painting and sculpture, by [illegible] representing "Comedy" and the "Drama," by [illegible]; "Art" and "Science," by [illegible]; the "Drama" and "Music," by [illegible]; and "Singing" and "Poetry," by Cabet. The grand gilt-bronze plastic groups, by [illegible], representing "Poetry" and "Music," supported by figures of Fame. Over the centre of the proscenium, a gilt-bronze plastic group, "Apollo holding the lyre," and two allegorical figures, by Aimé Millet; and in the angles, "Pegasus restrained by the Muses." On the frontons of the Imperial pavilion, the arms of France, with sculptures by [illegible] and Travaux. On the Imperial staircase, four "Caryatides," by Elias Robert and Madame [illegible]. On the principal façade, gilt bronze busts of Mozart, Meyerbeer, Spontini, Beethoven, and Auber, by Chabaud, and of Halévy, Rossini, Quinault, and Scribe, by Evrard. On the lateral façades, busts in stone of Cambert, Lambert, [illegible] Rameau, [illegible], [illegible] and Paisiello by Henri Chevalier; [illegible], [illegible] Weber, Bellini and Adam, by Doublemard; [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], Monsigny, [illegible] and Sacchini, by [illegible] and [illegible]; [illegible], Hérold, Donizetti and Verdi by [illegible]. Medallions on the façade of Pergolesi, Haydn, [illegible] and Cimarosa, by [illegible]. Two grand statues for [illegible] of the stone and the stone [illegible]. In the interior of the building, ten seated statues of Lulli, Rameau, Gluck and Handel representing [illegible], French, German and English music, artists not yet appointed. On the grand [illegible] ... "Cariatides" in coloured marble by Jules Thomas. In the grand saloon two "Caryatides," flanking the chimney-piece, by Carrier Belleuse and Cordier. In [illegible] "Caryatides," at the Imperial and opposite boxes by Crauck and Lepère. It is proposed to add over the doors in [illegible] figures in the grand saloon, with busts of [illegible] composers, bas-reliefs, and ornaments. Over the [illegible] ... panels and angles, by Cain, while others by Jacquemart and Rouillard crown the decoration and guard the entrance.

A Visit to Rossini.

The friendly old gentleman, who was seated at the writing-table in his little study, rose with some difficulty, but with the most winning cordiality and held out his hand to us. We soon forced him back again into his arm-chair. Suddenly he asked us if the north seemed well in Vienna over [illegible], and about Beethoven. We then [illegible] ... "I remember Beethoven remarkably well," continued Rossini, after a pause, "though very nearly half a century has elapsed since I was in Vienna. I lost no time in going to see him." "But he did not admit you, as Schindler and other biographers inform us!" "On the contrary," said Rossini, correcting me, "I got the Italian poet Carpani, with whom I had previously been in the town, to introduce me to Beethoven, who received me immediately and in a very polite manner. The visit, it is true, did not last long, for all conversation with Beethoven was absolutely painful. On the day in question his hearing was bad, and, though I spoke in a very loud voice, perhaps, too, the Italian pronunciation may have rendered the task of conversing with him a still more difficult for him." I own that this statement of Rossini's, the truth of which was corroborated by minor details, pleased me like an unexpected present. I had always been annoyed at this trait in Beethoven's biography, as well as at the party of musical Jacobins who [illegible] the brutal Cerberus of the ring [illegible] door in the face of a man like Rossini. But there is not a word of truth in the whole story. We accepted with pleasure Rossini's offer to take us down stairs to the ground floor. We entered the light, spacious drawing-room, with its [illegible] ceiling, and its lofty windows, through which [illegible] ... In the middle of the room stands one of Pleyel's Grands. As we all know, Rossini, for the last few years has exhibited a great partiality for playing the piano, and this partiality induced him at last to take his stand as a composer ... [illegible] accumulation of [illegible], several of which are stereotyped. He began at once to complain that Schäffer would not give him a chance of getting [illegible] piano. "It is true that I do not practise my scales every day like you young people; but when I play them the whole length of the piano, I fall off my chair either right or left. During the winter Rossini gives six or eight musical soirées at his town residence, No. 1, Chaussée d'Antin. For we [illegible] [illegible] ... the style of decoration adopted for his apartments is strikingly devoid of taste, with [illegible] much of the lumber. Here is a [illegible] engraving of the [illegible] della Scala [illegible] Parisian ideal in a very low-necked dress, and all along the wall are hung in frames with [illegible] of the [illegible]. On the [illegible], a [illegible] ... of small Japanese figures and Chinese pictures, for which Rossini appears to have a great partiality. In the way of portraits, the only ones I remarked were the small photographs of the King of Portugal and of Adelina Patti upon the mantel-shelf. Of Adelina Patti the maestro speaks with admiring interest, always excepting her when he indulges in lamentations to the effect that the race of great vocal artists has completely died out. "Look there!" he said, pointing to the new opera-house, which rises, surrounded by scaffolding, before his windows. "We shall soon have a new theatre; but we have already no more singers. Shall you be better off when your new opera house is finished at Vienna?" To attend the soirées of the celebrated maestro is the [illegible] of every one in Paris. The most distinguished persons frequently take more trouble to obtain an invitation to Rossini's than to the Tuileries, and the papers never neglect giving next day an account of what took place. I was enabled to attend the last of these musical evenings, and came to having felt more honored than pleased. Rossini's residence is very far from being large enough to accommodate the number of persons invited. The heat was something indescribable, and the pressure so great that the most desperate efforts were always necessary whenever a [illegible] vocalist (especially one of the weight of Madame Sax) had to make her way from her seat to the piano. A host of ladies, sparkling with jewels, occupy the entire area of the music-room; the gentlemen stand, jammed together so as to be unable to move, at the open doors. Now and then a servant with refreshments wriggles through the gaping crowd, but it is no use [illegible] only very few persons (and those mostly strangers) take anything worth mentioning. The lady of the house, it is said, does not like their doing so. About the present Madame Rossini I have nothing further to tell than that she is rich and was once beautiful. A boldly sculptured Roman nose, likewise, alone of all that has been spared, from out the remains of her former beauty; the rest was covered by [illegible]. The programme of the concert (made up mostly, as was natural, of Rossini's music) included Italian and French vocal pieces, executed by the leading members of the opera, Mme. [illegible] Battu, Nicolini and others. Two new Rossini piano-forte pieces [illegible] by a young violinist [illegible] the name of [illegible] were not so remarkable for originality as for the piling up of difficulties in them. They bore the strange titles, "Deep Sleep and Sudden Awaking," and "Tartarian Boléro." The vocal pieces are more melodious and beautiful. They are not unfrequently [illegible] and invariably [illegible] to regard the resources of the voice. The master of the house himself accompanied two of the vocal pieces on the piano with unbending dullness. Otherwise, on such evenings, he generally sits, silent and tired, in the little adjoining room, with his old colleague Carafa, or some other Italian friend, and is delighted if the guests do not intrude upon him while in repose. I regret not having heard Rossini's new Mass. The work (like all the others carefully guarded and kept unpublished by its composer) is said to consist in no very striking beauties. "It is not the kind of sacred music fitted for you Germans," said Rossini, in declining in words on my request, "my most sacred music is never aught more than semi-serious." He calls his "Napoleon Hymn" (for the distribution of prizes at the Exhibition) "[illegible] music" and his operas "[illegible] stuff." It is, indeed, impossible to talk seriously with the celebrated maestro; he finds at home only his quips, jokes and [illegible], and when he jokes about himself we [illegible] are always in doubt whether he is laughing at himself or at those whom he is addressing. Though we may blame the exaggeration in this grotesque self-depreciation, it is based on a motive of feeling which we must fail to recognize on looking somewhat into the circumstances of the case. Rossini lives in the midst of a system of uninterrupted adoration and puffing. There are but few men in the world to whom such homage is every being paid. He owes in every line from visitors the highest notabilities of a diplomacy worthy and set come and go. He is overwhelmed with costly presents and tender marks of attention; out of a hundred persons, ninety-nine drink themselves bound to say flattering things to him. [illegible] Rossini's character [illegible] "What shall I call you?" [illegible] Rossini never [illegible] has been to the theatre only twice, probably [illegible] [illegible] — From Fanny Fern in the New York Press.

Music Abroad.

London.

[illegible] short scene [illegible] was opened at Her Majesty's Theatre [illegible] the Italian Opera, the principal [illegible] Mlle. [illegible] Titiens [illegible] Mme. [illegible] Lablache [illegible] [illegible] Mlle. Clara Louise Kellogg, from the New York Academy of Music [illegible] [illegible] Mlle. Titiens [illegible] her usual share of applause. [illegible] On Tuesday [illegible] Trovatore [illegible]

[illegible] commanding a compass of two octaves, is brilliant in its upper range without being weak in its lower register — the quality resonant and sufficiently powerful even for the large space of Her Majesty's Theatre — while it possesses that rare sympathetic tone without which the most faultless execution and brilliant style must fail to realize the true object of musical expression. To these natural and personal advantages, Mlle. Kellogg adds that of finished training in the best school of vocal execution [illegible] the thorough preparation of [illegible] the formation of a great singer [illegible] for such a position.

Germany

(From the London Athenaeum.)

"[illegible] Herr Wagner's kingdom of Bavaria," writes our Correspondent, [illegible] Signor Verdi [illegible] Frankfort [illegible] Il Trovatore [illegible]

[illegible] a few more foreign notes made to the [illegible] "The German winter season of instrumental [illegible] has set in," writes our Correspondent. "To judge from the programmes of orchestral and choral concerts, no less important than those of [illegible] Cologne and Stuttgart, the 'new ideas' [illegible] At the first Gürzenich Concert at Cologne besides Cherubini's Overture to Les Abencerages, which is as good as unknown in London, and besides that excellent but more familiar masterpiece a new composition for voices and orchestra, by Herr Ferdinand Hiller was performed: also Herr Gade's Frühlingsphantasie, one of the most graceful specimens of his very [illegible] talent. At Stuttgart on a similar occasion, M. Félicien David's 'Desert' [illegible] and Fräulein [illegible] played Chopin's Concerto in [illegible] [illegible] Herren Joachim, Laub [illegible] and Wilhelmj. At Cologne was to be heard [illegible] of whom very great promise [illegible] Leipzig."

"While Herr Bilse was giving his good Symphony Concerts in Munich, another conductor [illegible] in England, though only as the successor of Strauss, Labitzky and Lanner, Herr Gungl [illegible] there with his chapel of musicians. The [illegible] were [illegible] miscellaneous. In those wonderful Gardens of Tegernsee [illegible] as thick as a [illegible] one [illegible] the Englishman's greyhound [illegible] description of a small 'strong enough to hang a hat on,'—and where the beloved Bavarian [illegible] is served to the [illegible] of some half-dozen huge [illegible] to each [illegible] Herr Gungl, who goes the round of the [illegible] of all matters of music, and attends to the execution of the most [illegible] [illegible] with as much spirit as if anything more [illegible] than a polka was really [illegible] by his bass and trombone players. It was strange to hear [illegible] Beethoven's Overture to 'The Ruins of Athens.' It was [illegible] in spite of the [illegible] to make acquaintance with the Abbé Liszt's 'Huldigung's March.' This might have been [illegible] [illegible] for he has brought [illegible] [illegible] brilliancy [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] by the Abbé [illegible] There is more [illegible] for deeper regret and graver speculation than the career and the compositions of this noble man of genius."

"Herr Lewandowsky's opera, 'Die Ersten Palm,' was the other day produced at Prague: also, another new musical drama, 'Der Wild im Hornmermond' [illegible] Herr Weissmeyer.—During the past month 'Dinorah' has been played at Frankfort; Tannhäuser at Berlin and Rienzi and Halévy's [illegible] at Dresden; M. There is [illegible] [illegible] These [illegible] It would be well worth the trouble of analysing [illegible] [illegible] Tully as [illegible]."

"The Guide Books stand in need of revision as [illegible] is what is to be met with in Germany north and south. Some twenty years ago the Michaelis-Kirche in Munich was reputed to be [illegible] the only place [illegible] the Alps where the choral masses [illegible] old Italian masters could be heard well executed. The writer has [illegible] again tried [illegible] to verify this statement [illegible] Red Book [illegible] [illegible] disappointment. On the other hand a very fine unaccompanied musical mass is [illegible] heard on Sunday or two ago at the Theatine Kirche. But as regards the execution—the composition not being of extraordinary merit. For the charm of [illegible] singing a concert, especially when given in conjunction with the [illegible] ceremonials of Rome, [illegible] [illegible] There is no [illegible] service music from hearing it in church. It becomes almost difficult to estimate its intrinsic worth when it is removed from the scene for which it was prepared. A piece of worship, no matter what [illegible] remains to have and should [illegible] and emotions."

"A morning may be profitably given to Ulm by any one desirous of breaking the journey between Strasburg and Vienna, especially if he takes interest in that great musical monster, the organ. Of course there is no end of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] however are [illegible] elsewhere, as in [illegible] Freiburg and two or three other places. The instrument has an unusual advantage of position [illegible] in the great height of the church. The supply of wind is equal to its requirements. The journals speak well of [illegible] Mlle. [illegible] at Weimar [illegible] stages of promise. This is the daughter [illegible] of the most agreeable German singers [illegible] [illegible].—M. Popular Concerts of orchestral music are [illegible] [illegible] everywhere. A series is to be opened in Brussels on the [illegible] of [illegible] directed by M. Samuel, who already announces the programme for his first entertainment. This is worth [illegible] for its originality and novelty, which includes Cherubini's Overture to Ali Baba, Herr Rheinberger's [illegible], a Symphony by Herr Jadassohn (of Leipzig), and one of Handel's Concertos.

Mignon [illegible] the last, because the [illegible] of the three operas by M. Ambroise Thomas, after having kept the stage of the Opéra Comique for a twelvemonth, is now to begin its travels in Germany at Berlin, with Mlle. Lucca for the heroine.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 9.—The first Conversazione of Mr. Mulder's came off at the New Horticultural Hall Saturday November 2 giving promise of a series of musical seasons of the highest order. The programme opened with the grand Beethoven Sonata for Piano and Violin op. 47. In the difficult violin part of which Mr. Gaertner is the finished violinist, and the high and [illegible] [illegible] artist. As Mr. Jarvis [illegible] the piano, he also displayed much excellence. The Sonata proved a great treat. The other pieces in the programme were Schubert's "Wanderer" on Horn solo, performed by Heinemann, and then [illegible] Mozart Clarinet Quintet, played by the Philadelphia "Classical Quintette Club," under direction of Mr. Gaertner. I was very pleased to hear the Club once more and the old members of years are looking forward to the rest of this series of twenty matinées with much pleasure.

The attendance was good, so that the Hall, although large for a chamber concert, was quite respectably filled. The stage was adorned with handsome bouquets of flowers, placed in the same artistic [illegible] as the Horticultural [illegible] eye, which struck me as a very pretty idea. It was [illegible] to watch amongst the audience the large number of the pupils of the Conservatory for whose cultivation the concerts are given. On the very front benches sat a party of bright faced boys, who were doubtless attending their first classical concert, and amongst them might be much more than one earnest little listener. It is an excellent thing for these children that early in the course of their musical training to be made so "home" in the works of the masters, for although they cannot of course be supposed to appreciate, they will in time, from only hearing the highest and best, acquire a taste that will prevent their caring for anything else.

The Conservatory has had an unprecedented success at Philadelphia which can only be accounted for by taking into consideration the unwearied labors in its behalf, of the gentlemen engaged in its direction, Mr. Carl Gaertner Musical Director and Mr. Jefferson E. Williams, President. To them too the thanks of the public for the eighty free scholarships, for three years' tuition offered to pupils of our public schools as well as for the advantages to be derived from the entire institution. In the paying departments of the school there are five hundred scholars of different degrees of advancement, and as all the classes come under the supervision of Mr. Gaertner as musical Director we may rest assured that the traditional [illegible] lead in the same direction.

UNITAS.

CHICAGO, Nov. 1.—To furnish the musical mass of this vicinity judiciously watered with talk, [illegible] first night [illegible] [illegible] And so I would be, were it not for the "[illegible]" part of the programme. Fortunately every body is so very out here, minding their own business that little news is manufactured. [illegible] now we are [illegible] by Max Strakosch and his troupe who give six nights and two matinées of Italian Opera. Last week they gave Il Trovatore, The Barber, Norma, Lucia, Ernani [illegible], by way of [illegible], Il Trovatore again at the matinée. Mme. La Grange appeared successively as Leonora, Norma, Lucia and Elvira. Her representations were received with enthusiastic approbation by the brilliant and overflowing audiences of the past week. Although her voice is not quite so fresh as it once was, her lyric and dramatic talents are so great as to cause the audience to quite lose sight of whatever of short coming is impossible while [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has appeared as Azucena, Adalgisa and Rosina. In the last and best of these representations her success was "immense." Her Rosina is pronounced superior to any hitherto heard in Chicago. [illegible] as Pollio in Norma. In his appropriate line we have had [illegible] with more than his previous success. [illegible] who has been ready [illegible] to his voice. MASSIMILIANI, BRIGNOLI, MARRA, COLLETTI and [illegible]. All of these have been well received. The chorus is this [illegible] light. The orchestra is fuller and better than we have usually had here in opera. Taken all in all Chicago thinks Max Strakosch is a "brick," and pats him on the back and tells him pocket several lately. To-night is Martha; Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia and Don Giovanni to follow.

In the Sunday School and clap-trap line we have had concerts by four hundred children in Farwell hall in the new building of the Young Men's Christian Association. These have been reasonably well attended. Perhaps I ought to have said "reasonably well."

J. W. Adams is drilling a chorus in connection with the Chicago Art School, and a concert is on hand. This Art school has four "strings to its bow"—which is a very proper musical arrangement—teaching Music, Painting, Sculpture, and Elocution or Light Gymnastics. The latter two come under the head of Oratory. It is suggested to add poetry, a theological chair and Heavy Gymnastics. Mr. Robert Goldbeck gave a piano-forte matinée in Crosby's Music Hall last Thursday afternoon. The programme embraced Beethoven's Sonata in D, op. 10, No. 3; Thalberg's Lucia; Liszt's "Marche of Palestrina," "Wanderer," "Hungarian Rhapsody," and "Lake Mahopac" and an "Au Andante" and "Saga of Amor" (this one). Mrs. Cossaguer, a very pleasing singer, of local celebrity, sang Goldbeck's "Invocation" and Manley's "Song of Home." Not being present I can not give a more particular account. Next week we are promised our Quintette Club.

And now by way of exhortation suffer me to word to Bostonians and other Down Easters coming west. If there is any known [illegible] more ordinary than one born "within sound of Bow-bells" it is a Bostonian on the western tour. The constant [illegible] benevolent ignorance, stupidity and general real appropriateness they manage to Boston in western people and ways, have very surprisingly to us raise a suspicion that some of these parties look through colored spectacles. The order and motto of that going, is emphatically "Nil admirari." All of which is respectfully submitted by PHILADELPHIA. CONN. Nov. 11. Again we have been visited by the three Magi from the East bearing rich offerings! Our annual Trio week (Messrs. Mason, Thomas and Bergmann) at Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School) are always so carte with us, eagerly anticipated and bearing fruit long afterwards; and as we like to spread the joyful news for the benefit of all who are like-minded. The programmes speak for themselves and for the object of our writing.

First Concert, Nov. 11.

Sonata for Piano and Violin, A major, op. 47	Beethoven.
Variations Concertantes, for Violoncello and Piano, op. 17	Mendelssohn.
Romanze, Scherzetto and Intermezzo, for Piano, op. 32	Schumann.
Air and Variations, for Violin	Bach.
Trio for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, B flat, op. 99	Schubert.

Second Concert, Nov. 11.

Sonata for Piano and Violin, E flat, No. [illegible]	Mozart.
Adagio for Violoncello	Bargiel.
Polonaise for Piano, A flat, op. 53	Chopin.
Romanze for Violin [illegible]	Bach.
Fourth Intermezzo for Piano, Tarentella	Mendelssohn.
Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, E flat, op. 70, No. 2	Beethoven.

The execution was as might be expected of such artists, &c. Thomas, Mason and Bergmann have for years belonged to "ours"; they play here as it were on Sunday, and with double zeal and as he cause for a public that meets them sympathetically. (By the way the last appearance of Thomas and Mills, before their trip to Europe, was made here with us, and so was the first since their return.)

In the way of a novelty, Jay gave us this time a Violin Sonata by F. W. Rust (1739-96) a contemporary of Friedemann Bach,—a work in a large, broad style, somewhat in the Tartini school, and as respects to form distinguished by a charmingly spacious Corps, which [illegible] interrupted by minor movements, constantly comes back again. It is a graceful, but difficult piece, for violin players, and Ferd. David has done a good service in digging up this old treasure.

Also new was a Larghetto from a Violin Sonata by F. Nardini (1722-93) a pupil of Tartini. This is a beautiful noble song which lost nothing by being transferred to the violoncello; both in melody and harmony it sounds quite modern.

The Intermezzo from the humorous "Faschingschwank aus Wien" (Vienna Carnival), op. 26, of Schumann, is one of the most beautiful piano pieces that he wrote. In its dark impassioned feeling it reminds us of the mood of the well known song "Ich grolle nicht." We commend it especially to all piano players.

As additions to the programmes, Mills played the Romanza from the first, and the Larghetto from the second Concerto of Chopin; and Thomas played Schumann's "Abendlied" as transcribed for the violin by Joachim. A.

Music in Boston.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT. Thursday Afternoon, Nov. 7. The third season of eight concerts, already guaranteed by 1,300 season subscribers, 211 more than last year, opened with such a goodly show of audience and of the best kind as makes it the duty of the Harvard Musical Association not only to persevere in the good work they have begun, but to neglect no means of strengthening and perfecting their orchestra, and making the concerts better and better in their very character which place them beyond the possibility of failure. Many think that this is already accomplished; it will not do to forget, however, that what does not go forward is pretty sure to fall behind. Surely no better encouragement could be desired than such an audience as that most artistic assembly, so informed, keen for what is best, respectful for what is noble and sincerely earnest, looked out from all those faces; they were true listeners, and the tone of the occasion seemed to pervade all. Through two long Symphonies you saw no sign of attention flagging; the smile of real pleasure did not fade away. There were some restless ones, to be sure, who left the Hall during the last minutes of the last piece; and as the Advertiser truly observed in its wholesome lecture, the total worrying had the concert been only fifteen minutes long, instead of two hours and a quarter, such persons would think it necessary to get out in the thirteenth minute. Some individuals had good excuse for going; but the majority on all occasions rise up before the time is out, merely from the selfish motive of securing a clear exit before the crowd, not caring how much they disturb others. But when there such disturbers do not destroy the fact that the mass of that great audience sat and listened with delight to the last note.—The programme was as follows.

Dedication Overture ("Weihe des Hauses"), in C, op. 124	Beethoven.
Tenor Aria, [illegible] from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"	Mozart.
George L. Osgood.
Symphony in C ("Jupiter")	Mozart.
Overture, "In the Highlands"	N. W. Gade.
Songs—a. "Faith"	Schubert.
b. "[illegible]"	Schumann.
G. L. Osgood.
"Scotch" Symphony, in A minor, op. 56	Mendelssohn.

That Overture of Beethoven had been heard only once before in Boston. Mr. Zerrahn gave it at the end of one of his concerts in March, 1860, after the Seventh Symphony, one of Liszt's "Symphonic Poems," Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, parts of a Chopin Concerto, &c. The note we then made of it was as follows:

"One is of course thankful to make acquaintance with another of Beethoven's famous overtures. That called "Die Weihe des Hauses" (the dedication of the house) is essentially an opening overture, and would have had still more effect at the beginning than at the end of a concert. It was written for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre in Vienna, and bears the opus number 124 among Beethoven's works, the Choral Symphony being op. 125 ... It did not strike us as at all comparable to the Leonore, Egmont or Coriolan overtures. The opening is solemn, festal, grandiose, but sounds very common for Beethoven. After the fugue-like theme sets in, however, the real Beethoven fire kindles, and it grows more and more interesting to the end. A key to much of its peculiarity is found in the fact that in Germany it goes often by the name of "the Overture in Handel's manner."

This time, hearing it at the beginning not only of a concert but of a noble series of concerts, and otherwise under more propitious circumstances, we think it did make a decided impression on the audience. By no means so perfect a work as those above named, it opens solemnly and grandly, in a religious tone indeed (for some of the harmonies are church-like); arousing the mind to noble thought and exciting a great expectation; which the Handelian theme, bursting out with uncontainable nervous fire, and wrought up with scholarly ingenuity quite realizes. Now and then in its unexpected modulations it reminds you for a moment of the Leonore overture, and sometimes it touches the vein of the Ninth Symphony. It only needed a very powerful body of violins, otherwise it was played with vigor and precision; and it is a theme of general purpose that one does not lose (as many of the old leaders gone) could tell so effectively. Mr. Zerrahn had rehearsed them earnestly and they had gone into it with zeal.

The two Symphonies have been too often heard and discussed here, to need any description. Both were so well played as to bring out admirably the contrast between them. The one, pure musical creation without thought of any purpose, perfect in form, concise, complete, Ecstatic in Development, exquisite in detail and coloring, full of fascination. Well could the Englishman call it the Jupiter of Symphonies. And there is something essentially classical, as it were Grecian, in its smooth rounded symmetry. The wonderfully complex Finale, with four themes worked up all at once in fugue form, never came out so clearly and enjoyably before from any of our orchestras: the individual quality of each theme, each little fragment of a theme, was felt,—although of course a greater mass of strings would have been better. The exquisite wind passages, in the earlier movements, especially the delicious dialogue of the two bassoons, so thoroughly Mozartish, must have stolen away the senses of the most obstinate anti-classicist.

The Gade overture "Im Hochland" was a congenial prelude to the Scotch Symphony;—both perfect specimens of the modern romantic, picturesque era of orchestral music. It is an exquisite strain of tone colors such such rare blending of sea romantic, fresh, wild, full of charming surprises, soothing and invigorating, as wide mountain views. Once a great solemn silence makes itself audible as it were in the hush of all but an instrument or two; again all is life and jubilation; nature's holy quiet is invaded by the ringing bugle-like strain of enterprising mountain climbers.—The Symphony, too, often as it has been heard among us, became new for us, richer, finer, grander than ever. Of course the Scherzando, with its tripping, playful theme (so delightfully played by our new clarinet), and its marked and positively mocking emphasis of a little characteristically Scotch cadence, was the thing most applauded. But the large and rich unfolding of the first movement, the great crescendo where its elements swell to a storm, and most of all the deep, calm, solemn music of the Adagio (in which we scarcely missed our leading 'cello, so well did Mr. Suck's instrument sing the cantabile), held the hearts even more deeply spell-bound.

The vocal pieces between each Overture and Symphony made the concert longer by the clock, but only shorter to the sense and feeling. They formed a graceful and delightful recreation between the more earnest efforts of attention; for a good song costs no effort to the hearer. The selections, exquisite in themselves and rare, were beautifully sung. The spirit of each, especially the Lieder in the second part, was finely caught and rendered. Mr. Osgood's voice, though thus far lacking all the weight desirable in that great hall, has yet a singularly rich telling kind of vibration and a lovely quality of tone; it is slightly nasal, there is a sort of purple frosty bloom upon it, so that it seems all the more interesting. He has evidently studied well in his two years in Germany; his method is sound, he knows how to economize his powers, and he flings himself into his song with such hearty, unaffected zeal, so full of its beauty, so forgetful of himself, that the pleasure you derive from hearing a really artistic and poetic, you are not taken physically by storm, it is not the cheap commonplace of singing that brings the house down. Voice and style of singing show unusual refinement. As for power, there is more yet to be developed, we are sure. Mr. Osgood is very young; it was his first attempt in a great hall and with orchestra; a complete tenor requires the whole man physically and mentally built up and mature.—The Aria from Der Freischütz, in which the lover waits with trembling palpitating joy for night; Il [illegible] (Mozart was a young lover himself at the time when he composed that most love-inspired opera) is perhaps the finest of all Mozart's tenor airs. Its expression is warm and true to the life; and how expressively and sympathetically the instruments in those little figures catch their breath and imitate the heart's quick beating! The accompaniments might have been played more sensitively, but the singer succeeded in carrying the song to the heart of his audience. Schubert's "Suleika," composed to one of the lovely Persian-like love poems in Goethe's West-Oestliche Divan, is about as perfect and thoroughly original a song as he ever wrote—for not a few of even Schubert's several hundred songs are commonplace. This was beautifully sung, and so was the impassioned little strain by Schumann. The singer was constrained to round off the little group by singing another of the most beautiful of Schubert's songs, called in French "La Secret;" he sang it in English. The incomparable excellence of Mr. Dresel's piano accompaniment, inspiring to a singer who has any soul in him, was of course a very important element in the success of these songs.

The Second Concert (next are this appear) will show a material gain of power in the violin and 'cello part of the Orchestra, which will be felt in Beethoven's B-flat Symphony, and in the Overtures to Medea (Cherubini) and Oberon. The programme further includes a Mozart Concerto for two pianos, played by Messrs. Lang and Parker; and a trio cantata, comfortable Bach aria, Mozart's "Voi che sapete," and songs by Franz and Dresel sung by Mrs. Carey.

In the third Concert (Dec. 5) the experiment of two Symphonies which worked so well when we had long ones, will be repeated with two short ones, namely one by Haydn, still never played in Boston, and another one of Gade's, No. 4, in B flat. As there do not any of the late powers of the modern Symphonies, the two overtures are selected with a view to varying that contrast: they will be Weber's Euryanthe and Mendelssohn's Genoveva, both very rich and brilliant, and needing to be better known though they have appeared in the programmes of the two last years. For vocal refreshment Mrs. Jenny Kempton, one of the rich contraltos, who had come back from Europe an artistic finished singer with a noble style, will sing "Non più di fiori" from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito, and one or two smaller pieces.

Mr. Lang will play a Beethoven Concerto at the 4th Concert; Camilla Urso will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto at the sixth; Hugo Leonhard, Chopin's E minor Concerto in the seventh; and the Ninth Symphony will crown the season in the eighth.

Orpheus Musical Society.—Our old German Männerchor still flourishing under Mr. Kreissmann's leadership, and only too prosperous with their great accession of "passive" members, favored their friends on Saturday evening, Nov. 21, to one of their pleasant soirées. This time it was held in the Bumstead Hall, which was full. The programme, altogether choice, was largely composed of interesting novelties.

Hymn. "Herr unser Gott, schütze unser Fulson."	Schubert.
Trio. Piano, Violin and Cello. B flat major	Schubert.
Song. Serenade.	Schubert.
Chorus. "Frühlingsnacht im Walde."	Schubert.
Chorus. Scenes from "Frithjof's Saga" Mr. Jund &	Max Bruch.
Chorus. "Lebewohl."	Silcher.
Andante and Variations from Sonata, op. 47	Beethoven.
Songs. a Marie. b Am Rhein.	Dellmann. Franz.
Chorus. Ständchen.	Mendelssohn.
Duet. From the "Marriage of Figaro."	Mozart.
Trio.	Mozart.
Chorus. Abt Solo Rezitn.	Zöllner.

The Schubert Hymn (Quartet and Chorus of male voices) was quite impressive, but owing perhaps to the unaccustomed place and the lines suffered in the rendering. The other choruses were better especially the scenes from the new composer Max Bruch's "Frithjof's Saga," in which Mr. Schraubstädter gave the frequent recitative recitative with fine tone and expression, and the matter was treated in a very strong flowing naturally, very delicate and refined in style. We hope to hear the whole work, which is written for male voices. Mr. S. also sang with his usual taste the three songs by Franz. Another charming happy composition was Silcher's "Lust of Life," a soprano solo with background of male quartet, sweetly sung by a pupil of Mr. Mendelssohn's, who also sang the Mozart duet with her teacher. Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg and A. Suck were the interpreters of the fine Schubert Trio and the "Kreutzer" Variations, and of course they were done artistically. Would that such choice feasts came oftener!

The Handel Concerts, as far as Mme. Parepa-Rosa was concerned, were mainly Ballad Concerts, addressed to a ballad public, which here as in any other city can always outvote the really musical public. She did sing "Dove sono," and "Angels ever bright and fair;" but the rest was mostly all English ballads. And cannot a great singer show her quality even in a simple ballad? Certainly; but then it seems a pity that so great an artist should not be greater employed; there is so much of the finest music always waiting for such singers!

The other elements of the five concerts—we have spoken of the first—were the Buffo songs of Signor Ferranti (who under the name of "Sacred Songs by Handel and Mozart" sang with a solemn face on Sunday evenings something in the very modern Italian taste); all the instrumental virtuosity of Rosa and Mr. Mollenhauer, a harp playing was fine, but their selections especially on Sunday backward and of he of [illegible] order. We may except the Romance in E, of Beethoven, and (had it not been heard so often) the Haydn Souvenir as played by Rosa. Dr. Meyer however some [illegible], would always work himself up into a grotesque furore, which of course pleased the groundlings. If encores are the measure of a good Concert, they were as thick as blackberries all the time. The Organ mouth and fairly, had the programmes, without the solid stay which saved the various quartet.—Here and [illegible] of all things less its audience we shall soon have Mme. Rosa in her great sphere of Oratorio.

The Handel and Haydn Society is remarkably good financial condition, judging from the steady rise in numerously numerous public performances for this and tomorrow evening. The first will consist of selections from "St. Paul" and the "Creation," besides Mendelssohn's beautiful Cantata "As the hart pants," on the Mrs. Jenny Kempton and Miss Huston being the soloists. For Sunday evening Handel's Oratorio, "Samson," with the same two ladies, Messrs. Jones and M. W. Whitney and Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen in the solos. The orchestra is that of the Symphony Concerts with its new accessions. Mr. Lang plays the Organ and Carl Zerrahn conducts.

Music in New York.—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society last Saturday evening, at the Academy of Music, appears to have been a great success. We copy from the Evening Post:

The orchestra numbered just a hundred performers, the list of whose names on the programme included a majority of the best known soloists in the city; all in due direction fell into the hands of Mr. Carl Bergmann, whose equal as a leader of large orchestras it is difficult to find anywhere. With such material, under such leadership, the inspiration of the immense audience of the solemn occasion was all that was needed to ensure a perfectly even, artistic and spirited performance, and this was exactly what was enjoyed on this occasion.

The opening selection was "Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony," whose massive grandeur wonderful harmonies, tranquil and idyllic beauties, and delicate gradations of light and shade have never been more correctly and feelingly interpreted here. A new performance of the first over than fourths of all of the labour we owe to the conscientious and unsparing of a society like the Philharmonic which conferred on its honorable public benefit by giving the grand and incomparable work in a style so admirable. Mr. Richard Hoffmann played Mozart's Concerto [illegible] in D minor, with an orchestral accompaniment. The purity of Mr. Hoffmann's style of playing was never better exemplified than the remarkable quality of his touch. In these days, when the piano has so endured so much torturing at the hands of the sensation school of performers, it is delightful to hear a player who can interpret and play with such feeling such pure music as that of the concerto referred to. The other subject of the evening was Mme. Camilla Urso, who performed Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin [illegible] in E, and all of the usual excellence of execution, and won a most enthusiastic storm of applause. In some respects she surpassed herself, and, in particular, and [illegible] more than has yet been any surmised. As a woman violinist she probably has no equal in this country. Both accurate, exquisite taste and entire control of the resources of the violin as she displays would provoke a furor of admiration were there more of that indefinable something which may be called inspiration or genius.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which translates into musical expression the spirit of Byron's weird poem, was given with [illegible], and a fine [illegible] of its wild and supernatural character. [illegible] was the "Poeme Symphonique" of Liszt, which concluded the concert. Those who like this class of music must have enjoyed the performance.

We cannot close without a word of commendation of the audience, which not only showed itself [illegible] appreciative, but was free from those pests of our public places of amusement, the people who advertise their lack of breeding by their annoying chatter. This is a nuisance which has been so [illegible] of late that we are glad to be able to speak so well of a [illegible] and bright assemblage.

Maretzek's Italian Opera re-opened last week with Gounod's new work, of which the Weekly Review says:

To judge from the demonstrations of an immense audience at the first performance of "Romeo and Juliet" last evening at the Academy of Music, was a complete success. The Romeo is to be a great success, due—as in the case of "Faust"—to [illegible]. Operas on the same subject have been written by Zingarelli, by Vaccai and others, but in each [illegible] Shakespeare has been slaughtered by Italian librettists. The present libretto [illegible] not only the novel [illegible] closely, but the [illegible], the incidents of Shakespeare's tragedy, but the great beauty of adherence to the [illegible] of each character. The music of Gounod is original in so far that it resembles no other compositions save his own. There is plenty of French sentimentality in it, and a strong [illegible] with the new German school of the future. Those who expect to find the [illegible] of "Faust" in the new opera will be somewhat disappointed; but they will be amply repaid in listening to the love duets, to the scenes and fourth acts which far surpass the [illegible] of those that [illegible] in "Faust." It is impossible to give an elaborate criticism after one hearing of this opera, but we noticed in the first act, a charming waltz song for Juliet, and a madrigal for [illegible]; [illegible] are sure to become popular. The second act contains a romance for tenor and a duo—representing a famous balcony scene—that is excellent. The third act [illegible] the [illegible]. The fourth contains another duet between Romeo and Juliet, which is the gem of the opera, and the best thing Gounod has ever written. It will appear to his admirers [illegible]. The fifth act represents the tomb scene, and [illegible] of the preceding [illegible], [illegible] the fifth act alone, would be called a musical [illegible]. The performance was as good as a first performance could be. The honors of the evening were won by Miss Hauck and Signors Formes, Antonucci, and Medini.

New York abounds in concerts. Mr Steinbach's seventh Sunday concert at Steinway Hall presented Mr Oscar Pfeiffer the piano virtuoso, Mrs Jenny Kempton, and the Heren Lieutenants [illegible], newly arrived from Germany.—Mr Theodore Thomas, besides his classical Symphony Soirees has opened [illegible] a new place for musical and other concerts, called Irving Hall.—At the first Philharmonic concert in Brooklyn (Saturday week) at the Academy of Music they had Beethoven's 8th Symphony, played by an orchestra of sixty, directed by Theo. Thomas who was there presented with a [illegible]. Mme. Rotter sang the Scene from Der Freyschütz and the Romanza from "William Tell."—Several novelties are thus reported in the Review:

The Arion Society gave a very interesting concert last Thursday night at Steinway Hall. It opened under Mr. Carl Bergmann's able direction, with Bargiel's overture to Prometheus, which ought to be heard more often. Franz Schubert's [illegible] has been a little in the old [illegible]. Miss Kapp-Young sang the romanza from Robert, in a truly artistic style. This lady appears upon better acquaintance. She has a fine voice and experience. [illegible] to be successful with the large [illegible]. The members of the society shared the honors, [illegible] with taste and [illegible] their conductor. Unusual [illegible] the first appearance of the young pianist Miss Topp [illegible] concerto [illegible]. Her [illegible] and what is still better she has fire and [illegible]. There is [illegible] individuality in her performance, which stamps her at once as a true artist. The [illegible] dexterity a [illegible] impression.

Mr. Oscar Pfeiffer made his second appearance this season last Monday, at Steinway Hall. He repeated his andante and rondo for orchestra and piano, which won him renewed sympathy and applause on the part of the audience, which seemed as well satisfied with the performance that it insisted upon an encore. Mr Pfeiffer complied by rendering a new and charming polka of his, which perhaps better than anything else reflects the vigorous style of this pianist. The polka is brilliant, dashing, and very effective. In the second part of the concert he gave his "Lavrence Rorgle" Souvenir and, in encore, his "Theatre de l'Hotterd." [illegible] powerful [illegible] deserve. For the first time in this concert we heard Mr. [illegible] "Trumpet" overture, a very elaborate work, [illegible] likely to enhance the reputation of the master. Mrs. Jenny Kempton sang several times. She has many good qualities, but her delivery is such as will, in our opinion, rather impair than enhance the beauty of her voice.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Richings Opera Troupe (English) still perform to crowded houses in the Bohemian Girl, Cinderella, Martha, and Auber's Crown Diamonds have been the principal pieces of late. Mrs. Seguin is said to sing efficiently and Messrs. Bernard, Seguin and Campbell to be very acceptable.—The features of Mr. [illegible] Orchestral Matinée last week, was Mozart's G minor Symphony. Mr. Rehrens sang Robert, and Mr. Wm. Stoll Jr. played one of Rode's violin solos.—The following programmes show of what material the public Rehearsals of the Germania Orchestra are made up:

A "Kapellmeister" of the Seventeenth Century.*

It is not very often that we meet with a Kapellmeister or conductor who is all that he ought to be; that is to say, who does not, after merely [illegible] properly [illegible] his position, and performing punctually and conscientiously what is required of him, but is equally anxious for his subordinates, a person of [illegible] small scale, who takes a greater interest in the weal or woe of his subjects than is the case. A nature of this kind is most plainly shown at a period when men are grasped by the powerful hand of harsh misfortune, when want and misery reign supreme, and all the bonds of society appear about to be burst asunder. Such a period, and such a mode [illegible], are without doubt the period of the Thirty Years' War and the Kapellmeister Heinrich Schütz. How he received his own [illegible] a Venice, how he was [illegible] by Fate with the somewhat [illegible] or rather unsatisfactorily-[illegible] task of transporting into Germany the new [illegible] first commenced in Italy of bringing about an alliance between Italian and German art, of becoming the leading supporter and [illegible] of pleasing forms of Italian free art as opposed to strict scholastic music—all this has been well clearly discussed and appreciated on other occasions. We here [illegible] to contemplate the most important [illegible] in the then musical [illegible] of Germany [illegible] employed in the capacity of Kapellmeister to [illegible] his care a [illegible] and new [illegible] all-[illegible] efforts for the members of the establishment under his charge.

The "chapel" at Dresden, where Schütz was engaged from the year 1615, may be looked upon as a model establishment for the period. As early as the commencement of the seventeenth century we find, at the Electoral Court a chapel [illegible] capital a complete chapel which, under the name of the "Cantorei" (chantry), required for its support a considerable sum for those days (about 1,500 florins). It consisted of fourteen singers and nine instrumentalists. At its head was a conductor or chapelmaster (Michael Rogier), a vice-conductor, who was, also, Court-Cantor, and a preceptor (Andreas Petermann) for the singing boys. It will be seen from the construction of the establishment that singing was greatly predominant, while instrumental music was only an unimportant department still in the first stages of its development: what the Elector demanded above all things from his chapel was church-singing, choral and solo. On this account, the members of the chapel were usually formed as the chapel [illegible], at any rate, they had there the foundations on which, beside in travelling, they might subsequently build. Chapel boys and table boys, as they were termed, used to be confided to the care of the conductor and of the oldest members of the chapel in whose families and under whose superintendence they lived; namely, the conductor and members of the chapel being responsible for the boys' education, especially in a musical sense. For this they received rations, besides an extra salary of 25 florins for private instruction in singing. Singing was the principal consideration, and it was solely an aptitude for singing which generally regulated the admission of a candidate into the chapel. If one of the boys, however, was to learn a special instrument as well, his master was paid extra. This was, however, an unusual case, for, as a rule, the chapel and table boys were the supernumeraries at the musical performances, and thus constituted the lowest degree in the musical corporation. Castratos were not then known in Germany; it was not till nearly the end of the Thirty Years' War that they first appeared on this side the Alps. When the boys' voices broke, and the boys could no longer be employed for the above purpose in the chapel, they learned some instrument, if they possessed the necessary musical talent. The most skilful among them were then generally allowed a certain sum to proceed to Italy, at that time the high school of music, in order to perfect themselves on the violin, theorbo, or [illegible], and educate themselves thoroughly, and on their return, become the leading instrumentalists of the chapel.

Every person who, in those days, seriously entertained the intention of devoting himself to art made his pilgrimage to Italy. Any one who had failed to go through his studies there was not regarded as properly qualified, or able to do any thing really good. This was not mere prejudice, for it was in Italy that Palestrina, Carissimi and others had delivered music from the fetters of Netherlandish counterpoint, which threatened to crush it completely; it was here that the above masters founded those celebrated schools for composers which continued to flourish for centuries and everyone endeavoured to draw from their sources. Like others, Heinrich Schütz received his education in Italy, having studied in the Venetian school under Giovanni Gabrieli. There being no other course open for him at the year 1609, when he was thirteen he entered as chapel boy the chapel of the Landgrave Moritz of Hesse; and though his parents had determined he should receive a learned education, and he had gone in consequence to the university of Marburg, he was gained over by the Landgrave for music eventually. This art-loving prince, well capable of appreciating the boy's great talent, offered Heinrich a yearly stipend of two hundred thalers, if he would go to Italy and study in one of the celebrated schools there. Schütz accepted the offer and in 1609 went to Venice to become a pupil of Giovanni Gabrieli. What good use he made of his time is proved by the fact that, at the expiration of three years only, he was able to send his noble patron a book of five-part madrigals "with the especial praise of the leading masters in Venice" (cum [illegible] Lodi dei [illegible] maestri [illegible] Venezia). His venerable teacher died soon afterwards, and Schütz returned, in consequence, to Germany in 1613, with the intention of studying a [illegible] several years longer, in order then to be able to come out at once with some work of importance. His parents and relations, however, would on no account hear of his making music a "profession." They urged him to re-enter the [illegible] career he had abandoned, and by so doing obtain some appointment in keeping with his merits. In a [illegible] which he afterwards wrote, and in which he recorded the events of his youth, he says of himself: "But God the Almighty, who, without a doubt, had set me aside from my mother's womb for the profession of music, ordained that, in 1614, I should be summoned hither to Dresden, to attend the approaching christening of Duke Augustus, and after the spectacle I gave, the directorship of the Elector's music was most graciously offered me in his name. My parents and relations probably perceived with me the unmistakable will of God at work, and so set a goal to my wandering thoughts."

But the reader must not imagine that the matter was arranged so speedily and simply as is recorded in the words just quoted. Musicians in those days could by no means boast of so respected and favored a social position that such an appointment should be considered as a matter of course. We know from the case of young Mozart at a much later period in Salzburg what treatment was considered at Courts proper for musicians, though Mozart's case was certainly a disheartening exception. Schütz certainly went to Dresden, in 1614, to attend the christening to which he alludes, but a thoroughly educated Hessian Court Organist had, so to speak, been so [illegible] lent by the Landgrave Moritz to his Electoral cousin. Johann Georg I., Elector since June 1611, hold, [illegible] pressing someone lest, thanked his Landgravial cousin very heartily in April, 1615, for giving him a [illegible] up to him, and added: "We entreat you to do us the favor of graciously allowing Schütz to remain here a year or so, until we get those persons whom we have sent to Italy and elsewhere for the purpose of learning this art." Being compelled to do so, the Landgrave granted Schütz two years' leave of absence, but asked for him back before the time had expired. The long and short of the matter was, however, that Schütz could not be spared from Dresden. Though the said that members of the chapel who had been sent to travel might have returned from Italy as skilful instrumentalists, Schütz towered so high above them all that such a tribute as the following was paid him: "All the music in the church and before the table is to be continued in the same style as hitherto, it is impossible to give anyone's [illegible] who is equally skilled as composer in the use of instruments, and in the arrangement of the concerts, in all which there is no one superior to the above Schütz, who has already shown, to his especial credit, before his Electoral Highness what he is capable of doing." At length the Landgrave made a friendly and obliging offer to share Schütz, who he proposed should act as chapelmaster at the Electoral Court at Dresden, but at the same time retain his old place and duties at the Margrave's Court at Cassel, so that the Margrave also might enjoy the musician's art on festive occasions. But Johann Georg was by no means a man calculated to bear up against the various events of later times, but, as regards his personal requirements, and especially his musical pleasures, he was very stubborn, and not to be dissuaded from a resolve once taken. By dint of all kinds of argument and persuasion he at length succeeded in moving the Landgrave Moritz to cede him the musician altogether.

For fifty-five years was Heinrich Schütz the Saxon Elector's chapelmaster, attending with indefatigable care to the duties of the office "as the very best German composer and most admirable chapelmaster."

There now came ten years of the most comprehensive exertions on the part of the chapelmaster, then thirty-two, but in that time he succeeded in rendering the Dresden chapel one of the most celebrated of the age. It was increased to thirty-nine members, the greater number of whom had been educated under his direction at Dresden, or at places which they had visited for their [illegible], while some had been sent for direct from Italy. After 1620 it became more and more the custom at the Courts of Germany to not [illegible] hear singing birds, and [illegible] those relation which for that time were enormous. Of course the singers augmented their pretensions in proportion, the more so when they perceived that regular jealousy and enmity were caused between different courts on their account.

The simple arrangements of the Electoral chapel at Dresden did not permit such extravagance. Despite the high position to which Schütz had raised his corps musical, as he was fond of calling his chapel, the original expenditure of 3,000 [illegible] had remained comparatively the same. The ordinary members had a salary of from 150 to 200 florins each; the vice-chapelmaster received 350 florins, and the chapelmaster 400; to which sundry additions were made in the shape of a tankard of wine, a load or two of wood, a court-coat now and then, a sum of money for special lessons, etc. In return for his services, Schütz was enabled to fulfil his long cherished and fond wish of making another journey to Italy. What, perhaps, contributed most to this result was that in the year 1627 he gave the most brilliant proof of [illegible] talent, and showed [illegible] self-education. This was neither more nor less than the composition of the opera of Daphne, the first German opera ever written. The text was translated into German, from the Italian of Rinuccini (by Martin Opitz, the head of the first Silesian school of poets, and Heinrich Schütz set it to music. The opera was produced at the festivities got up in honor of the marriage of the Saxon Princess Sophia Eleonora with the Landgrave George of Hesse. Unluckily none of the music has been preserved. It perished probably in the great Dresden fire 1760, during the Seven Years' War. The fact, however, still remains. How immense a sensation was excited by the first opera is evident from the fact that despite the unfavourable state of things at the time, all the more important cities competed with each other in appropriating this new branch of art.

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY OTTO NEUMANN.*

We remarked on a former occasion how strongly developed, and perhaps more strongly developed than any where else, sacred plays appear to have been in the heart of Germany, in Zwickau, Dresden, Meissen, Zerbst, Torgau, Leipzic and Eisenach. Should we recollect that all these towns are situated in Thuringia and Saxony, that the roots of Protestantism are to be sought more especially in these two German provinces, and that, furthermore, Mysteries were first represented there in the German language that is in the most popular manner, we shall naturally be struck by their intimate connection with the spirit out of which the Reformation grew. From this point of view the Eternal Mystery already mentioned of the Wise and Foolish Virgins, becomes peculiarly significant and prophetic. We find it represented, as early as in the 14th century by the same monastic order to which Martin Luther was destined subsequently to belong, at the foot of the Wartburg, which by the residence of the great Reformer there, was to become a noteworthy [illegible]; only a few hours' journey from Möhra, the Thuringian village where Luther first saw the light of day and at Eisenach, the town which gave birth to Sebastian Bach, the master who lent an ardent and most sublime expression to the specifically protestant spirit in church-music and consequently in oratorio.—The tendency of the same old sacred play stands out [illegible] a wonderful and pregnant connection with Protestantism and Protestant art.—Throughout the rest of the world the intercession of the Saints and of the Virgin Mary was considered in the 14th century capable of releasing from sin and guilt. The Augustine monks of Eisenach were the first who dared to preach a new belief. When the moment has arrived in this old play for the heavenly Bridegroom to approach and the foolish virgins, who have sunk to sleep in the midst of a revel to become aware too late and full of dismay that the lamps are forever extinguished they call on all the Saints to intercede for them. An avenging Angel drives them back. The cry of woe now louder than before of these sinners, who perceive the jaws of Hell already opening finds its way to Mary, the mother of God. She experiences a feeling of indescribable pity, and begs for pardon for the returning creatures of her divine Son who now appears. But none of [illegible] an advocate [illegible] for intercession, find an ear on hearing the simple words of the Saviour, who says He has to fulfil His Father's will. Mary proceeds to utter reproaches that the Lord will not listen even to her, who has suffered so much for Him. Hereupon Christ disappears, and the Angel, addressing the Queen of Heaven, pronounces imperiously the word, "Silence!"

Who will deny that, in this disappearance of the Saints and even of the blessed Virgin before the form of the Saviour coming forward so sublimely and grandly, and centering all importance in Himself, the spirit of the Reformation, the the first blush of morning, is already announced. We must be the more forcibly impressed of this by the fact that it was previously to, by the performance of this old play, represent so all power of resistance in an ecclesiastical as well as [illegible] of the tremendous influence it exerted upon those living at the time. It is likewise affirmed the Landgrave of Frederic the Bitten Cheek [illegible] in consequence of the performance of this mystery. The same appeal to the intercession of the Saints and of the Virgin Mary, at variance with the popular belief, brought so strongly upon the Margrave whose conscience probably smote him, perceived a heavy burden for him who he thought of his father that interrupting the actors, he called out: By what means are grace and forgiveness of sins to be obtained if the intercession of the holy Virgin is of no avail?" A fit of apoplexy caused by [illegible] he had [illegible] him, threw him on a bed of sickness, which he never left to his dying day the [illegible] November 1321.

It was but natural that with such a tendency of the sacred plays in central Germany, church-music, and oratorio particularly, when the Reformation took on body, should be developed in a closer connection with the Mysteries, than was the case in the Netherlands. In course of time the old Thuringian plan Christ, and redemption through His death to the exclusion of all intercession and hence, above anything else, the history of the Passion, became the central point of representation and of the increased depth of musical expression. It is, therefore, natural that we should find as early as the time of Luther and caused partly by the powerful impulse emanating from him, examples of Passion music in Germany. The first of these compositions, which bore the name of "Passions," we meet with in the works of the German masters, Johannes Galliculus, born at Leipzic, in 1520, and Heinrich Isaak, born probably in the Fulda district, about 1480. We find them further in the works of Isaak's pupil Ludwig Senfl of Basle, whom Luther so admired; a composer who was born in 1490 and died in 1560 as well as in those of Luther's companion in faith, Johannes Walther who was born at Torgau in 1490, and died in 1564. All the Passions of these masters, as likewise those of their contemporaries, Cellarius, Keil and Lembke have [illegible] texts. We find, too, in these settings, as we do, also, in Hobrecht and Borobon in the Netherlands, an almost invariably four-part and, therefore, more lyrical treatment of their subject which even now properly demanded a more musical specimens of construction. It is the "Moralities" as coined out of the Mysteria and the whole works immediately springing from the Mysteries, and, to a certain degree, presented to us merely as a translation of the latter into the spirit of the period that had just dawned, which first bear a really epic-dramatic stamp. Interesting is the ballad in The new, highly excellent and thoroughly Christian Comedy of the State of Things in Heaven and Hell by Andreas Hartmann, Theologian and Magister of Wittenberg which was performed at Torgau in 1599. We are distinctly informed that, after the Prologue a "common Mass in playing of the Town-pipers" opened the piece. As the personages are introduced as choruses, it is very probable that the spoken dialogue was interrupted by choral songs.* Belonging to the same category are, also the sacred comedy of Esther (1604), and that of Joseph (1112): both due to the Theologian Andreas Coste who was rewarded for them by the firing of Barthe.

While the above efforts were being made in the way of a popular representation of sacred or biblical subjects, A. von Bruck, or Burgh, born in Magdeburg at the commencement of the 16th century, had the honor of actually venturing to write Passions in the German tongue. The first of these appeared in 1568, and the second in 1577. He was followed by Lechner with a German Passion published in 1594, and we are thus gradually conducted to the great master, Heinrich Schütz, named, in accordance with the fashion of his time, Sagittarius, who was born in 1585, [illegible] and who died at Dresden in 1672. It is in his Passions that we first see [illegible] the oratorio-form, which have on the whole retained their ground in certain form to the present day. Schütz, too—like the Eternal Mystery already mentioned, like Luther himself and all that was closely connected with him, and, like the first [illegible] of Latin and German passions in our art as hitherto—was [illegible] in Saxony. For more than half a century he was Capellmeister at Dresden of the Saxon Elector. If we remember in connection with this fact that the greatest number of the most important Moralities and Sacred Comedies produced during the period of the Reformation belonged to Saxony, Thuringia and the parts immediately adjacent we shall even more feel convinced that the formal Protestantism was likewise the centre of Protestant musical art, and it was on these scenes, these regions, that as a half Protestant art-product, derived from them received the most powerful movement to further development.

But other influences besides Protestant influences, had worked upon a master like Schütz, before he was capable of producing the model and production so full of thoroughly [illegible] and [illegible] as has the Seven Words of the Redeemer, his Passions. It was for this reason that we said Oratorio was only half the child of the Reformation.

To show that other factors co-operated in its creation we must once more go back a step.

During the last few weeks the museum of Mr. Elliott, the Lambeth police magistrate has been tasked in the attempt to unravel the particulars of a singular [illegible] of property from various stalls in the Crystal Palace. For some time past it was evident to this splendid [illegible] [illegible] had missed a number of articles, and the officials of the Palace Company had removed [illegible] and information at the Lambeth office the fact had [illegible] the [illegible] became very numerous and when in every case of suspicion a stringent delinquent would be [illegible] with parts face on the [illegible] of the irresistible adventurer. On the afternoon of Monday the 5th inst., the young persons at the stalls of the opticians, perfumers, cutlers, and other depots for the sale of articles of virtù and fancy were put into a state of suspense on the [illegible] [illegible] who were sent to open their properties and suspicion fell upon some boys who were lottering about a watch was at once set up. Greenwood, it appeared, was a choir-boy of some more noted [illegible] Christ Church Hill, and also [illegible] some sort of [illegible] to one of the [illegible] church. Both he and Hyge were of [illegible] school attached to the church, and on their appearance before the magistrate they were charged with stealing an opera-glass, a microscope, a telescope, a glass bottle of perfume, I [illegible], a silver pencil case, a comb, a brush and other similar articles, the property of the stall-holders in the Crystal Palace. After the evidence had been taken, the solicitor for these young choristers directed the magistrate's attention to this "most exceptional case." The younger boy had evidently acted under the direction of Greenwood the elder, and Greenwood, quite old enough to know right from wrong, was yet by bodily affliction incapacitated from taking advantage of this knowledge. It appeared that when Greenwood saw any thing that it would please him to possess, he immediately suffered from a palpitation of the heart. His pulse became quick and jerking, and it would soon then

Mr. Dickens's First Reading in America.

(From the Daily Advertiser, Dec. 3.)

Those who arrived early in Tremont Temple last evening and having an ambition to gaze at, had plenty of time to speculate and ponder upon the somewhat peculiar nature of the furniture for Mr. Dickens's reading, and so it is, perhaps, not remarkable that the fancy should have called some of those that the curiously shaped crimson reading desk, with its mechanical arrangement of water an spit and glass, and, with the background of crimson behind it, was the table of a conjuror, who would presently change the colorless fluid into [illegible] and grey color for me [illegible] of the audience. And these imaginative people were after all not so far wrong. Mr. Dickens proved himself a magician though one of [illegible] kind. At his bidding of his characters rose up one after another, not in dry sequence, but in lively magnetic fashion by the arm of his magical wand [illegible] with every whim pomp [illegible] to play [illegible] feelings here at pleasure and [illegible] to laugh and a tear [illegible] the same breath and to burst out in every innocent [illegible] signs of exhilaration and delight with [illegible] of what Mr. Turveydrop calls "Deportment."

Mr. Dickens began by reading "A Christmas Carol" very nearly but [illegible] in full as it first published. Everybody knows how Scrooge was visited on Christmas Eve by the ghost of his old partner Jacob Marley and by the three spirits of Christmas Past, Present and To-come and how he [illegible] was affected by the visions which these [illegible] came on [illegible] him. Everybody knows how Scrooge was shown the jolly party which old Fezziwig gave his apprentices and the merry [illegible] of the [illegible] with the [illegible] in the little home of poor Bob Cratchit. The story well [illegible] Mr. Dickens's strongest points. [illegible] human [illegible] his power all over its character and shows that his greatest [illegible] expression. Its tone is pure and healthy and hearty and genial from first to last [illegible] could be so fat or Christmas story [illegible] under the Mr. Dickens himself [illegible] I [illegible] as [illegible] Mr. Dickens [illegible] the [illegible] of the supernatural Scrooge [illegible] Harley was the [illegible] his own [illegible] and has also grown [illegible] whether his [illegible] take a [illegible]. The warmth of Mr. Dickens's [illegible] very pleasantly with his spirits [illegible] than [illegible] may be allowed to [illegible] generally applied to [illegible] another [illegible] this case [illegible] on the [illegible].

Promptly at [illegible] Mr. Dickens appeared and came briskly upon the platform. He simply said: "Ladies and gentlemen,—I shall have the very great honor and pleasure of reading [illegible] to you this evening A Christmas Carol in four staves," and then, [illegible] his back upon the [illegible] of [illegible] which rose from one side of his desk, he began to read quite rapidly. As he spoke the curious people [illegible] that Mr. [illegible] he has a [illegible] than from the engraving [illegible] and that [illegible] might have been accidental. When he began, the peculiarity of a [illegible] was apt to [illegible] of his [illegible] he [illegible] quickly [illegible] and [illegible] could not be heard [illegible] Mr. Dickens's reading [illegible] He takes no thought of the [illegible] his left hand and gives up his whole [illegible] of the characters, which he [illegible] books and even gestures. Thus, nobody could mistake old Scrooge with his hard, rough [illegible] and pursed mouth [illegible] Scrooge's nephew [illegible] merry [illegible] careless face, and when Mr. Tupman [illegible] the platform [illegible] and [illegible] voice of the poor clerk Bob Cratchit the illusion was so perfect that the whole audience burst into a round of applause. We have said that Mr. Dickens's reading was dramatic. So it is, but it is never theatrical [illegible] convey our meaning. Only once did he at all approach [illegible] of [illegible] — where Bob Cratchit, after the death of Tiny Tim [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] resignation,—and here we think the audience observed the fault. Mr. Dickens does not act, for he is a [illegible] as [illegible] He is [illegible] account the character who is speaking—and more than once these characters did not speak in a word the language set down for them. Mr. Dickens plainly sympathizes with the emotions which he excites in the audience, and his face over and over beams with fun, as he takes breath between the passages of some comical dialogue.

Mr. Dickens read, in conclusion, the trial scene from Pickwick, and we should like to tell how well he pictured to the audience the sleepy Justice Stareleigh, the profound and eloquent Sergeant Buzfuz, the blandly [illegible] Winkle, the imperturbable Sam, and the distant bow [illegible] of old Mr. Weller in the gallery. We should [illegible] such a description. It was pleasant, though [illegible] Sergeant Buzfuz said "Call Samuel Weller," [illegible] began to [illegible] against very loudly [illegible] this faithful [illegible] in the [illegible] on the witness stand, at the desk [illegible] disappointment [illegible] the voice of the [illegible] Mr. Pickwick was [illegible] of course [illegible].

In any case to those of our readers who had not the good fortune to be present last night, that what we have said is only a [illegible] panegyric. But we [illegible] the word [illegible] every one's mouth at the close [illegible] that Mr. Dickens is no less wonderful as a reader than as a writer.

We have not thought it necessary to say anything about the [illegible] beauty and [illegible] of the audience or [illegible] the cordial welcome which Mr. Dickens received. Everybody [illegible] for granted. It was pleasant to see that people were [illegible] in their seats [illegible] as for asking to the [illegible] of those [illegible] before Mr. Dickens reads his concluding lines.

LEIPZIG.—The third Gewandhaus Concert [illegible] into the last century for much of its programme. The Neue Zeitschrift says: "It opened with the overture to "Semiramide" by Catel (1763–1830), which, modelled upon Gluck, is [illegible] dramatic and contains many [illegible] and genial moments. Then followed an Aria from "Lucio Vero" by Gluck, sung by Frl. Thoma Hiu [illegible] from Hamburg, a pupil of Stockhausen. The work itself is [illegible] a [illegible] but [illegible] deeper dramatic character in several passages. The singer has [illegible] voice, but [illegible] traces of good [illegible] and fine schooling, and was called out after her second piece, the "Letter aria" in Don Juan. A great deal of activity has reigned in musical matters lately. There has been the fourth Gewandhaus Concert. Contents: Ein feste Burg [illegible] Raff; Pianoforte Concerto, Schumann (Mlle. Mehlig [illegible] for the orchestra from the ballet of Prometheus, Beethoven; Violin Concerto (Herr [illegible]); Pianoforte Solos, Mendelssohn and Chopin (Mlle. Mehlig); and Symphony in C, [illegible] concluding fugue, Mozart. Next came a special performance in St. Thomas' Church to celebrate the third centenary of the Reformation—contents, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, Bach; the 45th Psalm, Mendelssohn, and choruses, [illegible] from The Messiah, Handel. The solos were entrusted to Mlles. Schiller, Moritz, Herren Rebling and Hertsch. This performance was succeeded by the seventh "Euterpe" concert. Overture to Schiller's Fiesko [illegible]; [illegible] soprano [illegible] orchestra (Mlle. Spohr); Solos for the harp (Mlle. Heer); the Third Psalm, Liszt (Mlle. Spohr); and Symphony in D major, Lassen.

MUNICH.—The so-called "Paris pitch" diapason normal, was tried for the first time in Marschner's Hans Heiling and generally considered an improvement on the old pitch.—Herr R. Wagner has completed the composition of Die Meister-singer von Nürnberg. The work will be put in rehearsal in the beginning of December, and the first performance take place in February. Herr Beck, of Vienna, has been [illegible] for the part of Hans Sachs. Meanwhile the Members of the Parent-[illegible] has gone to Paris [illegible] the friend, the Abbé Liszt, has returned to Rome.—On All Saints' Day, the members of the Royal Orchestra, under the direction of their conductor, Herr P. Wüllner, gave a concert, at which they performed Missa à 5 voci, Johann Renard (1600); "Offertorium à 5 voci," [illegible]; and "Credo à 4 voci," Vittoria.

DRESDEN.—Herr J. Von Wasielewski will give this season, a series of six Soirées for Chamber Music. The first took place on the 17th October, when the pieces played were: Trio, Op. 1, No. 1 (E flat major), Beethoven; Stringed Quartet (D major), Haydn; and Pianoforte Quartet, Op. [illegible], Herzogenberg; Mendelssohn.

COLOGNE.—Ferdinand Hiller, who is one of the most gifted of writers about music, as well as one of the best of [illegible] composers, has collected and published in [illegible] letters which have appeared during the last fifteen years in the Kölnische Zeitung, many of which have been translated in our columns. The title of the book is "Aus dem Tonleben unserer Zeit, Gelegentliches" (Out of the Tone Life of our Time, Occasional), by F. HILLER (complete in 1 vol.) Leipzig: Mendelssohn, publisher.

A correspondent of the Athenæum writes:—Cologne is [illegible] of the centres of German musical activity. This prosperous, thriving city, [illegible] intelligent, [illegible] somewhat [illegible] now [illegible] and individual [illegible] the [illegible] world of "good society" [illegible] be found in the small Court towns of Germany [illegible] doing good [illegible] for Art. Not [illegible] of the [illegible] progress made towards completing the Cathedral which they say here, is to be [illegible] hundred years [illegible] of the [illegible] enterprise [illegible] to [illegible] a place and a power of its own in the world of Imagination to which this [illegible] body refers. I recently listened to the capital programme of the first winter Gürzenich concert. At the second, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" [illegible] on the third, which will be on the anniversary of Schubert's death [illegible] his [illegible] Mass which has already been given there. [illegible] to add that all this music is safe in the [illegible] of an excellent and so powerful a conductor as Herr Ferdinand Hiller. There has [illegible] been a crop of great instrumental players proceeding from the music schools of Germany. But the Cologne [illegible] school may now send out some good singers and good professors who understand the real method. [illegible] the more [illegible] I heard [illegible] example of this in a young lady fresh from her schooling, Fräulein Schmeisser, who sang [illegible] well [illegible] I followed with [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] St. Helena, with a pure pleasing [illegible] voice [illegible] ordinary [illegible] the German [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] who [illegible] The opera was not well given [illegible] hard [illegible] for years, and [illegible] Fidelio [illegible] up to the mark [illegible] surprised as [illegible] pleasure, by the brilliant [illegible] the music.

VIENNA.—Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris which had not been heard here for 31 years (though frequently of late in Berlin and Dresden) has been successfully revived. The principal rôles were rendered by Mmes. Dustmann and Bettelheim and Messrs. Walter, Beck and Draxler. The German [illegible] orchestra are declared to have been perfect; and Herr Herbeck [illegible] won new esteem with the public by the [illegible] care he gave to the representation as a whole. There was some thought of opening the new theatre with Iphigenia, but Gluck's Armida is the piece now proposed.—Mozart's posthumous opera, "The Goose of Cairo," first brought to light so recently at the Fantaisies-Parisiennes is announced at the Carl Theatre.

BERLIN. The famous Liebig Orchestra has undergone a revolution. After so many years of Symphony, the members of the band complaining that their leader and founder was too arbitrary and [illegible] a [illegible] have deposed him and taken to themselves new director in the person of Prof. Stern. Liebig has gathered around him a new orchestra and will still give concerts.—Joachim has given second concerts with Mme. Bürde-Ney and Liebig's late orchestra. The programme of the second (Oct. 3) included Bach's Actus tragicus Cantata, Violin Concertos by Beethoven and Joachim (the latter a new one, in G major) and Arias from Idomeneo and Ové fon tata. —On the 4th occurred the third Quartet Evening of Hellmich, and the second Monday concert of H. sner with the chamber singer Mme. Harriers-Wippern, and the violinist Grützmacher from Dresden; on the 7th, the first Quartet Evening of De Ahna.—On the 8th, the first Riedel Verein Concert; Lotti's Crucifixus for eight parts, Hagensachen by Palestrina, for double choir, the 100th Psalm by Bach, Pater Noster by Meyerbeer, &c.—On the 9th, Mendelssohn's Paulus was performed, in memory of the composer, by the Stern'sche Verein.

New Ball, second Philharmonic Concert of B. Bilse, with the lady violinist, Fel Braun. Symphony in B flat by Volkmann, fragment of B-minor Symphony by Schubert, Violin Concerto by Viotti, &c.—On the 7th the first Soirée of the "Symphonie-Capelle" (formerly Liebig's) under Stern's direction, with the brother and sister Friese. Overture to Iphigenie (Wagner's arrangement) prize Symphony by Witte, &c.—11th, fourth Quartet Evening of Hellmich.—19th, third Philharmonic Concert of B. Bilse, with Clara Schumann. Orchestral Suite by Handel. Schumann's A-minor Concerto; Gade's "Message of the Spring," "Song of the Woods," for chorus, by H. Schulz, &c.—On the ... the Singakademie were to perform the Cantata "Gottes Zeit" by Bach and Cherubini's Requiem.

At the Royal Opera, Gounod's Faust, first performed here on the 5th of June, 1863, was given lately for the hundredth time. A number of new operas, not so likely to achieve their first hundred as Faust, are in preparation; for instance, "The Fisher," by Langert; "Mignon," by A. Thomas; "Romeo and Juliet," by Gounod. As to the home-made opera by Witte, "Der Stern von Turan," is to be newly studied with Lucca and Niemann in the chief parts.

Paris.

Schumann's sons from Paris. On the first Sunday of November M. Pasdeloup resumed his Concerts populaires, which have now become (says Le Ménestrel) a real want for true musicians, more and more numerous from day to day. Since the Conservatoire can only open its doors to a small number of the elect, those not so favored take refuge in the vast Cirque Napoléon, eagerly grouping themselves in the great circles round the excellent orchestra of Pasdeloup. Of course he found all his faithful habitués at their posts with ear and mind attentive. Of the well varied programme the piece expected with most curiosity was certainly the Rienzi overture, by Wagner—its first hearing in Paris. There is no disputing its uncommon power, but it is a brutal power, more apt to overwhelm the hearer than to subjugate him. Still it is in the first rank of the works ever which at our age ... "Then came the C-minor Symphony of Beethoven—a perfect chef-d'œuvre that, one of the seven wonders of music!—then the Hymn of Haydn for stringed instruments, encored by acclamation; and finally some fragments of Meyerbeer's Struensee, a tragedy of scarlet and vigorous colors. The séance ended with the merry overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, which made but a small figure by the side of the great works that preceded it."

The programme for the second concert was as follows: Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Air from Beethoven's music to the Ballet of Prometheus; Symphony in E-flat by Haydn (first time); Adagio from Mozart's G-minor Quintet, executed by all the strings of the orchestra; Hungarian March, Berlioz.

Third Concert: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Andante and Variations from the Imperial Symphony, Haydn; Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, by Schumann; Adagio from Beethoven's Septet executed by MM. Grisez clarinet, Espaignet, bassoon, Brunel, horn, and all the strings; Overture to Freyschütz.

Opera. At the Grand Opera they have been playing Don Giovanni, a young tenor from the Conservatoire, M. Colin, making his début therein. Voice fresh and sympathetic, not robust. Mme. Marie Sass was Donna Anna; Mlle. Mauduit, Elvira; Mlle. Battu, Zerlina; M. Obin, Leporello; and M. Faure, the Don.—Rossini's Comte Ory has been alternating with "La Fiancée de Corinthe," of which last named novelty a correspondent of the Evening Post writes:

In the Moniteur of this morning Théophile Gautier gives a feuilleton about the theatres. It so happens he has a charming subject for his delicate and artistic pen in "The Bride of Corinth," now played at the Théâtre Impérial de l'Opéra.

Yes, perhaps, remember Goethe's Bride of Corinth, and and fascinating vision of the distress of a new religion and an old love, evoked by the genius of the poet? Has modern literature any note so vibrating with antique beauty, so does it ever touch the imagination more sweetly than in that strain of a Pagan virgin love? Well, it has been dramatized and successfully set to music according to Théophile Gautier. "For myself," he says, "I know only that it has served as a motive of several beautiful paragraphs, in from the pen which Goethe himself might welcome as supreme rendering of his subject."

It would be well if our own dramatic critics would profit by the example of the French littérateurs, and accept their function as a literary means capable of being the source of great pleasure to their readers. If the literary side of the contemporary Paris modern anything, ... Jules Janin and Théophile Gautier certainly two of the most brilliant and artistic of French writers find in the theatres of Paris the occasion of some of the most delightful writing—occasions for a natural expression of a most vivid sense of literary beauty—the beauty of fitting words to a vivid and natural sentiment—in truth displaying all the charm of the novelist, of a cultivated and artistic mind.

Théophile Gautier writes that the charming poem is written in true verse and "embroidered" with fresh and delicate music—five pearls for the pit—by Duprato and, casting a few sous written by Leslie, he comments thus: "This verse, of a marvellous beauty and a sonorous profound ... which ... like a frame to the more perfect with its fine design (disagreeable to the modern men) of ... I have no doubt that you will more from the opportunity to judge for yourself how you like Goethe's Bride of Corinth transposed into an opera of comic words by Leslie and music by Duprato.

London.

The eighth of the Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace brought forth a programme which contained little or only but the remainder of which left nothing to be desired. The selection was as follows:

Overture "Euryanthe,"	Weber.
Aria, "Confutatis," "Il Mio Tesoro,"	Mozart.
Grand Scena, "Thou is Nobly," (from Der Freischütz)	[illegible]
Paraphrase	Liszt.
Symphony in B flat No. 4	Beethoven.
Songs, "... Gruss,"	Mendelssohn.
" "Fruh Springs"	Schubert.
New Ballad, "Little Bird, so sweetly singing,"	[illegible]
Concerto for Violin in B minor ...	[illegible]
Fugue ...	J. S. Bach.
Overture, "Prometheus,"	Beethoven.
Conductor	Mr. Manns.

The novelty of the concert was an overture by a composer unknown here, Herr Bargiel of Rotterdam, whose work, entitled "To Prometheus," was heard for the first time in England. In the words of Mr. Manns, "This young composer and his works are scarcely yet known even by name in England, and it will not be out of place to say that he was formerly Professor of the Conservatoire at Cologne, and has now for the last two or three 'Städtischer Musik-Director' at Rotterdam, and that musical Germany classes him amongst the most worthy of its young composers, as his works have found their way into the programmes of the celebrated concerts of Leipzic, Vienna, &c." We doubt whether the "as ... will now include London to any great extent. The present work ... dense and ponderous per- haps it was heard under disadvantages. We have honorably to record the début of Herr Reichardt, a gentleman, who however much he be interested in the advertisement of his own songs, does not intrude them on serious occasions. His choice of vocal pieces at the concert was a.. his.. and as he was in good voice, no ... fault can be made of the good things said of him. Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mlle. Liebhart, also in her selection of G. B. Allen's ornithological style, aided by the ... Bornholms I was ... no ... popular judgment ... a ... genuine art.

If longevity affords any claim the Monday Popular Concerts have certainly a right to their name. On Monday the tenth season was opened in presence of a crowded audience, before whom the following programme was laid:

Serenade Trio, in D major, Op. 8, for Violin, Viola, and Violoncello	Beethoven.
Song, "Hannah's Henry song"	Mendelssohn.
Songs, "To Chloe," "May Dew"	J. Bennett.
Sonata-Gesang in D major, Op. 53, for Pianoforte alone	Schubert.
Sonata in F major, Op. 15, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Violin	Beethoven.
Song, "Sur dell, per lunch"	Pinsuti.
Quartet in D minor, Op. 76, No. 2, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello	Haydn.
Conductor	Mr. Benedict.

The masterful beauties of Beethoven's Serenade—one of the three dedicated to Salieri—constituted the novelty of the evening. From its languid Andante con Moto at the end the ensemble was irreproachable—a treat of the fullest magnitude. So with the Serenade Trio, now well known to frequenters of the Monday Popular. The Polonaise in this work was redemanded, and indeed the whole of this composition met with considerable applause. A good deal of interest was excited in Mme. Goddard's artistic interpretation of the so-called Fantasia Sonata by Schubert, a second performance, and one fraught with very pleasurable recollections. The quartet of artists were fully up to their work. Miss Cecilia Westbrook sang charmingly, and Mr. Cummings was himself once. In every respect the first concert of the season sustained the old prestige.

The Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society gave a performance at the St. George's Hall, on Monday night, of Mendelssohn's Elijah.—Orchestra.

Memorial Services in Honor of John Albion Andrew

Our Boston Music Hall never was the scene of a more impressive, sincere, beautifully inspired tribute, and never held a multitude more deeply moved than on the occasion of the Eulogy upon the great-hearted Governor,—personal friend of all the people, far-seeing statesman, genial, loving, wise, true, noble man—pronounced before the City Government and hosts of citizens on Tuesday morning, Nov 26. All the arrangements were in perfect keeping: to ear and eye, to sense and mind and heart all spoke significantly, with poetic and religious exaltation, of the one theme, of the great grief and the great faith springing out of it. Music, poetry, eloquence, sculpture, floral emblems, prayer, lent their aid to one uplifting, wholesome influence: all so fitly present, so suggestive of that life, which snatched away bodily, has passed into these forms to visit us henceforth more intimately. The good never die, even to this world.

We cannot speak too highly of the taste and feeling shown in the decoration of the platform by the ladies of the Church of the Disciples (of which Governor Andrew was a member) under the direction of Miss Lucy Goddard. The prevailing color (so much better than the conventional black and white hung around the body of the hall) was a clear glowing violet or royal purple. Against such background the white marble busts, the floral and flowers and green leaves, stood out transfigured, as against heaven's own warm, rich purple, inspiring light:—how infinitely more sacred than merely negative funereal black! On the edge of the platform, in the centre, was placed Gould's bust of Gov. Andrew, in which the sweet filial sunny side of his nature is beautifully caught. This was the centre of a group of busts, showing how many-sided were his sympathies, how largely related to the best. On his right was first a bust of the martyr President by Miss Ames, and then Samuel Col. Shaw, the first effort of the young colored artist, Miss Edmonia Lewis, for whose race he was a hero and a martyr. These were balanced on the left by Brackett's head of old John Brown, and that of Everett by Powers. We should have been glad to see the head of Quincy Shaw, but another would have disturbed the balance. Beneath these busts, upon a broad background of purple cloth that covered the whole front of the platform, floral emblems were arranged, appropriate to each. Under Andrew was a wreath of crysanthemums within a circlet of evergreen, meant ("Se Thonateryt mya") "to typify the many life of the ... heart." Directly back of the bust, entwining the Beethoven statue in its recess (also a fit presence there), a pointed arch of the same lustrous purple, overrun with delicate tracery of green vines, was erected as a star "symbolizing the high position he had held in the State and Nation." Under Lincoln was a floral cross to represent Faith, while a Maltese cross under the bust of Colonel Shaw indicated the sacrifice of his life in his country's cause." The anchor of Hope lay under the sanguine patriarchal John Brown, and a close wreath beneath Edward Everett. Between these symbols there were wreaths of evergreens and immortelles and flowers, together with clusters of fern leaves exquisitely arranged in snow white conch shells, "in their bright colors indicating that Gov. Andrew died in the early autumn," and, why not add, telling the sympathy of all beautiful things in Nature with a life so sweet.

The body of the hall, as we have said, was more conventionally decorated. Yet there was so much to relieve the black and white with which the balconies were hung. It was not all funereal, for this was not a funeral, but a commemoration; not the death but the life of a true man was what we had met to contemplate. "At the front of the second balcony, in a very conspicuous position, an arch had been raised bearing the name of John A. Andrew, underneath which was a shield with the word Union upon it. The inscription at the right of the arch contained the statement that ex-Governor Andrew was born March 31, 1818; that on the left announced his death, Oct. 30, 1867. The seals of the city were displayed at proper intervals in front of the two balconies, which were fittingly draped with black and at each fold looped by becoming rosettes (of royal purple)—the national ensign, arranged in tasteful folds, forming a beautiful addition."

We record all this with the more interest because the action of the City Committee in the matter gave equal evidence of the growing respect for Music in the community—Music in the highest sense, as an expressive Art, fit to figure, not as unheeded intermission and relief but as an equal element, a natural complement with Speech and Poetry in bringing out the meaning of so solemn and significant an occasion. There was no blare of brass bands in the streets, and no procession to create delay. All were quietly seated before eleven o'clock, the time fixed for the beginning. The old conventional way of covering the stage with dignitaries and distinguished guests had been sensibly dispensed with, and the whole space (with the exception of Mayor Norcross, who presided, with Alderman Clark, Chairman of the Committee, Weston Lewis, President of the Common Council, the Orator and Clergymen of the day), was given up to the Orchestra (of the Symphony Concerts), under Carl Zerrahn, and a chorus of about a hundred mixed voices, mostly from the Handel and Haydn Society, but strengthened by the hearty participation of some of our best solo singers. When the City consented to employ an Orchestra, instead of a mere band, it became a certainty that music would speak out of the very soul of the occasion and help to blend together all the other elements, heighten up the peculiar eloquence of each. And indeed, while the Eulogy was the main point of interest, the Music rounded the whole programme into unity and consistency.

Precisely at eleven the ceremonies began with a sad, pensive, tender piece upon the organ played by Mr. J. K. Paine. It was the concluding chorus of Bach's Passion Music ("We sit us down in tears and call to thee in the grave. Softly rest"). After an impressive prayer by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony was played by the orchestra, and never before did we so truly feel the power of that wondrous composition as the grandest expression of a people's grief, breath of a ... here, that can be found in music or in any other language. The whole audience felt the music and listened to the last note.

Then was read this little poem, a more's tribute, sadly true and simple, written by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe:

I stood before his silent grave,
And heard a record long and low,
How he was merciful and brave,
How his swift help sped to and fro.

Great deeds of heart were told of him,
And musings at speed at the day,
Whose burden's freedom thought and truth
The energies of light display.

The honors of the State were his,
The better crownings of common men,
Faith yielded him her mysteries,
And Charity was not a dream;

And Hope her seed-time somehow threw
To match God's promise in the corn;
When 'blows rained and trumpets blew
He left us that consoling form.

No more was in his singing speech
For real rank his every smile;
No passion hidden out of reach,
Dragged his pure manhood with its guile.

A champion he in above all need,
A prophet armed with forethought wise,
He flung our banner as the lead,
He gave our watchword to the skies.

Poetry our ... efforts try
To set his image in its place,
We lift the Poet's laurel high
To lay it on the Patriot's tomb,
And deeply I said when fall to musk,
His lowest song was asked of me:

"The world has few to match his worth,
And none to praise it perfectly!"

This elegiac strain was fitly followed by the Chorus, full of comfort and of peace, from Mendelssohn's St. Paul: "Happy and blest are they who have endured! For though the body dies, the soul shall live forever." It was beautifully sung with orchestral accompaniment; though the greater breadth and fulness of thrice the number of voices was desirable. The stage would accommodate no more.

Then appeared a truly listening stage for the Eulogy by Edwin P. Whipple, which all who heard and/or have read it since felt to be as nearly perfect as anything of the kind in their remembrance. It was for the most part more biographic. It described the elements of that rare character, and out of them built it up before us in all its fulness, nobleness and beauty. It was in the fullest sense a eulogy; such praise it is rarely possible to bestow on man, yet every hearer knew that it was all true! A genial, encouraging, inspiring character. One feels immortal in the contemplation of such a life. The eulogy was all the more impressive that it was calmly analytic, though at the same time it was heartfelt and very earnest. There had been an end of talking out of the full heart; this was the one we had been waiting for; the noble very image of the man before us. It was for music to continue the strain, so eloquently begun, of Governor Andrew's life and character. And none so great for that as Beethoven, and no music could so fitly follow up the eulogy, as that heavenly Andante of the Fifth Symphony, so reassuring and uplifting, as if with heavenly authority with angel voices, enforcing the lesson of a great life, exhorting all to press forward to the prize of the high calling! Heavenly assurance is the key note of that Andante. And it was played as if all the musicians felt its meaning and how apposite it was; and we are sure it was never listened to with deeper realization of its power and beauty than just then.

Then the voices, supported by the full tones of the Organ, sang the Choral: "Was Gott thut das ist wohlgethan," as harmonized by Sebastian Bach, to these words:

What God does, surely is well done;
On Him be our reliance!
O, may we still with Him be one,
And bid the world defiance!
No foe can harm,
No fear alarm,
For God is always near us,—
Call Him and He will hear us.

What God appoints is surely right,
His will I would not alter;
If o'er rough ways in darkest night,
He lead, I will not fear,
He reigns above,
And He is love!
His eyes do still behold me,
His tender arms enfold me.

It was well sung, for only a hundred voices, the rich, religious, buoyant harmony flowing smoothly and evenly along, with spiritualizing, tranquillizing influence.

A benediction was pronounced by the venerable Father Taylor, the Seamen's Friend; and thus ended the most impressive, beautiful memorial services within our experience. It was good to be there. No one could have left that place with any conscious meanness in him unrebuked, or without new motion and new courage for a nobler life.

Music in Boston.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The second (Nov. 21) was perhaps the most enjoyed, and by the largest audience, of any thus far in three winters. The Orchestra was materially strengthened, now numbering 56 in all, with 12 first violins, at the head of whom sat Mr. EICHBERG, whose return was generally welcomed, and whose presence seemed to give new life. (By the way, Mr. Eichberg has since been appointed by the Harvard Committee, to the office of Leader, or adjoint, under Mr. Zerrahn,—what in the German Orchestras is called the Concertmeister, sometimes Vorgeiger [head and front of the violin force].) His function is, [illegible] the string department, to secure [illegible] of bowing in the manner of attacking and handling passages and phrases, &c.; and we have no doubt the fruits of such care and continuity in one head will soon appear in the more wholesome unanimity and smiling of the string quarter, which is the soul of any orchestra.—But to the second concert; this was the programme:

Overture to "Medea."	Cherubini.
a. Alto Aria. "Gott lässt, ye good and faithful servants, whom God hath called to heaven above." From a Cantata.	J. S. Bach.
b. Song. "Im Rhein, im heiligen Strome."	R. Franz.
Mrs. CARY.
Concerto for two Pianos.	Mozart.
[Cadenzas by Moscheles.]
B. J. LANG and J. C. D. PARKER.
Fourth Symphony, in B flat.	Beethoven.
a. Aria: "Dov' sono?" from "Le Nozze di Figaro."	Mozart.
b. Songs: "Wie nah mir, du Leuchte Augen." (Suppl-ment.)	Franz.
"Come into the garden, Maud."	O. Dresel.
Mrs. CARY.
Overture to "Oberon."	Weber.

The orchestra never played better; the strings telling with a [illegible] fulness and decision than before, save in the Eighth Symphony especially the need of greater body in the middle parts is still felt. There is also still something [illegible] in certain of the reed instruments; they need a quickening life to bring them up to more full healthy pitch. But this will come; for there is a new life in the band, a spirit of improvement; the performers are all interested in their work. That fascinating Fourth Symphony, the loveliest of the nine! How eagerly is every tone was listened for with glowing face. The Overture to Medea is the Leonore of Cherubini, which these Concerts have introduced as made for the first [illegible] appreciated here; and [illegible] back to [illegible] poetic substance and artistic symmetry, [illegible] classes as perhaps the best. It is an overture nearly of that mellowness. Full of suppressed passion with a [illegible] nervous [illegible] thrilling on the strings (for in it is written mainly in the violin groups, the basses entering the quaint little theme for imitation now and then), curious and earnest; it reminds one not a little of the Coriolanus overture; but, however, takes hold deeper down with stronger grasp. The vivacity, brilliant fairy romance to Oberon, excellently given as it was, was the right thing to end with.

The Mozart Concerto, for the two pianos, proved unexceedingly effective. With nothing particularly striking in its themes, most of the great thoughts of Mozart, it is so full of grace and spontaneity; the passages are so happily divided and imitated from one piano to the other, the unity of form so perfect, and the sympathy of the orchestral voices so rich and delightful, blending their purposes and aiding the whole, there is in the thoroughly enjoyed in all these movements. Mr. LANG and Mr. PARKER played it admirably. The first Cadenza by Moscheles is too long and brooding as it is in itself, not wholly in the vein of Mozart's composition. The second is shorter and more to the purpose.

With entire satisfaction we remember Mrs. CARY's singing as well as the choice selections. If her contralto voice does not carry so much weight as some, if she competes at disadvantage with the cheaper and more outward qualities which reach [illegible] the crowd, she has those fine, interior qualities of the true singer, with the corresponding beauty in her voice, which rightly claim the sympathy, indeed the paramount, of true appreciative criticism. We have no other who singing in public whose voice is so sympathetic, no singer of whatever kind of voice who sings in so classical, finely musical a spirit, with such pure expression, entering into the souls of the song with so little egotism. That Aria from Bach has the very soul of music in it, tender, sweet, heartful and pious. The instruments [illegible] quartet and we [illegible] Mr. Dresel at the piano he plays [illegible] (as he [illegible]) [illegible] rich, even terrors [illegible] comforting to hear. The melody seems to [illegible] its own accompaniments about [illegible] sympathetic there. Anything so [illegible] so true from modern of capricious [illegible] will [illegible] so [illegible] seem place; had of course to be listened to with close attention; and [illegible] as we own the heavenly [illegible] rewarded and would welcome more of Bach after that taste of [illegible]. Franz's deep, rich tranquil strain about "the Rhine, the holy river" made the right impression after it.

The [illegible] was best appreciated however, was the Mozart Aria, which was exquisitely sung and with Mr. Dresel's fine accompaniment was [illegible] more admired than when the same lady sang it last year. Franz appeared again in his most simply melodious and profoundly serious phase; [illegible] pleasure. Mr. Dresel's "Maud" was a [illegible] cut delicately true to the poem, with a charming accompaniment, and was very much applauded.

The third Concert takes place while this goes to press. In the fourth (Dec. 19) the Symphony in [illegible] by Schumann in D minor (given only once before); and as picturesque Overture by Gade "Echoes from Ossian," will open and Beethoven's great Leonora, No. 3 will close the feast. And Mr. [illegible] [illegible] we will play the great Beethoven Concerto in E flat (No. 5, sometimes called in England the Emperor Concerto).—Our hopes of [illegible] Concertante, we regret to say [illegible] as the lady is going to Europe; but the audience will be recompensed in the [illegible] when they learn that [illegible] has consented to play at that time, probably the [illegible] Concerto of Mendelssohn.

ORATORIO. The Handel and Haydn Society had not their usual crowd of audience at the first concert of the season on Saturday Evening, Nov. 23. This was partly owing to the [illegible] of [illegible] announcements, partly (we are inclined to think mainly) to a spell of musical [illegible] and rest after [illegible] years, and partly to the miscellaneous character of the programme, which with the Directors of the Society was a [illegible]. The selections were excellent, but the continuity of interest was continually broken. This made it not always easy for the chorus voices to [illegible] pitch [illegible] with certainty. Moreover the impressive [illegible] chorus [illegible] that of the one before, and left the mind [illegible]. The solos especially were chosen into bad [illegible] [illegible] the medley. Yet Mrs. KEMPTON, although suffering from [illegible] and therefore a little [illegible], sang "But the Lord is mindful" and "O rest in the Lord," with power and feeling and with true conception, and Miss HOUSTON sang "Jerusalem" very [illegible] [illegible]. The Duet "O lovely Peace," from Judas, was finely sung, though the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] Handel perfectly. The Choruses, from Israel, St. Paul, and "The Heavens are telling," from the Creation, have been sung better; but were [illegible]. The Orchestra was unusually large, [illegible] owing to the [illegible] of perfect union with the Organ [illegible] of the instruments sounded [illegible]—Mendelssohn's Psalm: "As the Hart pants," given entire was much more enjoyable.

Handel's "Samson," on the next evening, drew a considerably larger audience, and on the whole was admirable. We have in times past made much of it [illegible], but not on this time; it was judiciously abridged, and given with a great deal of spirit. The great choruses were of Handel's best, and were effectively [illegible]. Miss HOUSTON fairly carried her audience away by the sweetness and brilliancy of her high song, and by her sure and admirable singing in the ringing trumpet song "Let the bright Seraphim." In all her pieces she sang better than ever, but there she seemed inspired. Mrs. KEMPTON too was sincere applause in the part of Micah. Mr. JAMES WHITNEY gave the intensive recitative "Total eclipse" with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] and [illegible] the strength hardly told up [illegible] part of Samson. Mr. W[illegible] has a manly, resonant voice, and did good justice to the part of Manoah; and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY's ponderous bass was heard to good advantage in that of Harapha.

OPERA. The LAGRANGE [illegible] Italian Troupe, under the direction of Mr. MAX STRAKOSCH, occupied the Boston Theatre for a fortnight, exciting more interest than was expected and making [illegible] a good business. Mme. LAGRANGE, although her voice is sadly worn, is still one of the world's great artists. Her finished style, her singing, her [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of a lady [illegible] in such parts as Mistress Donna Anna and Lucrezia Borgia. Mlle. [illegible] never in better voice; never more [illegible] and still sang Zerlina's songs capitally, and was excellent of course as Rosina, Amina and La Traviata; though [illegible] [illegible] these last. [illegible] [illegible] his fine voice and the same [illegible] and [illegible] his parts. [illegible] is base [illegible] and he made a very coarse and awkward [illegible] of Leporello. The chorus was respectable, the orchestra, under the capricious [illegible] an Italian by the name of [illegible] was far from satisfactory.

The [illegible] English Opera, which has had so long a run in Philadelphia, opened last Monday evening at the Boston Theatre, with a performance of Martha, which appears to have [illegible] satisfaction. "The Bohemian Girl" and Wallace's "Maritana" have followed.

On Monday evening MAX MARETZEK, having made peace with his chorus singers in New York, will open with his Italian Opera, at Selwyn's Theatre, for a short season of two weeks. Miss [illegible] [illegible] is the principal [illegible]. The opening piece will be Un ballo in maschera; [illegible] Ernani, and Don Giovanni. Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia; Wednesday Ernani again; Thursday Romeo; Friday Don Giovanni; Saturday (Matinée) the Barber of Seville. Five operas, by [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible], in the first week.

We have not left ourselves room, and if we had should lack the power to express the unqualified delight with which we have heard CHARLES DICKENS read and reproduce before us, by apparently unforced [illegible] of genius so original, [illegible] [illegible], the characters in his novels, the [illegible] [illegible] most [illegible] and [illegible]. To us no reading ever had a charm to be compared with it. The performer of [illegible] has [illegible] [illegible] the voice is not that of Fanny Kemble in a [illegible]; but it is rich and sweet, [illegible] in [illegible] is wonderfully the [illegible] [illegible]. The eye and his [illegible] [illegible] his rapid [illegible] [illegible] is not only rhythm [illegible] and [illegible] in respect to these but [illegible] subtly to distinguish the [illegible] [illegible] from the actual impersonation, in which it disappears altogether. His heart and soul, his humor and imagination, his whole genius [illegible] [illegible] these readings of his own creations, and because he evidently enjoys them as heartily as we do we enjoy it all the more. And to see such a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] alternating between tears and laughter with the [illegible] the "Mighty [illegible]" of the [illegible] all the [illegible]—but must have been to him a pleasure like unfolding the secret of the world-wide success of all his writings into one perfect moment. But we have no room nor power—the piece from the Advertiser or [illegible] [illegible] will give our distant readers some idea of what sort when Mr. Dickens's first reading in the Tremont Temple was

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Nov. 20.—Last week witnessed the organization of the "New Haven Philharmonic Society," numbering some 50 members, and composed, of course, mainly of amateur musicians.

We like to see ambition and find no fault with the title of the club, though it does call to mind a little experience of ours concerning the great "American Harmonic Lecture Reformers"—which by personal investigation we found to consist solely of one dyspeptic looking young man and a chest of drawers. Success therefore to the N. H. P. S., whose advent we hail as a step at least in the right direction.

Mozart to the "String Quartette" has shown signs of returning animation and given a concert of chamber music—which took place on the 5th inst. with the following programme:

String Quartet in E flat, No. 4	Mozart.
Song.—"In die..."	Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo.—Songs without words.
a. [illegible] Book [illegible]
b. "The Return" [illegible]
Solo.—[illegible] Op. [illegible] Violoncello.	Mendelssohn.
Songs.	R. Schumann.
a. [illegible]
b. [illegible]
c. [illegible]
Grand Quartet in E flat, Piano Op. 16.	Beethoven.
Piano, Violin, Viola and Violoncello.

Albert Mahler, 1st Violin; [illegible], 2d Violin; [illegible] Chapman, Viola; [illegible], Violoncello; [illegible], Piano; [illegible] Chapman.

The effect of the String Quartet was—to state the case mildly—somewhat marred by the breaking of a string on the 1st Violin, which fact, together with a crude harshness and lack of unity in the performance left a sense of something lacking.

In the Beethoven Quartet, however, the players seemed to enter more into the heart of things and the piece—the Andante Cantabile in particular—went finely well.

The vocalist, we regret to say, persisted in singing Schumann's songs in villainous German with a French accent, notwithstanding the fact that she had the English words before her eyes. Hauser's (?) [illegible] love song was rendered "[illegible]," and phrased in a most mechanical way, which, though it may do very well for the melodies of the late Stephen C. Foster will not answer for Schumann.

The second of these Chamber Concerts will be given early in December with this programme (the vocalist being J. Sumner Smith):

String Quartet, Op. [illegible] No. 1.	Haydn.
Vocal Solo.—Sonata.	[illegible]
[illegible]
Violin Solo.—[illegible] Op. 13, No. 1
String Quartet
Song.—"The Message."	Blumenthal.
(Poem by Miss [illegible])
Piano Trio.—Op. 1, No. 3	Beethoven.

MERCUTIO.

CINCINNATI, O., Nov. 18.—Joyous the greeting and blessed the day when old friends meet the same as of yore and quicken the throbs and warmer the blood when stirred by undying familiar ties. Like a perfect June-like bright spring-time returned the days seemed when after many a year we once heard again the Mendelssohn Quintette Club again; when floating back came the festive memories of days that were filled with the delicious music of great artists when Chickering's and Townsend Hall gave forth recital [illegible] and the Music Hall were precious ages with their delights, and made us forget that we have them not nor the wealth of melody has periodically filled and enriched them.

There is no need to speak of the playing of our friends in your paper. Nor would you perfected what I may believe how well they did. Fit, [illegible], how our musicians alike and the audience were carried away with delight. Fresh as you ever is a thing as novel as the air you breathe, as the sweet [illegible] that refresh and quickens you. Such to us is what we only what their Concerts were of Music. In served [illegible]

In [illegible]
[illegible] of delight, grateful to less. They did well to come to us. And if you sometimes, as you do, in your Symphony Concerts, do not forget that their are some here in an appreciable of one and another beauty. Their playing has grown deeper warmer, and it did not fail to greatly [illegible] people who had been satisfied before because the standard was wanting whereby to judge and measure. At the three concerts we could attend they had good houses. As to the three others we can only tell the delight of musical friends. Haydn Quartette G. [illegible]; Mendelssohn Quartet in E flat, Quintet in B flat, op. 87. Beethoven Quartet in E flat, op. 74. Schumann, Mozart, Schubert, the great masters all, and so forget Handel and Gluck (Bach there excepted), were heard again, and the pleasure was great and will be lasting.

At the we are speaking of repetition of art, there ought to be mentioned two other earnest and gifted men whom we have here with us. Mr. H. G. Andres, whose excellent playing was spoken of before by your correspondent, gave two concerts last spring that were much admired. In these we heard of Mozart, the Quartets No. 1 and No. 3, in E flat (the latter being the Piano Quartet), of Beethoven, the Sonata quasi una Fantasia, op. 27, No. 2, of Schubert, the Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, op. 99 and the Sonatine of Chopin, the Berceuse of Spohr's [illegible] Concerto and various smaller things. Mr. A. excels in a clean but sympathetic rendering of the masters. His touch is silvery and delicate, and his fancy abundant as is proved by several of his own compositions. Of the Transcription of the German popular song "[illegible]" we spoke last year. This year we had a Pastorale Militaire published by A. C. Peters & Bro. It is a tolerable bit of both original thought and effective; and we are promised a Scherzo which if the first hearing does so we will be equally good. Mr. A. is the director of the Cecilia Society which lately (Nov. 7th) gave the first concert of the ensuing season. Haydn's "Spring," the Choruses, "Lord, Lord," and "How pleasant are the Messengers," from Paulus; Gounod's Cantata "Ave [illegible]," and presented the vocal; the Adagio and Finale from the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven and a Transcription of Schubert's Lee Adieux formed the instrumental part of the programme. We were prevented from attending.

Mr. GEORGE SCHMITT, sr., the younger of the two artists, gave a concert, Nov. 10th, in which Miss [illegible] sang two songs the only pieces not classical. The Messrs. Brandt played with Mr. S. Mendelssohn's Sonata for Piano and Violoncello in B flat, op. 45. Schubert's Rondo for Piano and Violin, op. 70, in B minor, and Beethoven's Trio, op. 70, No. 2, in D major. Mr. G. Andres assisted Mr. S. in Schumann's Variations in B flat major for two pianos, op. 46 and Mr. S. played Chopin's Ballade in A flat, op. 47. The concert was delightful if we except the singing; and Mr. S. showed by his fine and delicate playing that he has made good advances on the road toward the Ideal.

The Symphony Concerts have begun again, and Mr. Hopkins (?) the gentleman who built the Hall and pays the musicians has made us thankful anew for the music we should not hear without him.

We only wish—while we are about—that the musical season so beautifully opened by the work of pure delight furnished by your Mendelssohnians may continue so prosperous. It is hardly possible that the crowd of the Commercial may be a young who has made the discovery that we might meet just as the Quintette Club here and the material we have on hand. We wish him success and God speed. Many things are done that seem past belief. We are afraid, however that he is sounding a march no more than has written. For he has discovered the great art of [illegible] "Lieder Unmerau" [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] that Beethoven used the motives of his [illegible] century before in his Egmont. A great pity Mr. Commercial has no teeth. W.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."*

BY DR. EDWARD HANSLICK.

"Romeo and Juliet! Can love matter for an opera be imagined than this Solomon's Song of Love? Numerous composers, the Germans Steibelt and George Benda, the Italians Zingarelli, Vaccai, Bellini and others have found inspiration in it. Only one mountain stands in the way, and that is named Shakspeare. Who will fly after him, or seek to bear him higher on his flight? The more closely the composer cleaves to Shakspeare's own words, all the more risk he himself runs, he [illegible]. For musical purposes, therefore, I would rather choose a paraphrase, which should give merely the outlines of the Shakspearian action, filling them out independently with one's own fiction. Gounod has followed the opposite course, keeping as much of the original poem as is compatible with the vital conditions musical and scenic of compass. From this point of view the libretto is formed with propriety and skill. It does not excite the fancy by the rich alternation of contrasted figures and scenes like Faust, but on the other hand it avoids unsuitable spectacular effects, like the Walpurgis Night, the final Transfiguration, &c.

Exacting critics, who perhaps would like to have the servants' talk and the "bolus dicty" of the nurse also musically illustrated, blame perhaps the caprices of the arrangement. The only two departures from the original worth mentioning consist in the transformation of the servant Balthasar into a "Page," and in the introduction of the wedding ceremony of Juliet with Paris, during which Juliet, stupefied by the drug, sinks down. The "Page" was necessary to gain a separate voice for the ensemble; the Wedding, to interpolate a picture of somewhat fresher coloring between the friar's cell and the vault of the Capulets.

Shakespeare's words are very frequently recited. Gounod has not even allowed the Prologue to be spoken, but has used it for a noteworthy Introduction, the singular charm of which is not to be denied. After some restless preluding measures of the orchestra the curtain rises and we see before us a motionless picture: group of young men and ladies, somewhat like the well known picture of Boccaccio's Florentine party. This chorus sings in simple, tender unaccompanied chords the short Prologue: "Vérone vit jadis deux familles rivales, les Montaigus les Capulets," &c. The whole appears and vanishes, with the orchestra darkened like a magical image of light.

The first act begins with the ball at the house of Capulet. Juliet sings her artless gay [illegible] an aria, whose waltz-like character is justly found objectionable. Evidently this number (like the jewel aria in Faust) is a concession to Mme. Miolan Carvalho, the powerful directress and prima donna of the Théâtre Lyrique. Romeo appears, masked with his friends. Mercutio sings the dance piece of Queen Mab. Then follows the first meeting between Romeo and Juliet, and then the scuffle between Tybalt and Romeo, which is quelled by Capulet. The second Act consists almost entirely of the Balcony scene, preceded by a short male chorus of the friends of Romeo and an Arioso by the latter. The rendezvous of the lovers at the cell of Friar Laurence, who [illegible] them, opens the third Act; a mocking chorus and a song in strophes (Chanson) of the Page lead to the Finale, which ends with the fight between the two hostile parties and the death of Mercutio. The first half of the fourth Act is filled entirely by the great love duet of the young, newly wedded pair, musically the most prominent piece of the opera. This is followed by an Aria of Friar Laurence, who hands to Juliet the benumbing potion; with the wedding ceremony with chorus, march and a short dance, the Act concludes with Juliet's supposed death. The fifth Act is played in the burial vault exclusively between the two lovers, over whose corpses locked in the last embrace the curtain falls.

We defer a close personal criticism of the opera the more willingly as it is just about to be performed here (in Vienna) and we would not anticipate the impression of the public and the critics. There can be no contradiction of the assertion that the composer has given himself to his difficult task with singular devotion and perseverance. Gounod is a very earnest man, somewhat inclined to mysticism, who comprehends the mission of Art from the highest standpoint and serves it with an almost religious zeal. On the composition of the Romeo, which he began immediately after the Faust, Gounod (with a few necessary interruptions for smaller works) has labored eight years, and surely with the purest striving to achieve his best. We must never forget that Gounod is a Frenchman and cannot possibly quite emancipate himself from his national way of seeing and of feeling. Moreover, Gounod—an enthusiastic worshipper and connoisseur of German masters—has approached the German operatic ideal and the hearty genial character of our music more nearly than any other Frenchman.

With all due recognition of Gounod's artistically pure and noble aspirations, we cannot at the same time conceal from ourselves, that his Romeo and Juliet on the whole betrays a weakening of the creative faculty. The wealth of melody, the freshness and vivacity of the Faust we find again only in the happiest moments of Romeo. These appear the most richly in the tender lyrical scenes; where a high-soaring and passionate dramatic strength is required Gounod's strength is also. This will be perceived in the quarrel scene and the Finale of the third Act, where a poor almost note-for-note reminiscence of the mocking chorus in the Huguenots passes with one composer. Compared with the figures of Romeo and Juliet, which are executed con amore, the others fall off materially. Capulet's [illegible] Thibault his bravery and Friar Laurence's monotonous unction, even the bravura rehearsal. Of him again one detail, of charming characteristic traits, as much right more as in the Faust respect with Gounod. But his dramatic power in Romeo has short breath, and the musical invention not seldom a monotonous and feebly trickling flow. Both as to melody and harmony Romeo reminds you strongly of the music to Faust: the finest number of the opera, the love duet in the fourth Act, is pervaded by the same sweetly narcotic Amour odor which has made us so willingly captive in the garden scene between Faust and Margaret.

The Elector for a long time refused his consent to the Italian journey; he was, however, yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of his Kapellmeister, and granted him permission to go. Schütz's efforts during this trip were not directed to gaining new and engaging the [illegible] singers or instrumentalists, but zealously observing and all possible obtaining possession of all objects connected with music which could tend to improve the Dresden establishment. He believed so you moreover. The Master meant would not go far in making purchases, evidently, but he did not hesitate incurring considerable debts, in the firm conviction that his princely sovereign would liberally supply the missing funds.—As the fearful war, which had been raging in Germany for the last ten years, had brought every mail spared also Saxony. I return. The Elector made no demur, but acceded to Schütz's request to give something more than usual. Schütz had received four hundred and then three hundred thalers. But Schütz and his master were not destined to profit of once by the brilliant acquisitions made for the chapel, as, shortly after Schütz's return, Saxony became almost the focus of the war. Distress burst out, and in the following year the general misery was endless.

As a matter of course, any cultivation of art was, under such circumstances, out of the question. Where was the Elector to find the means of alleviating the wretchedness of a few musicians and their families, when he required his means so pressingly for other things? In this crisis, it was Schütz who assisted the sufferers by word and deed; who, with kind arguments and not unrewarded remonstrances alleviated the deep misery of the members of his chapel. All his urgent representations at Court were insufficient to procure the payment of arrears, and then far could his own means reach? This fearful period stands with iron features continuous just as it did over other people, and the most heart-rending pictures are presented to our gaze. The musicians scattered; the only necessaries of life were went one way, others went another, and the chapel that had been created with such trouble and such industry was partially broken up. He would rather, Schütz writes, be "Cantor" or organist in his own little town than remain longer in such a position. If things went on thus, he said, he should be compelled to seek an asylum elsewhere, for he had already advanced at least three hundred thalers to the poor people.

It was not till after the year 1650 that there was a change for the better; though it was long before the divers annul. In 1641, Schütz was able to make proposals to his sovereign for the re-establishment of the chapel. It was too costly a process to engage new members; so he admitted fresh chapel-boys and instrumentalists to assist the members who still remained. This was decidedly the cheapest and surest plan for establishing a new chapel. The Electoral Prince—afterwards Johann Georg II.—took a greater interest in music than even the Elector himself, and thus a new chapel gradually grew up, though its condition previous to the termination of the war cannot be described as particularly gratifying.

It may easily be imagined that, after a period so full of labor and care, Schütz should yearn for repose, and we cannot feel surprised that, in 1645, when he was 60, he begged permission to retire. He was [illegible] principally by [illegible] with the Italians whom the Electoral Prince had attracted to Dresden for the purpose of forming a chapel of his own. Schütz, who was better versed than any one else in the Italian style, had [illegible] in carrying out the Princes wishes, till, at last, he was so over-burdened with work that his failing strength staggered beneath it. He represented that his eyes were becoming feeble and that he was [illegible] of being able [illegible] could not estimate the great [illegible] of his post as an [illegible]. Notwithstanding all his entreaties, the Elector would not let him go, although he gave him, in 1645, his [illegible] Christoph Bernhard as substitute. [illegible] when Johann Georg I. died in 1656 and the Prince's chapel entirely disappeared, being partly blended by the [illegible] with the Electoral chapel, Schütz was appointed chapelmaster and performed the duties of that post during [illegible] years, though, of course, not with his old strength and freshness. In this situation [illegible] the affection and esteem of the [illegible] themselves in the highest degree and, when the venerable old man died at the age of eighty-seven he was accompanied to the grave by the love, gratitude, and admiration of all his friends and contemporaries.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.*

It is a well-known fact that, even as early as the 12th century, a certain interest began to be felt for the treasures handed down from classical antiquity, and the code of morals contained in them,—a code opposed to the spirituality of the Christianity of the Middle Ages. Until then almost exclusively confined to monasteries and cloistered walls, classical literature now began to be the intellectual property of poets, artists, intelligent persons, and other leading men. It is true that care was still taken, as is proved by Dante's poem among other works, to subordinate the elements of classical teaching to the views of the Middle Ages, so that the antique element could present itself effectually only as tolerated by the imagination, and not as independent and, therefore, affecting the life of the Present in a new and independent manner. It did not do so till the 15th and 16th century, when as a consequence of the [illegible] the tenets of the Church, the discovery of America, the progress of the burgher class in commerce, art, and industry, and, above all, in consequence of the Reformation, the limits of the old ideas and the former state of things were everywhere broken through. Among the most important results of these tremendous mental, social and material revolutions was a [illegible] to that world, a [illegible] in the best sense of the term, and therefore, an uninterrupted progressive reconciliation of Christianity with the world from that period down to the present day, and, so to speak, the various peoples once more felt at home in their own country, their own language, and their own nationality. It was only natural that Antiquity should be more deeply, and, at the same time, more popularly comprehended in all the purity and originality of its teaching, than it was in the 12th century. It may be said that the partiality for Antiquity degenerated, in the 16th century, almost into mannerism. At Florence, Rome, and Venice, on festive occasions, public processions were got up, in which the figures of the gods and heroes of the Greeks traversed the streets. Raphael [illegible] to Pope Leo X.; Michael Angelo and [illegible] the Farnese [illegible] poets, painters, and sculptors, began to take their subjects [illegible] from the world of classical [illegible] as to those of the Middle Ages. It was the fashion to compare the great ones of this earth with Hercules, Caesar and [illegible] as if the great ones themselves thought it an honor to raise their capitals, Courts and [illegible]. Under such circumstances, it was only natural that the elements of classical culture should begin to influence music as well as other things. Here again, it is wonderfully and convincingly apparent how closely connected Poetry and Music [illegible] down to [illegible] the earliest period of history.

To revive the tragedy of the Ancients, an association of artists and lovers of art was formed in the year 1580 at the house of Giovanni Bardi Conte di Vernio, in Florence. It comprised among its members the Musicians Vincenzo Galilei, Giacomo Corsi, Pietro Strozzi, the poets, Ottavio Rinuccini, Orazio Vecchi, and the composers, Emilio del Cavaliere, Giacomo Peri, and Giulio Caccini. One result of the efforts of the society was the composition of the first lyrical opera, Dafne, the poem by Rinuccini, produced at Florence in 1594. This was followed by the first tragic opera Euridice, the poem by Rinuccini, the music by Peri and Caccini.—As already stated, the sole object of these enthusiasts for classical Antiquity was to revive the antique Drama. They thought therefore principally of [illegible] poetry rather than music, [illegible] a secondary part. That music, however, should reap the largest harvest from their efforts, as it did, since an entirely new kind of composition, opera, sprang from them, is one of those wondrous phenomena of which we meet with more than one instance in the [illegible] progress appertaining to different epochs of civilization [illegible].

However little the rise of opera we have here described appears at first to have to do with Oratorio, every one must admit that it exercised a most important influence on the last named branch of art; [illegible] show that precisely in those [illegible] dramatico-musical attempts was discovered the formula by virtue of which Oratorio was first enabled to attain the importance of an epic tone-poem and more developed [illegible]. This was the recitative. In the Mysteries of an earlier period, it first rendered possible any kind of musical [illegible] and yet it was utterly different from them. The recitatives resembled the [illegible] the same tune repeated [illegible] formula such as we find them even at the present day in the Greek and the Roman Catholic Church, or in the Synagogue. But in the dramatic [illegible] of the Florentines above mentioned the object proposed was a musical rendering of the text not merely corresponding in a general way with the meaning to be expressed, but adapted to each particular word, so that free scope was left to musical fancy and [illegible] the declamatory [illegible] melodically developed phrase took the place of the [illegible] psalmodic style.

While this kind of recitative assumed a more and more dramatic coloring in opera, especially where the object was to represent a sudden change in the feelings and impressions of the different characters, so as to work up the situation to a dramatic climax by means of [illegible] and passionate interpellations and replies, it was, on the contrary, marked in Oratorio by a more staid and solemn bearing, such as the spirit of epic music demanded. It is true that, even here, though more broadly and diffusely treated than in opera, recitative serves to afford the personages introduced as speaking an opportunity for expressing an abrupt change of feeling, or sudden and deep emotion; its chief and powerful object was, however, to announce, to inform, and to narrate; to animate and fully [illegible] the purport of the story, and to connect with a due regard to form and style, as well as [illegible] the principal points now represented as more especially lyrical, and now as more especially dramatic, occurring within the framework of that story.

From recitative thus developed to the forms of the air and of the duet there was but one step.—Where formerly, in the [illegible] style, the sentiment [illegible] opportunity for the [illegible] of its increased force, and, [illegible] to spread out musically in a melodic [illegible], there were introduced the air, the duet [illegible]. A great support for the [illegible] of the new [illegible] that then arose [illegible] progress made meanwhile [illegible] the organ [illegible] and wind-instruments, and [illegible].

MS. Works of Mendelssohn brought to Light.

I. THE REFORMATION SYMPHONY.

(From the London Telegraph, Dec. [illegible].)

* * * * A singular history is attached to the work to which we allude. The symphony in D minor—which, by-the-bye, had begun and ended in the major—was written expressly [illegible] Reformation Symphony in celebration [illegible] of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, [illegible] throughout Germany on the 25th June, 1830. But party spirit ran high then; and although Mendelssohn had completed his symphony [illegible] without prejudice. But when two years afterwards he [illegible] from Italy, where the well known symphony in A major had [illegible] he visited Paris, he [illegible] of the [illegible] work, and arranged that it should be given at a Conservatoire concert. [illegible] symphony which [illegible] Paris [illegible] London [illegible]. The above extract [illegible] that the Reformation Symphony had never been given up to February, 1832 [illegible] and it has been generally supposed that the work was never publicly performed. In the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, however, for February 1833 we have lighted upon the report of a concert [illegible] given in the preceding November [illegible] three new compositions of Mendelssohn—new to the people of Berlin, that is—were brought forward. These were the Reformation Symphony, the G minor Concerto, and the overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream. Strangely enough it does not state who played the concerto [illegible] conducted the symphony. We may [illegible] Mendelssohn himself [illegible] is reported to have played at the same concert one of Beethoven's concertos. The few words which the critic bestows upon the symphony may be [illegible]. "The symphony," says the writer, "begins [illegible] and has [illegible] concluding Allegro. The [illegible] of well known chorale melodies, e.g., Ein feste Burg, [illegible] would on the whole have imparted to this composition a more engaging coloring."

After such [illegible] was a great work by the [illegible] most [illegible] of his [illegible] upon it the most important [illegible] periodical of Germany. If [illegible] reflected the opinion of the day Mendelssohn [illegible] have been appreciated in his full value. The Reformation Symphony was [illegible] as far as we know [illegible], and it is possible that [illegible] had an idea of [illegible] it at some future time. Death, however, put an end to all such designs, and [illegible] of the composer [illegible] of his reputation, refused to make the work public. Now that we have heard the Reformation Symphony we are [illegible] at a loss to understand the principle on which they have acted. They have given to us, [illegible], [illegible] and with apparent reluctance, the music to "Athalie" and "Œdipus," the "Loreley," the Finale to [illegible] the "[illegible]" — known here as "Son and Stranger" — the Italian Symphony, the [illegible] quartet, the B-flat quintet, and the overture to "Ruy Blas" — all composed [illegible] which Mendelssohn himself had abstained from making public. And yet they [illegible] refused to publish or [illegible] the score of a work which, as it seems to us, is as valuable as any of the above-mentioned [illegible].

Lately, however, a change has come o'er the spirit of the [illegible], and thanks to Herr Carl Mendelssohn, the son of the composer, the Trumpet overture, the eighth book of Songs without Words, and, lastly, the Reformation Symphony have been given up in rapid succession. The announcement that the latter work would be given on Saturday last at the Crystal Palace produced almost as much excitement among musical people as the production of an undiscovered play from Shakespeare's pen would cause among play-goers. Not a corner of the [illegible] was unoccupied, and among the audience could be observed the [illegible] of all the connoisseurs, professional and amateur, in London.

We have not the hardihood to attempt the analysis of so important a work after a single hearing; [illegible] as we [illegible] to [illegible] among the symphonies which have been left us by Mendelssohn. In one respect, at least, it seems to us to stand alone. It has a [illegible] defined aim and object. It has been inspired by one grand idea, which from the first note to the last is never once lost sight of. Written to celebrate the Reformation, in the faith of which Mendelssohn himself was brought up, it depicts in [illegible] colors the rise and progress, the [illegible] of Protestantism. It is, in fact, a drama, the action of which is carried on by the orchestra. And in that we see an illustration of the [illegible] which has been made in the most popular art of modern times. In the early history of music we find that the instruments are employed as [illegible], subservient [illegible] of the human voice, the Queen of [illegible]. Like [illegible], they prepare the way for her approach. Her [illegible] attendants, they support her on her progress and give her time to breathe when she is tired, while, like honest and well-trained courtiers, they [illegible] kept behind silence in [illegible]. But as time runs on, the "[illegible]" [illegible], like intelligent subjects of a weak [illegible], pluck up a heart, and dare to let their voices be heard, even when royalty speaks. And as in the [illegible] so in the [illegible], the spirit of [illegible] and independence goes on increasing until at length all the instruments combine, and form a republic in which none but she has [illegible] play first fiddle. With these quick tongued and eloquent [illegible] for actors, and with the stage for a concert-room, does Mendelssohn play out the great drama of the Reformation.

He opens with a short andante of [illegible], the [illegible] beauty of which [illegible] the perfect [illegible] in which all nature lived when there flourished but one Christian Church. This slow movement, however, speedily gives place to an allegro con fuoco in which is prominent a certain melody which, taken from, [illegible] used in the Roman Catholic service, and [illegible] by Mendelssohn, may be supposed to symbolize that faith. But the [illegible] of doubt begin to rise, and when these are [illegible], they are exchanged for one of those long [illegible] of [illegible] such as Mendelssohn introduced into the Scotch Symphony and which seem [illegible] suffering in which the [illegible] of [illegible] gave rise. As the end of the [illegible] movement, however, the victory seems to remain with the [illegible] of [illegible], and [illegible] the first [illegible] of the drama concludes. Still some [illegible] always be a [illegible] to the [illegible] which [illegible] upon [illegible] as the second movement, [illegible], [illegible] the first was sad. The scherzo—for such it really is—opens with a [illegible] sparkling and [illegible] ing theme, and the [illegible], as though it were the [illegible] of [illegible] natural spirits, [illegible] more and more [illegible], checked by a [illegible] phrase, which, stealing gently in, hushes the [illegible] [illegible] as though it were a voice from heaven, reminding the [illegible] that there is a [illegible] which far transcends the mere jollity of this life. Three times does this heavenly [illegible] occur, each time exerting the [illegible] tranquillising influence, while the graceful flowing melody of the trio also serves the [illegible] of the movement [illegible] at length [illegible] the upper hand and the [illegible] is distinguished by a [illegible] playfulness that [illegible].

The third movement, an andante, opening with a long and highly expressive melody given out by all the string band, expresses most powerfully the despair of [illegible] when [illegible] has [illegible] into hopeless [illegible], the [illegible] of the famous Lutheran chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," is heard in the flute solo [illegible] upon the ear with the [illegible] of the "[illegible] dew from heaven." [illegible] [illegible], though in some such tranquil tones, the melody that signifies the Protestant [illegible] gradually in strength and purpose. It [illegible] from different regions of the orchestra with [illegible] effect. Often suppressed and often struggling with difficulty to make itself heard, it is never long silent. Like the pure faith it symbolizes, which no [illegible] could [illegible] [illegible] could [illegible] the melody [illegible] everywhere [illegible]. A [illegible] fugue begins to [illegible] stubborn, unflinching way through all opposition, and the scarcely less [illegible] chorale follows [illegible] in the path thus [illegible] made. But the [illegible] breathe, and then the [illegible] begins to [illegible] with the flute. We have seemed [illegible] the splendid skill with which the [illegible] is worked together the brief [illegible] of the first movement, suggesting the hold which the ancient faith still has upon religious minds, [illegible] he speedily [illegible], and the grand chorale [illegible] overcome all opposition, is finally given out with all the force of the full orchestra—a symbol of the [illegible] triumph and [illegible] of the Church of Christ in its [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible]. With this noble [illegible] of the Lutheran [illegible] the Reformation Symphony [illegible]. It is, at least, a graceful fancy that the spirit of the departed [illegible] the earth. The spirit of the mighty genius whose [illegible] on Saturday [illegible] must surely have been present [illegible] of his [illegible] was awakened from long slumber to a second youth.

The symphony was throughout listened to with absorbed attention, the [illegible] was enthusiastically [illegible] and Mr. Manns, at its conclusion, was [illegible] [illegible] whose [illegible] by the marvellously fine performance of the orchestra [illegible] well.

Musicians will need no telling that the eighth book of the beautiful effusions for the pianoforte which alone would make their composer's name [illegible] end of time, has hitherto [illegible] kept from the public by the survivors. The reasons [illegible] of these individuals [illegible] better than never—they have [illegible] of their ways, and [illegible] of the dead [illegible] a treasure to the world. Leaving the other works out of the question, it is [illegible] why [illegible] was so long [illegible]. Not even the most [illegible] of Mendelssohn [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] would be [illegible] by the author. [illegible] respects [illegible] they [illegible], [illegible] or less of Mendelssohn's characteristic [illegible], and as [illegible] his reputation as [illegible] will have no effect [illegible]. This book gives the master [illegible] for the admirers of all who [illegible] and admire him for his works' sake. [illegible] [illegible] "songs" were [illegible] as Mendelssohn [illegible] they are printed. What that [illegible] we do not know and therefore we are [illegible] of them according to the numbers by which they are known on this special occasion. No. 1 is an andante [illegible] in E minor, and has a peculiarly [illegible] almost [illegible] theme with the [illegible] accompaniment so common in [illegible]. No. 2, an andante in C major, is [illegible] by [illegible] melody and [illegible] harmony, examples of which will [illegible] being found in the preceding books. The allegro [illegible] major which [illegible] No. 3, is thoroughly Mendelssohnian in its delicate grace and refined gladness, which [illegible] all the [illegible] more [illegible]. [illegible] the religious peace and calm of No. [illegible] an adagio [illegible] a admirable contrast. Here again, Mendelssohn has resorted to [illegible] harmony. The type of No. [illegible] in C minor—is very familiar. In possesses the charming theme and the [illegible] accompaniment [illegible] pianoforte players [illegible] well. No. [illegible] is a presto in C major, [illegible] which [illegible] along its course [illegible] the [illegible] and never stopping [illegible] till the end is reached. Were [illegible] on Monday the listener [illegible] to make the journey again. [illegible] is very brief, [illegible] the new [illegible] shortly to be placed within the reach of pianoforte players. We congratulate them on the prospect. As regards the manner in which they were performed, we [illegible] Madame Arabella Goddard discharged her responsible [illegible] performer. That lady took [illegible] and [illegible] made [illegible] to come forward as the first [illegible] of the world of a great master's [illegible] in some sort, not only the credit of the performer but of the composer also, rested upon her and we [illegible] she [illegible] in the already acquired fame [illegible]. [illegible], whether [illegible] or not, Mendelssohn was safe in Madame Goddard's hands, and needed no better exponent. Each "song" [illegible] the first time, [illegible] the composer's [illegible] [illegible] and was at once accepted as belonging to [illegible] the "[illegible]" of such [illegible] such [illegible].—Times.

The Bavarian Sitting

SCENE.—An Apartment in the House of Wittelsbach. On the Throne is seated the one and only Wagner at his feet the King of Bavaria.

His Majesty the King—High [illegible] and [illegible] poet, another deputation has brought the [illegible] of [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] the world-[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] wishes in reference to the [illegible] which has been accepted by the almost unanimous votes of our Lower House.

H. M. Wagner—Majesty don't interrupt. I am just beginning the [illegible] of my [illegible] to be [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] Harmonic and [illegible] by the only one Wagner—my honored self.

H. M. the King—How beautiful—how [illegible] the talk! Let us away to the mountains—to Starnberg—anywhere—where I may fill my [illegible] [illegible] Wagnerian harmonies.

H. M. Wagner—That's [illegible] Majesty. My new work will take three days and three nights to perform.

H. M. the King—All-beloved heaven how delicious! The [illegible] take politics, and my brother of [illegible] [illegible] I would give [illegible] [illegible] Augsburg, and Bamberg for an overture from thee, [illegible] Poet!

H. M. Wagner—Overtures! Your Majesty is asking me [illegible] I scorn [illegible] overtures. Leave these to the [illegible] composition [illegible]. My [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible], and not the [illegible] of the [illegible] the [illegible] of the orchestra [illegible].

H. M. the King—But, Poet [illegible] I hear the [illegible] of the different [illegible] [illegible] deputations. What must I say? I [illegible]

H. M. Wagner—Majesty you're a doubtful [illegible]. If your [illegible] you to these [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a false [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

H. M. the King—But Poet [illegible] how can I decide without your consent? [illegible] is by no means [illegible].

H. M. Wagner—[illegible] doesn't believe in the [illegible] of the throne. [illegible] must be [illegible]. What's the [illegible] Majesty?

H. M. the King—[illegible]

H. M. Wagner—[illegible] Majesty. A theme for [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible].

H. M. the King—My noble Poet, I have the honor [illegible] the seraphic [illegible] to [illegible] harmonious back of Pegasus [illegible] my people's heart through [illegible].

H. M. Wagner—In the name of [illegible] holy Majesty leave me alone, [illegible] I shall [illegible] [illegible] the Court of Vienna.

Oratorio. During the last week in November Elijah was performed here by the Sacred Harmonic and the National Choral Society. The former Society held in the same week its 35th annual meeting at Exeter Hall, the president, Mr. J. N. Harrison, in the chair.

The report, a document of considerable length, congratulated the subscribers, that both here, as usual, and in the committee considered it desirable to encourage that the concerts had always been attended by successful audiences, and that they had satisfied the committee that there was reason to maintain the society as the greatest choral institution in the world had been attended with success. Reference was made to the steps taken by the committee to maintain the efficiency of the orchestra, and it was stated that many of the older members of the orchestra had retired, their places being occupied by younger members, who were only admitted after the strictest trial as to their ability and promise at sound rehearsals with regularity. The members were informed that the committee had entered into arrangements with the directors of the Crystal Palace for another Great Handel Festival in 1868, and from the steps which were in contemplation in reference thereto no doubt was entertained by the committee that it would surpass its predecessors. Several of the oratorios and other works performed by the society during the past season had not been performed for several seasons, in addition to which Mr. Benedict's cantata "St. Cecilia," had also been performed by the society for the first time in London. It met with great success, and had since been performed at the Birmingham Festival and at several other places in the country. Reference was made to the benefit concert undertaken by Mr. Costa at the society, in aid of the fund for restoring the destroyed portion of the Crystal Palace. The books of the oratorios and of the chamber duos of the company had been given to the committee, and it was hoped that the example thus set, and subsequently by [illegible] foregoners, might be more generally followed.

The accounts of the society for the past year were read by the treasurer. The receipts had been about [illegible], the payments for the year including a considerable purchase of music and [illegible] the [illegible] at Exeter Hall, [illegible]. The property of the society was valued at a little under [illegible], including [illegible] in the public funds.

The report was adopted and the retiring members of the committee re-elected.

It was stated that the next concert would be the 500th given by the society in the large hall in Exeter Hall, and that the committee had requested Mr. Costa to allow his [illegible] "Naaman" to be performed on the occasion, at a slight mark of [illegible]. Upon this a resolution was moved by Mr. Puttick and seconded by Mr. [illegible] that the receipts from this concert be handed over to the benevolent fund of the society, the society defraying the whole cost of the concert, and that the members and subscribers of the society be requested to aid in forwarding the benevolent object.

The cordial thanks of the members were given to Mr. Costa for his great assistance during the past year, to whom they offered their congratulations on the [illegible] with which those exertions had been attended.

Votes of thanks were then passed to the president, the treasurer, and other officers of the society, and the meeting separated, a long and devotional vote having been raised during the two hours' proceedings.

Concerts and Concerts. The second Monday Popular concert was interesting as presenting an eighth book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte among the books posthumously published. The programme to which these Lieder formed a part was as follows:—

Quintet in E major for strings, two violins, viola and violoncello, MM. Joachim, Strauss, L. Ries, Henry Blagrove, and Piatti .... Mozart.
Song, "Where the bee sucks," Miss Cecilia Westbrook .... Arthur Sullivan.
Lieder ohne Worte, book 8, posthumous, published first time of public performance in any country, Mme. Arabella Goddard .... Mendelssohn.
Sonata in D major, op. 58, for piano and violoncello, Arabella Goddard and Signor Piatti .... Mendelssohn.
Song, "Turn them away," Miss Cecilia Westbrook; violoncello obligato, Mr. Lazarus .... Macfarren.
Quartet in G major, op. 76, No. 1, for two violins, viola and violoncello, first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Henry Blagrove and Piatti .... Haydn.

The eighth book consists of six Lieder, the dates and localities of their composition being noted on the manuscript. No. 1 was written in London on the 12th of June 1842, and No. 2 on July 5th in the same capital. No. 3 was composed at Leipsic on the 12th of December 1845, and No. 4 is from an undated manuscript belonging to Mme. Klingemann, the wife of an intimate friend of Mendelssohn. Nos. 5 and 6 were composed February 5th, 1841, and December 19th, 1844; the piano not being a word in either case. Of the collection it may be briefly said that they show more power and beauty than the seventh book published a few months back of Mendelssohn's. In every case they are calculated rather to enhance than detract from the fame of the composer. For the manner in which they were rendered by Mme. Goddard we have only unqualified praise. An encore was asked for Nos. 2 and 6, and the applause at the end was most hearty. These Lieder are published by Messrs. Novello & Co. The clarinet quintet of Mozart was grandly performed. Miss Westbrook ably filled the post of vocalist, and Mr. Arthur Sullivan's [illegible] of the [illegible] of Mr. Benedict as conductor. At the third concert on last Monday, we had an especial novelty. A fifth performance of Schubert's quartet in D charmed the auditory, being admirably played by MM. Strauss, Ries, Blagrove, and Piatti. A sonata in A major, for violin [illegible] German Peter, composed by Handel, was introduced by Herr Pauer for the first time, and pleased considerably, as a [illegible] it is in four movements, with a piano-forte accompaniment and however Handel's. The [illegible] particularly fine. Mr. Hallé was the pianist, and gave Beethoven's sonata in E flat, op. 31, a composition which he played with marvellous effect—especially the sweet and melodious adagio in C. Mr. Hallé was warmly welcomed. Miss Anna, the vocalist, gave us "My mother bids me bind my hair" "[illegible]" with violin obligato, and Signor Piatti's [illegible] and popular serenade, to which Signor Piatti's violoncello formed a good accompaniment.

The first of a series of "Historical performances of piano-forte music," was given by Herr Pauer in Hanover Square on Wednesday. The programme, consisting of compositions in consecutive order of production, was apportioned into two parts, the [illegible] piano or clavecin age, and the [illegible] age. In the first we had Kuhnau, Handel, S. Bach, and Friedemann, all of whom furnished specimens for Herr Pauer's illustrations. In the second part we had E. Bach, Clementi, Mozart, Beethoven, Hummel, Liszt and Thalberg. It is needless to say that all the illustrations, which are too numerous for specification, were given by Herr Pauer with his usual careful and artistic style of playing. As he merely was a mediate the audience were mostly composed of ladies.—Orchestra, Nov. 30.

Burnt Up.—A cable despatch brings intelligence of the destruction by fire of Her Majesty's Theatre, the largest in London and one of the largest in the world. There are many traditions and recollections attached to this house that is [illegible], meaning [illegible] house the first home of ballet and opera in London, where that class of entertainment was introduced and sustained by the exclusive English aristocracy. It was the scene of the early triumphs of the greatest artists that ever lived: Pasta, Malibran, Rubini, Tamburini, Viardot Garcia, Lablache, Grisi, and Mario, Jenny Lind, and Lucca of Trieste, Piccolomini, and the [illegible] Grisi (English) and the very week of the reception vouchsafed to the very best woman of America's prima donnas, Miss Kellogg. Besides these great singers, [illegible] opera, all the most famous dancers have graced its boards in the days when the ballet was an institution in London—Fanny Elssler, Taglioni, Cerito, Carlotta Grisi and many others, who [illegible] was the only house in England where ballet was ever made popular. The early directors, men of great wealth, wrecked many a fortune in trying to hold up Italian opera in London, and its later ones without exception failed to achieve any pecuniary success. The loss will be greatly deplored by the aristocratic and pleasure-loving community of Europe.

Her Majesty's Theatre had a seating capacity of three thousand persons. The lessee of the establishment was Mr. Mapleson, who had for many several seasons past conducted Italian opera in opposition to Mr. Gye at Covent Garden. It was at the latter not at Her Majesty's that Miss Kellogg made her début last month, the season being an opera one, terminated by the rising of the Abyssinian Parliament. Mr. Mapleson has suffered a heavy loss through the destruction of his fine wardrobe, catalogue of music and scenery. The disaster is all the more untimely for him, since the last season had created a large deficiency which he had hoped, through the Kellogg furore to repair.

It is not impossible that Miss Kellogg's contract will now be transferred to the Covent Garden (Royal Italian) opera.

The destruction of Her Majesty's Theatre must seriously affect the gay world in London, unless Mr. Gye shall determine to occupy the gap at once, by instituting a campaign for which he had made no preparation.

Paris.

The Orphéon.—In the correspondence of the Orchestra, November 28, we have the following account of this important institution for the cultivation and refinement of the French people.

The Orphéon furnishes to the youth of the Communal school instruction in the elements of singing, and by making them acquainted with the beauties of the best poetry, and revealing to them the principal laws of harmony, cultivates the ear and teaches them to speak that language with a pianoforte [illegible]. There they acquire the taste for elevating recreations and learn above all, how from the union of voices may spring the union of hearts. For at the Orphéon all a mixed [illegible] together—masters and workmen, merchants and soldiers, rich and poor, peasants and citizens;—all liberal minds are interested in this useful institution, so yet hardly thirty years old. It is after the Liedertafels of Germany and Switzerland that the Orphéon has been modelled. The first German Liedertafel was founded at Berlin in 1809 by the musician Zelter assisted by Goethe, and so after post [illegible] Bocquillon Wilhem contributed to the success of the Orphéon by proposing M. Wilhem as singing master in the schools of mutual instruction when in October 1819 the study of music was introduced into them. It was not until 1835, however, that the municipal council of Paris decided the introduction of singing into the Communal schools. Three years later singing was regularly taught in all the schools, and there remained the workmen's men, both at Paris and in the departments. At the suggestion and under the eye of William M. Hubert, an excellent professor, opened in 1835, in the Rue Montpellier a course of vocal music for working people, and the pupils of these evening schools were at [illegible] the end of a few months as may be shown. This first success led to the opening of similar schools in the Halle aux Draps, the Rue de Fleurus, the Rue d'Angoulême and elsewhere; and to-day, according to official documents there are in France 3,243 choral societies numbering 147,500 singers. The Orphéon kept has an inexpensive hundreds of young and bass voices to reinforce and complete the [illegible] of the Communal schools. The more the public performances were multiplied, the more clearly manifest became the interest felt in the cause of the Orphéon. In 1841 the Parisians were first discharged by B. Wilhem, and afterwards by M. Hubert, devolved upon the distinguished composer, M. Ch. Gounod. This eminent musician kept [illegible] his resignation in 1860; and the Orphéon, continually growing in prosperity, was then divided into two sections: that of the left bank of the Seine under the direction of M. François Bazin, and that of the right under M. Jules Pasdeloup. M. Hubert was again made inspector of the Communal schools on the right bank and M. [illegible] on the left. Such is in brief the history of the establishment and progress of the Orphéon. Every Thursday evening the adult pupils receive a lesson from their directors, and every Sunday afternoon adults and children meet together to repeat the choruses. The division under the charge of M. F. Bazin meets at the Sorbonne, and the division of the right bank of the Seine has hitherto met in the hall of the Grand Orient Rue Cadet, but will soon be obliged to move. Every spring there is a grand festival of progress made, at which 1200 chosen pupils sing, before the Prefect of the Seine and the superintending committee, the new pieces which they have learned. Their repertoire is very rich for our best composers take pleasure in adding to it every day. Adolphe Adam, Halévy, M. Ambroise Thomas, Félicien David, Ch. Gounod, Fr. Bazin and other masters have furnished it with choral compositions. Thanks to their directors, the Orphéonists each year learn Pergolesi and Lesueur, Handel and Rameau, Gluck and Mendelssohn, Grétry and Weber, Mozart and Schubert, the old masters and the new, the classical and the romantic school.

VIENNA.—If any man living has a right to quote, in reference to himself, Virgil's well-known lines commencing that man is Sig. Salvi, as manager of the Imperial Opera-house, Vienna. For months did he devote all his energies to [illegible] the getting up, in grandiose style, of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis;" for months did the music [illegible] and [illegible] was [illegible] to aid in carrying out Signor Salvi's purpose; but first one obstacle cropped up, and then another the upshot being that Sig. Salvi retired from the management without realizing the purpose after all. This was annoying enough, but how much more galling must be, [illegible] all the trouble and vexations of Sig. Salvi—about one of the most ill-used managers who had ever to battle with the caprices of prima donne, and the [illegible] of [illegible] in Vienna—have gone to augment the fame of Sig. Salvi's successor in the managerial throne, Dr. Dingelstedt, who has just produced the opera in question, with all his predecessor's splendid [illegible] scenery, dresses and decorations. The revival met with a most warm and cordial reception. In the bills Dr. Dingelstedt introduced a [illegible] novelty. This was a short historical summary of the work. In this summary he informs the public that "Iphigenia in Aulis" was first produced in Paris on the 19th April, 1774, at Vienna (in a German translation) on the 21st December 1808, and in Berlin on the 26th December 1809. "Till the other day, it had not been performed in Vienna since the 20th of March, 1816. It may, perhaps, interest the readers of the Musical World to know that the following was the cast at this period of its first [illegible] in the Austrian capital: Agamemnon, Herr Vogel; Clytemnestra, Mad. Milder; Iphigenia, Mlle. Laucher; Achilles, Herr Radichi, and Calchas, Herr Saal. On the present occasion, Herr Beck was Agamemnon; Mlle. Bettelheim, Iphigenia; Mad. Dustmann, Clytemnestra; Herr Walter, Achilles; and Herr Draxler, Calchas. On the first night Herr Walter was suddenly indisposed, and unable to do justice to his part or to himself; but he came out very well at the second performance. The other characters were satisfactorily supported, except that of Iphigenia herself. Mlle Benza is admirable in [illegible], but wants everything calculated to achieve success in lyric tragedy. By the way, there is a report that Gluck is the composer chosen to inaugurate the new Opera house; the Emperor having ordered that his spectacle opera, Armida, shall be performed at the opening. Mozart's Zauberflöte has been given with Mlle. Siegstädt as Papageno. This young lady has long been a favorite in small parts, and has now proved herself capable of satisfactorily undertaking more important ones. Not so successful was Mlle. Wilde from the Dresden Grand Theatre, who appeared as the Page in Les Huguenots. She was a decided failure. Mr. Adams did not display much feeling as Raoul, though he sang the music respectably. But when is the part of the gallant Protestant gentleman fairly filled [illegible]? Herr Erl recently recalled his reputation in the [illegible] of Marcello, [illegible], in Salome. In Verdi's Trovatore, Herr Ferenczy made his re-appearance after an absence of several months. As far as was possible to judge from one performance his voice appears to have recovered its strength and quality; but whether his recovery is permanent is another thing. Throat diseases are not so easily cured. However, let us hope that in this instance the surgeons have really done what is deserving of good. It was said some time since that the manager of the Imperial Opera-house—whether Dr. Dingelstedt or his predecessor, Sig. Salvi, the writer will not undertake to decide—had consented to produce Max Bruch's Loreley—on condition that Herr Bruch would accompany it with the well-known finale of Mendelssohn's (of course, only [illegible]). Whether Herr Bruch refused compliance, or the manager changed his mind, I do not know; but the probabilities are that Herr Bruch's "Loreley" will soon be brought out at the Imperial Opera-house.

"Tu ne cede malis sed contra audentior ito,"

Not long ago, Herr Esser discovered in the [illegible] of the Burgtheater, of which he is a [illegible], [illegible] of old scores. He was informed that they had been lying there many, many years. Glancing with the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible], that he had to [illegible] more and more [illegible]. Dr. Duruda, Herr Knapp, [illegible] to Herr Esser the Capellmeister at the Imperial Opera-house. Herr Esser immediately set about examining the [illegible] collection. Almost the scores were those of the repertory of [illegible] operas by [illegible], Paesiello, Méhul, D'Alayrac, [illegible], Salieri, [illegible], Mozart, and Cimarosa, which used to be given at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. On enquiry it turned out that they had formerly been used there, and when the theatre was let on lease, and ceased to be a government establishment, the scores, as Imperial property, were sent for safe keeping to the Burgtheater.

Great efforts have been made lately at the Theatre an der Wien to restore what is here called "Spieloper," and in London "comic opera." In the place it once occupied in the estimation of the Viennese. The work chosen to inaugurate the experiment was Der Teufels Antheil—"La Part du Diable." Mlle. Colbridge was a charming Carlo Broschi. Herr Theodore Formes, however, was anything but a thorough Raphael. It must be confessed that he acts well; nevertheless in singing, alas, he is nothing to speak of, and Herr Formes has entirely lost his voice. If nothing else has failed to convince the audience the manager might not have found some artist more fitted for the part without expressly engaging Herr Theodore Formes, at a high salary to perform it. Herr Formes appears to have felt this; I find he was not a success, for he was conscious that Herr Ziemeler, the manager, considered the engagement on payment of no more than 250 florins.

The manager, Herr Kinz and the prima donna, Mlle. Marianne Pasqualini, having at length patched up their quarrels, the Harmonie-Theatre re-opened its doors with "Die drei Küsse des Teufels," a new operetta by Offenbach; "Karoline, oder ein Lied vom Golf von Neapel," by [illegible]; and "Ein Kuss" by H. Wardl. "Die drei Küsse," one of Offenbach's earliest efforts, was very favorably received. Herr Kinz conducted in person, and was warmly greeted on making his appearance in the orchestra.

The concert season bids fair to be a brilliant one. Herr Joachim will not long be here, and a host of minor celebrities, also have announced their intention of favoring the inhabitants of this capital. Mlle. Anna Rubinstein [illegible] who was known to the Viennese a quarter of a century ago as an "infant prodigy," began the campaign by a concert in the hall of the Musikverein. The programme was, naturally, of Anton Rubinstein, Rubinstein. There was Rubinstein's fourth Concerto and [illegible], in its original, and there were songs by Rubinstein, and last not least, there was a [illegible] account of [illegible] played by Rubinstein. The orchestra of the [illegible] Conservatory performed, also, in the first concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, when he conducted Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, [illegible] "Don Juan" Parade. In the latter he achieved anything but a triumph. The concert was more than usually interesting, from the fact of Herr Herbeck's re-appearance in the capacity of conductor. At the conclusion Herr Herbeck received quite an ovation from the audience.

LEIPSIC.—The following pieces were performed in the 8th Gewandhaus Concert:—Overture to "The Hebrides" and finale from "Loreley," Mendelssohn (Loreley, Mlle. Magnus, from Vienna); Turkish March, Dervish Chorus and Solemn March and Chorus from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; three songs from "Frauen Liebe und Leben," Schumann; and C major Symphony, Schubert.—Herr Ritter has given two concerts which were extremely successful.

COLOGNE.—On the 13th instant, at the Conservatoire, we had the great honor of a Royal visit, the very first ever since our foundation. Her Majesty the Queen of Prussia, accompanied by their R.H. the Grand Duchess of Baden, the Princess William of Baden, the Duke of Weimar and Baden, came expressly from Coblenz to visit this very best musical academy in Germany. Some Choruses in female voices by F. Hiller, as well as some Solos, were beautifully rendered by Mme. Marchesi's pupils, and obtained the high approbation of the Royal party. Another, the delicate splendid voice and talent, an American young lady, Miss Sterling, of extraordinary Contralto, produced a very great sensation on the occasion. A declamation and some choir and pianoforte productions alternated with the singing of the ladies. Her Majesty the Queen as well as her Royal suite, addressed repeated the most flattering compliments to Madame Marchesi as well as to Herr Ferdinand Hiller the celebrated director of the Conservatoire. At the end of the Concert Dr. Hiller had the honor to introduce all the different professors of the establishment to Her Majesty the Queen.

The second Gürzenich Concert brought out the Kyrie of Ritter's [illegible]. The performance was excellent on the part of the orchestra and chorus, and so was the song with band. Herr [illegible] from Frankfort, Frau Pauline-Lucca (from Darmstadt), Soprano, and Fräulein Kaiser (from Minden) Contralto. The first quartet, one which took place on the 13th instant was a very brilliant one in regard to the quality of the programme as well as to the execution of it. The third Gürzenich Concert was highly interesting. The first part of the programme included selections from Gluck's operas and Chopin's compositions; the second part was exclusively dedicated to Schubert's compositions. A pianist from Stuttgart, Fräulein Mehlig, scored a very great and true success. A new pupil of our Conservatoire, Fräulein Erdinger, came out for the first time in this Concert, and was triumphantly received by the crowded audience. She met with a great success in singing the air with female chorus from the Iphigenia of Gluck as well as the delivering two Lieder of Schubert. Her voice, a pure Soprano, is very strong yet her art is appropriate to her appearance is charming and her method a very pure one.

AMSTERDAM.—The first grand concert of the season the Cäcilia, which was on Thursday evening last in our municipal Theatre. The programme was accordingly well selected and included the following ensemble:—1. Overture, Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt (Mendelssohn); 2. Symphony in G (Haydn); 3. Overture, Michel Angelo (Gade). Just three of performances at these concerts. 4. Symphony No. 3, Eroica (Beethoven); 5. Overture, Der Freischütz (Weber). Seldom have I witnessed such admirable performances as this one. There was, so to speak, one spirit animating the whole ensemble from beginning to end; every piece was played with extreme regularity, brilliancy and firmness. It really constituted the very highest pitch attainable in perfect orchestral execution the pieces chosen with perfection.

This superiority of the Cäcilia band is chiefly due to Mr. Verhulst's untiring efforts in strongly his severity. Fancy that when the last concert took place, only this year they learned at 9 began studying the different pieces of Thursday's programme. First there was one rehearsal every week. It soon increased to three. In the last week, however, there was a rehearsal every day regularly at eight o'clock in the morning. Here a penalty has been enforced on absentees who, though the band be very numerous, never escaped the watchful eye of the conductor. So it is practised year after year, and I have no doubt that the immense reputation of the Cäcilia is principally owing to this rigid drill. The sweet Meeresstille and Haydn's great symphony were of course listened to with eagerness. There was certainly also much interest in the new overture, Michel Angelo, by Gade. Verhulst likes Gade and Gade likes Verhulst. It is mutual affection in consequence of their being both pupils of the same master—of Mendelssohn Bartholdy! Very likely Niels Gade is virtually the only living composer whose works are seen taken [illegible] introduced at the Cäcilia. Our conductor, not better, has such strange fancies, they say, become [illegible]. I do not see why Schumann and Wagner above all should not be heard if Gade is almost every year played. Schumann, for instance, though that [illegible] names is always considered one, taking the word in its old classical sense. The Michel Angelo overture is a fine piece of music. I prefer it to Hamlet, which is in my humble opinion weak and vague. Curious difference between the two overtures. Hamlet, being an exclusively Danish subject, is not so Danish as Michel Angelo, an entirely Italian one. The music of the latter composition reminds one, as it did more of Thor and Thorwald, than that of the Florentine Titanic. It is thoroughly Northern in its expression, a sacred Italian, but à la Italian. The performance of Beethoven's immortal Eroica, the most beautiful piece of music that was ever conceived perhaps, delighted us all through its marvellous regularity. The familiar and magnificent overture, Freischütz, closed this highly successful concert in a very satisfactory manner. The theatre was crammed, no empty seats being left. The net receipts of the evening amounted to about £200.—Our London Orchestra, Nov. 26th.

Musical Correspondence

NEW YORK, DEC. 9.—The second of Theo. Thomas's Symphony Soirées took place at Steinway Hall on Saturday evening, Dec. 7th. The orchestra numbered 80, and Leopold De Meyer was the soloist. The programme was as follows:—

Symphony No. 2, D major	Haydn
Piano Solo, Schubert's Serenade, transcribed and played by Leopold de Meyer
Overture, C, op. 124, "Consecration of the House."
Piano Solo, a. Nocturne, E flat	Beethoven.
b. Ballade & [illegible]	Chopin.
	Liszt.
2d Symphony E flat, op. 97	Schumann.

The Haydn Symphony was charming in its noble simplicity: the last movement, a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] theme in [illegible] [illegible] was given with great verve by Mr. Thomas's well-trained orchestra, as was also the Minuetto and its beautiful Trio in B flat major.

The Beethoven Overture offered a marked contrast to the first work on the programme: massive, grand and full of rich harmony; it was "solid food." The [illegible] passage at [illegible] was given with great spirit and the different [illegible] were clearly and distinctly defined.

The Schumann Symphony is a most attractive work, full of ideas and rich in subtle harmonies. The 2d and 3d movements are especially attractive: the former a delightful Scherzo in C major—is very winning. In the [illegible] phrase, where the pedal point remains persistently and resolutely on C, while the upper harmony moves through that and the other major keys, the pathetic, appealing character is very noticeable.

In the 3d movement (marked molto adagio and really an andante con moto) a peculiarly [illegible] effect is produced by the setting off [illegible] [illegible] of two beautiful themes, the one against the other, by the string and wind orchestras. The whole movement is full of quiet and peace.

With regard to Mr. De Meyer's performance it becomes the duty of a faithful critic to utter a few [illegible] [illegible] but necessary truths. It would be far better [illegible] [illegible] concert that gentlemen should play music of a classical character. His selections could scarcely be [illegible] by [illegible] name, with the exception of the Chopin Nocturne, and that was rendered outright [illegible] the [illegible] of Bravura and [illegible] brilliancy which were thoroughly meretricious and [illegible] foreign to the Chopin spirit. It may perhaps be superfluous to remark that it is useless for Mr. De Meyer to attempt to improve upon the [illegible] of the author just mentioned; any such attempt was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to hear Chopin [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and not somebody else. Mr. De M.'s encore also, was of a [illegible] character; the second [illegible] [illegible] apparently an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] polka.

It is well that Mr. Thomas, with a most praiseworthy desire to please large [illegible], should engage an artist whom the musical world has acknowledged as such, but it is also well that the character of such concerts as the Symphony Soirées should be [illegible] by [illegible] performances as those which I have mentioned. It is safe to say that such a [illegible] would not have been allowed in Vienna or London, [illegible] [illegible] would [illegible] have been encouraged there.

The audience, although not so large as could be wished was an attentive and an appreciative one. The applause, however, was too indiscriminately bestowed, an error only too common with an American audience.

NEW YORK, DEC. 5.—Mr. F. L. Harrison began the series of his Oratorios, previously announced, by giving on Thanksgiving evening Haydn's "Creation," with chorus by the N. Y. Harmonic Society and with Miss Brainerd, and Messrs. Simpson and Thomas for soloists.

This is the least interesting of Haydn's two Oratorios, and it is difficult to imagine anything more barren and dead than the text, which is from Thomson, with all the poetry eliminated. Yet being Haydn's, the music cannot fail of being always fresh, sunny and beautiful, [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] and green banks [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] innocent sadness [illegible] that of Haydn himself. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] upon our [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] years, and we know that, to him, the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] must have sounded faintly and afar. And as we [illegible] and [illegible] at [illegible] [illegible] it is hard to realize that the same hand which penned these pretty scenes produced those sublime choruses, "Let there be light," and "The Heavens are telling."

Mr. Harrison was conductor and leader of orchestra, and the performance was a very successful one.

Next on the list we have Handel's "Samson," which will be given on the [illegible] of December, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to hear the "Samson," we judge that Mr. Harrison's enterprise will be warmly supported.

The next Sunday evening concert (Dec. [illegible]) witnessed the début of a new prima donna, Miss Jenny Busk, whom we might [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] German [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in a mighty [illegible] aria from "The Magic Flute." She is however we are told, a native of Baltimore, and has recently returned from Europe, where she has been studying. Her voice is a pure soprano of excellent quality with a freshness and flexibility which give promise of even more than she accomplished. Such faults of style as were discernible might easily be traced to a nervousness which [illegible] an occasion was natural enough, and her reception was a [illegible] flattering one. But for the Mozart aria, she sang the waltz from Romeo and the difficult, because insipid ballad, "Coming thro' the Rye."

De Meyer acquitted with the piano, after his inimitable, [illegible] [illegible] but delightful fashion, playing of course his own compositions, and in response to an encore, taking a theme from the "Elisire" of [illegible] which he worked out in a very fanciful and brilliant manner.

Carl Bose played the Erard Klopfe, and Mr. [illegible] field, at the organ, gave selections from Mendelssohn's Sonatas.

And now a word apropos of Sunday Concerts. We do not side with those who, having no [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] as a means of amusement, would close the doors of the concert room on the Sabbath. On the contrary we know that there is more of good in a Sonata of Haydn's or a song of Mendelssohn's, rightly understood, than in a score of sermons. We [illegible] also that all good music is, in a certain sense, sacred; but we wish to see all that belongs to the ball-room and all characterless piano-forte jugglery banished from the concert hall on the Sabbath, if at no other time. There is now too much of [illegible] in this respect.

NEW YORK, DEC. 18.—The second Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert occurred on Saturday evening, Dec. 15th, [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the air and the [illegible] [illegible] condition of the streets, the audience was a large one, and the cheerful-looking Academy of Music was filled with the beauty and fashion of the City of Churches. I append the programme:

2d Symphony, C major	Schumann
Overture, Fra Diavolo	[illegible]
Miss Pauline [illegible] [illegible]
Violin Concerto, op. [illegible] [illegible]	Vieuxtemps
Mme. [illegible] [illegible]
[illegible] from unfinished Symphony in B minor, [illegible]	Schubert
Romance [illegible] "[illegible]"	[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] Mme. Urso
Poëme Symphonique, "Les Préludes"	Liszt

In the Symphony we see the most admirable [illegible] of Schumann's genius. I shall reserve for a future occasion an elaborate analysis of this work, as I have only space in this letter to particularize the 3d movement. I can but feebly attempt to describe the [illegible] with which the serene and lovely theme is taken (in one passage) now by the clarinet, now by the [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], when it [illegible] into a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the lower instruments gradually [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] while softly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the theme, the violins [illegible] [illegible] finally dropping down through intermediate [illegible] to E flat, and then [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. At the close of the movement we have two themes—or rather fragments of the first—the lower one taken by the contrabassi and sinking down down into unfathomable depths. It is a complete and perfect poem.

The performance of the Symphony was in general satisfactory. There was, however, in the movement just mentioned, a certain thickness in the high notes on the part of the violins.

In the two movements of Schubert's posthumous Symphony are plainly discernible traces of the genius which conceived the glorious work in C, a [illegible] of which Schumann said "and wrote such noble and worthy things." The 2d movement (of the former) in E major is quite Mendelssohnian in spirit and treatment.

Liszt's "Préludes" were doubtless interesting to those who can endure the orchestral works of that author.

Mme. Urso played with that admirable purity of tone and delicacy of touch for which that artist is so justly celebrated. And she is a stranger here there would absolutely be nothing to be desired. In the accuracy of her execution she is second only to Joachim. The Concerto is a work of mediocre ability, noticeable only for abstruse harmonic changes, conditions, like treatment and paucity of ideas.

Miss Hirn sang badly. Her voice is hard and unsympathetic, and her method faulty. We would suggest to her that shouting is not taste, nor is it necessary to hand upon particular notes with such hammer like force.

The harmonic of the programme is somewhat anomalous. It is evident that the standard of the Brooklyn Society [illegible] below that of the New York one. The former is, however, a younger institution, and one must not expect too much of [illegible] while in a time of growth.

BOSTON, DEC. 31, 185[illegible]

Symphony Concerts.

The third of the series (Dec. [illegible]) appeared to interest the audience as much as any of its predecessors, although neither of the two Symphonies was a [illegible] great one. Such an audience is in itself almost as harmonizing and inspiring as the music; indeed with the one exception, perhaps of that to which Mr. Dresel [illegible], these Symphony audiences in character are about the best large audiences found anywhere. Better listeners to the best we never knew. It is not their fault that a few restless exceptional ones disturb their enjoyment by coming in late or going out early. The orchestra still shows a better spirit and new signs of improvement. Never before has it been in so good a condition to make the following programme thoroughly appreciated.

Overture to "Genoveva"	Schumann
Aria, "[illegible]," from "La Clemenza di Tito"	Mozart
Mrs. Jenny Kempton
Symphony No. 4, in B flat	Gade
Symphony in D	Haydn
Songs: 1. "Widmung," ("The Water [illegible]")	Schumann.
2. "Hunting Song"	Mendelssohn.
Mrs. Jenny Kempton
Overture to "Euryanthe"	Weber

The novelties were the two light but very pleasing Symphonies. Particularly charming was the one by Haydn, which is not found in the usual set of twelve composed for Salomon in London, and which we suspect was never played before in this country. It is a delightful Symphony, so bright and gay and full of frolic and imaginative humor in the quick movements, so deep and sweet and tender, at once serene and solemn, in the beautiful Largo (perhaps some of the full-more recognized in its theme an old psalm tune of their younger days, which "Music-of-Nature" Gardiner had clipped out of it, and which in the early editions of the Handel and Haydn Collection went, if we remember rightly, by the name of "Milton"). The theme of the first Allegro is a short, almost trivial little phrase in itself, but it is worked up most felicitously, dancing like a sunbeam all about the walls. The third movement is a most genuine Minuet, as distinguished from the modern Scherzo; and the Trio, with its quaint and subtle play of melody, upon a drone bass is [illegible] tickles the ear and fancy as the play of opaline colors does the eye. But the most humorous of all is the Finale, the subject of which is homely enough for a contra-dance (a country dance, if you will); but then the dancers are so fine, there is so much life and wit and genius, so much contrast of character such a wealth of good spirits, such quick invention, quick perception of everything that can be pressed into the service, all in motion to the homely tune;—in other words it is so artistically worked up, with all the arts of imitation, illustration, contrast of instrumental colors, that it seems to swarm with happy thoughts. Haydn is not so great or deep like Beethoven; his forms, his orchestra, are small compared with the more modern Symphonists; but our musical public began with Beethoven, and know him now so well that it is high time we supplied the blank in our education and made ourselves familiar with those perfect models of the symphonic art as such, the Symphonies of Father Haydn. They are so wholesome and refreshing! And why must we always crave a greater excitement? It is a good thing to be children when we can. Now this is drinking child-like joy from goblets that are masterworks of Art.

Gade's Fourth Symphony is not at all comparable for genius and originality to the first, the well-known one in C minor. It has the charm of the same wild Northern mood, the same images and snatches of old song, and tradition haunt the suggestion; and the style of workmanship is the same. But it is a feebler effort of creation; a vain attempt to say something new out of a remembered inspiration. The only strikingly original thing in it is the Scherzo. Yet all the movements are beautiful, particularly the Andante, and the whole a very pleasing thing to listen to for a first time. It was no fault of Mr. Zerrahn and the Orchestra if it was not highly enjoyed, for it was nicely rendered, as was the Haydn after it.

The great things of the programme were the two Overtures, both of which were played for the third season in these Concerts. They were better played, and their power and beauty more deeply felt, than ever before,—although the noise of late comers blurred the Genoveva picture for not a few.

Mrs. KEMPTON sang the great Aria from Titus with taste and feeling, in a large and noble style, and the delicious orchestral accompaniment was a charm. The florid "Ai [illegible]" running all through her power [illegible] tone and for the beautiful tone and style in which it was played. The smaller songs were choice and very nicely sung to Mr. Dresel's accompaniment.

An interval of four weeks occurs before the sixth Concert (Jan. 16) of which the main features will be the great C major Symphony by Schubert; a Schubert Overture,—other than to "Fierabras," or one not yet heard to "Alfonso and Estrella"; and the King of Beethoven's Piano Concertos in C, played by Mr. B. J. Lang,—the best one of the five which yet remains unheard in these Concerts.

Italian Opera.

Italian Opera, as managed in this country, is not an improving institution. We had the best of it, that we seem likely ever to get, years ago. From year to year, as a rule, it all the time grows worse. The only thing that is learned by so much experience seems to be, not how to do it better, but how to do it cheaper; how to make what is third-rate pass with a sufficient number of paying people for first-rate; for if the real connoisseurs, if the cultivated and refined become indifferent to it, there is always a fresh public, of would-be fashionables, anxious to be [illegible] who have a notion that it is "the thing" and of course [illegible]. It does not improve and therefore must deteriorate, because it is not an Institute but it is a together to be[illegible] speculation,—so that advertisement has as much to do with its success as Art.

This is only general comment on the most and ordinary of Opera in this country. It is not saying that it never offers us anything good. Of course there must be something of real excellence on which to base an appeal even to an ignorant public and the knowing ones must be to some extent conciliated —how to do that the most economically is the managerial problem.

The company at Selwyn's beautiful Theatre these two weeks past, has at any rate given a much better representation of Don Giovanni and of Il Barbiere, than we have had for a long time. Indeed in most respects, the Don Giovanni was capital. Mme. PAREPA ROSA's [illegible] of voice with her consummate vocal art, as well as her dramatic verve and well-sustained, consistent action, made one of the most effective Donna Annas that we have ever known. The wonderful music and pathos of the first scene told for the first time a great for what it is worth. In the great recitative and aria Or sai chi l'onore, she rose to thrilling heights of lyric declamation, and the "Letter" Aria (Non mi dir) was most nobly beautifully rendered. She is always in the [illegible] quality than many singers in all she does seemed to pay due to the whole performance, so that all did their best.

Miss RANCH made a charmingly coquettish, girlish Zerlina, acting it to the life and singing very fairly; her bad her voice lost any of its fresh, true vibrating quality, as we thought it had in [illegible] a [illegible] sweet and ideal for her. Miss RONCONI a [illegible] Elvira sweetly and represented the part sensibly,—which seldom can be said of the Elviras. In her [illegible] with Leporello she sang her right. Her singing is feeble yet true and chaste; conveying finally the air to a passage is finely and sweetly, and the quality of the voice is sweet and sympathetic. But that really made a capital ? Don Juan. His somewhat baritone told in all points and [illegible] [illegible] but he spoke the simplicity, of the Serenade merely. RONCONI is better voice than last year, made an exceptional, lively Leporello of he make the finest and to the way with all of them; [illegible] for all the things that he is an artist. The orchestra, under BERGMANN, were [illegible] responsible, the choruses, scenery and all, [illegible] good, and there was more spirit than usual in the first finale (the [illegible]).

We were glad Mme. ROSA to touch as in Donna Anna, as one is wont to be. There she sang with the greatest life and ease and Rossini; and RONCONI's Figaro and ARMANDI's Rosina were so excellent that "The Barber" was enjoyed with a fresh zest. Sig. [illegible] a very excellent, as Almaviva he did what as Don Ottavio his voice is over the stage with feeling and has a [illegible] tenor [illegible] large and [illegible] a much [illegible].

Gounod's Romeo and Juliet, which we heard once, one less [illegible] that of the subject as we think. The opera as a whole is far less of his Faust, and of Shakespeare. Musically it has fine passages, [illegible] points of instrumentation but [illegible] not many, [illegible] more than a time. Every one felt the familiar likeness with the Faust music; it is more [illegible] so. Correspondingly, [illegible] correspondingly, results and [illegible], the best [illegible] the Garden Scene in Faust again, but never good as that; the pretty Romance of the Page answers to Siebel's song. Juliet's song of [illegible] joy in the first scene, a waltz, later in bearing an Gretchen's Jewel Air. Mercutio's Queen

Mab song, so order follows with all the fantastical strokings, hardly known, in the orchestra, answers to Mephisto's drinking song; the fight in the third act, is that in Faust, but with strong suggestions of the Huguenots. Perhaps the most original and happy thought of all is the Overture with the chanted Prologue by all the dramatic persons as tableaux vivants. —But these are mere impressions. The performance was fair. Sig. PANCANI, a big and burly man for a Romeo, has a tenor of good volume and sweetness, and sang with delicate and sincere expression. The Juliet was rather too doll-like.

Mme. ROSA has also sung in Il Trovatore and Norma; and there have been indifferent performances of Lucrezia Borgia, Crispino and Ernani. Another company [illegible] "[illegible]" are [illegible] heard. The audiences were small with [illegible].

Pianos at the Exposition.

We have not meddled much in the great controversy [illegible], doubtless with nearly all our readers finding the newspapers full of it and nauseam, we long ago had ceased to read. Moreover with most musical persons hereabouts, we have come to our own opinions in our own way through the judging for ourselves, and should prefer the average of Chickering pianos to any Steinway, that we ever heard, in spite of French Jury or Marie Fêtes or the Emperor himself. We never thought they needed any such endorsement. Merit makes its own way, with or without medals. Indeed the medal competition at great Expositions rises up so incessant by so many questionable means makes such a senseless attempt such a thing, that calm, unbiassed judgment becomes almost impossible. How can one get a clear impression in such a turbulent arena? Anywhere else, in the concert rooms of any city most at home in his own house can one judge better than in circumstances so exceptional! We wish the Emperor should his ambition ever prompt him to give another World's Exposition, would have it absolutely without medals or awards: the comparison of products would be equally instructive, and the countenance far more genuine.

But here has been a question of fact. Which party had the highest awards. Touching which we once reasoned, having got hold of a document not then published in this country, the "Liste Officielle des Récompenses," &c., to suggest an inference from it which now appears to be the right one. In our paper of Aug. 17 we translated a portion of the List, adding this comment:

It will be seen from the above that the Decorations are classed as the highest grade of honor, next comes the Grand Prize awarded only to M. Sax, and third, a grade to the Grand Medal. The pianomaking house of Erard is excluded itself out of the competition by the fact that one of its members (M. Schaeffer) was on the Jury; but on this gentleman, as well as on Mr. Chickering was bestowed the Cross of the Legion of Honor, why, if not by way of recognizing these two as at the head of all the makers of Pianos! The French have long regarded the Erard as the Grand Piano of all the world; good compensation, this to now them welcome the Chickering to an equal place beside the object of their own pride.

That this obvious interpretation was the right one is now definitely settled by the following:

PARIS, Nov. 27, 1867.

LETTER FROM MR. C. F. CHICKERING. My attention has several times been called to paragraphs and comments in American Journals setting that the Decoration of the Legion of Honor which was conferred upon me on the 1st of July, last, as the representative of the firm of Chickering & Sons, is an award from the Emperor and favorable [illegible] a more personal compliment;" that I "had bought it;" that "it had nothing to do with the Exposition;" that "the order had been obtained by Mr. F. Chickering, who had made it personally, and upon personal application for the same, from the French Government;" that it was a personal matter outside of and without the slightest connection with the official awards of the Exposition; that "I did not receive it till several days after the 1st of July;" and many other remarks of the same nature.

Knowing [illegible] well the source from which these erroneous [illegible], and at the form with official proofs had already been published, I had up to this time considered it unnecessary to make any denial of these reports; but, as I find that such statements are still being persistently [illegible] and reproduced, I feel it a duty to myself and to the interests of the firm of which I am a member to make a positive denial of all such statements, which are evidently [illegible] and published for the sole purpose of giving [illegible] a false and [illegible] value to the opinion of the American public, and in opinion this denial I beg leave to call attention to the following facts:

I never in any manner either directly or indirectly asked for, nor did I ever use any influence, personal or otherwise, to obtain that high distinction.

My official notification of the award [illegible] June 30, 1867, and [illegible] by me on the 1st of July [illegible] with the official names of the Exposition, can be understood from the following extract from the official organ of the French Empire, Le Moniteur of July 2, 1867, which, on the list of awards under the head of "Chevaliers of the Legion of Honor," places, among other names, that of Monsieur Chickering, Facteur de Pianos [illegible], and in order to show how he was [illegible] following extract of the report of Mons. Rouher, French Minister of State and Vice-President of the Imperial Commission, read before the Emperor and the Public, at the distribution of awards on the 1st of July:

"Thanks to an act by which had [illegible] all [illegible] the decorations [illegible] for the Jury for the first of July are all rendered, and the results can be proclaimed to-day before your Majesty. The jury has [illegible] the [illegible] grand prizes, 883 gold medals, 3653 silver medals, 6565 bronze medals, 5801 honorable mentions.

"The present ceremony is crowned by the proclamation of still higher rewards.

Your Majesty has deigned to award to the [illegible] of the exhibitors of this pacific battle "The Imperial Cross of the Legion of Honor."

It may be that the friends and correspondents who wish to the interests of other exhibitors who did not receive this award, deny [illegible] of the value of the different recompenses than to those who [illegible] [illegible] from the [illegible] and government of the Exposition; but while I have the power to [illegible] Sons and [illegible] found [illegible] the [illegible] I shall continue to claim and to maintain [illegible] have already done that the Cross of the Legion of Honor was the "Highest Award" awarded by the Exposition Universelle," and that Chickering & Sons are the only Competing Exhibitors of Pianos who have received the double recompense of the "Cross of the Legion of Honor" and a First Gold Medal.

[Signed] C. F. CHICKERING.

THE PIANOS. Conclusive Proof of the Highest Award to Chickering & Sons. The following letters have just been received from Paris by Messrs. Chickering & Sons, which [illegible] that the Gold Medal at the Paris Exhibition [illegible] and the Cross of the Legion of Honor was awarded by a higher power, than the Jury, viz: by the Emperor, [illegible] the superior merit of the Chickering Pianos.

[Translation.]

Mr. Chickering:

My [illegible] cannot refuse to declare, as member of the Jury of the 10th Class, [illegible] by the [illegible] of [illegible] July [illegible].

That there is a [illegible] of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, but the Decoration of the Legion of Honor [illegible] a superior order, and that it had been awarded to you by the Emperor for the merit of your instruments

Accept my [illegible].

Member of the Jury of the 10th Class in the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.

Copy of letter from Ambroise Thomas and [illegible], Members of the Jury.

Gentlemen:

I wish all [illegible] on the Order in which the [illegible] [illegible] the 10th Class, the Gold Medal. In spite of [illegible] the First Medal. There are not two classes of Gold Medals.

Receive my salutations.

I am completely of the opinion of my confrère Member.

NEW HAVEN.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul was performed on the 14th ult. by the Mendelssohn Society, with the aid of some of our Boston singers, who no doubt deserve the compliment contained in the following notice from the Palladium:

The chorus numbering between eighty and ninety, sang the difficult music allotted to them with great steadiness. The first and second chorals were given with a good volume of sound, and the instrument as requisite for that species of composition. Their lovely [illegible], especially that of "To Thee, O Lord I yield my spirit," evidently deeply impressed those present. The very difficult chorus "Rise up, Arise! and Shine!" was sung with good precision and force, as was also that in the same part, "The Lord He is Good." The [illegible] choruses, so perfectly contrasted in style with the Jewish and Christian music, were also finely done. Mrs. H. M. Smith more than sustained the favor she had already won by her admirable singing at the previous concerts of the Mendelssohn. She was in excellent voice and she [illegible] the numerous recitatives which fell to her share with much dramatic force and effect, while her [illegible] the latter a rare quality. The beautiful aria "Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" was sung with [illegible] feeling and with a [illegible] which showed the conscientious artist. Mrs. Smith also took the contralto aria "But the Lord is mindful" and gave it with a rare depth of tone and beauty of expression. This is a [illegible] of which any singer might be proud. Mr. [illegible] very rendered the tenor music very [illegible]; the air "Be Thou Faithful" was given with great tenderness. Of his brother Mr. M. W. Whitney we have only to say that he was in superb voice, and throughout the whole of his difficult part showed himself an admirable artist. We were willing to make allowance for the orchestra, composed as it was so largely of members of the recently formed Philharmonic Society who have not as yet had slight opportunity of practising together. They however did [illegible] performing their part very [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] for the new society a successful career, and that the day is not distant when New Haven will have an orchestra of its own. Dr. Anderson led with his usual [illegible].

PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Wolfsohn has been solicited to repeat the series of Beethoven Matinées given in the season of 1862-63, and has engaged the Foyer of the Academy of Music for that purpose. A [illegible] will be given on alternate Fridays, commencing [illegible] 4th, and the course will end on May 1st.

The whole number of Sonatas composed for Piano Solo will be performed, and, during the series, songs of a character to correspond with the general style of those performances will be introduced.

WORCESTER MASS.—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony stirred "the heart of the Commonwealth," last Saturday evening. It was a new sensation and came in the "Grand Army Course of Entertainments." A small orchestra of 24 of the best Boston musicians, with Zerrahn for conductor, performed it to the great delight of all. The Second Part of the concert opened with the Overture to Der Freyschütz and closed with that to "La Sirène," by Auber, the intervening space being filled with songs, [illegible] violoncello solo, Strauss waltzes, &c.—The Lagrange-Brignoli Opera troupe performed Martha here last week, Miss McCulloch taking the place of Mme. Lagrange, who was ill.—The Mozart and Beethoven Choral Union announce the Messiah for Christmas night.

DEATH OF PACINI.—A dispatch dated yesterday at Florence, mentions the death of Giovanni Pacini, the Italian composer. His opera of Saffo, played some years ago here and in other American cities, is the only one by which he is well known here, during his long life he wrote thirty or forty operas, most of which had considerable success. Pacini was born at Syracuse, in Sicily, in 1796, but went to Rome in his youth; he became known as "Pacini di Roma." He studied composition at Bologna, under Marchesi and Mosca, and when 18 years old, produced an opera at Venice which succeeded. In after years he wrote operas for all the principal Italian theatres. Madame Pasta sang in his Niobe at the San Carlo in Naples in 1826, and that is considered one of his best works. In 1830 his Giovanna d'Arco was produced at La Scala with Rubini, Tamburini and Mme. Lalande in the principal parts, but it failed, and the failure so mortified and disgusted its author that he declined to write any more operas, and he lived in idle seclusion ever since. His style was modeled upon that of Rossini's earlier works and is more distinguished by graceful melody than by learning or originality. In addition to his operas, Pacini wrote a number of masses and other religious and secular works.—Bulletin Philadelphia.

Letters of Great Composers.

Letters of Distinguished Musicians. Gluck, Haydn, P. E. Bach, Weber, Mendelssohn. Translated from the German by Lady Wallace. (Longmans & Co.)

Mozart und Haydn in London. Von C. F. Pohl. (Vienna, Gerold; London, Williams & Norgate).

The first of these works is so pleasant a volume of light musical reading as has been lately laid before the public. It would serve no purpose again largely to descant on the peculiar art of Lady Wallace as a translator, since that there is small chance of their being amended. Her remaining, however, is to be recognized as having done much to rescue from a large body of largely [illegible] which are [illegible] be overlooked by those who love [illegible] the masters of a lovely art. But it will not be safe to quote from her pages without comparison with the originals, whenever the meaning is at all obscure.

While going through these letters again, we have been once struck by the credit done to them to a class of artists unjustly disparaged as dull and [illegible] and not such as mould a myth. The amount of industry and kindly feeling, the traces of keen observation they display, among musicians, is worthy of all attention, and may be fairly propounded to those poor layers of such are not to be found who have gone out as the defaming and receiving professors of Music as a pursuit. It would be as fair to decry the grave profession of Law because authentic Judges have sat in Courts where chancery had to be discussed,—as fanatical to demand that because intemperance largely abound on the land the wine should be taken from the hills. The world is becoming wiser in these matters than it used to be, and reflection, under incessant good sense, not but arrive, from the publication of these unpremeditated utterances, confirming the records of friendly intercourse. We are so glad that the cause we are advocating would be strengthened, could the correspondence be ransacked of musicians less distinguished than the five great men here grouped together.

Among these five Gluck is seen to the least advantage,—as a man pompous and self-engrossed, who met with small patience any opposition to the theories he propounded, theories, let it be added, of no such extraordinary novelty as he pretended, theories which he contradicted when he wrote with right royal nonchalance whenever it suited his views of effect so to do. It is possible, however, that Gluck was not precisely accountable for all that was written in his letters. In those relating to the famous Parisian controversy, he may have been helped by some of those eager paper-warriors who have been always busy in French green-rooms and French journalist secret chambers, [illegible] ready by to exaggerate to force facts, for the sake of brilliancy of sword and sneer. A tendency towards inflation is to be discerned in the declarations and rejoinders of Gluck. It may be urged that his humble origin, long struggle with life, and lastly, the overweening patronage of the ambitious Marie-Antoinette might explain, if not justify, his vain-glory when at last the gaze and the gold of the French public fastened themselves on him. But the honour of the second name-writer in this gallery shows that Gluck's haughtiness may not have been of circumstances so much as of character.

No one will close this volume without sensation of his love for the man Joseph Haydn. He was one, like Gluck, of humble origin and scanty education. His cheerful temperance and his unwearying industry are shown to have been as remarkable as his genius. His letters are delightful in their combined modesty and artlessness, as [illegible] up a picture of a state of society now happily lost for ever—and the patronized genius by no regards himself as an useful [illegible] life of content without enthusiasm as singularly as the lover of artists could desire to look on.

He made while a youngster a bad marriage with the daughter of the wig-maker Keller, and had to pay for its consequences all his life, in the form of incessant work. It is a showing to see how he could reconcile himself to a long, honourable service of the Prince Nicholas Esterhazy, for whose bar room he was required to produce a supply of pieces the number of which seems fabulous if there be no mistake in the figures; and how, when coming to his own, he could, in a most manly [illegible] grievance, enjoy all the profitable honours and glory of his London sojourns, and [illegible] to the salons of the younger ones, and Mrs. John Hunter (whose [illegible] he set so exquisitely) while her [illegible] husband, the famous anatomist, stalked about growling at him while [illegible]. He equally enjoyed attention from noble and noble personages, and sympathy from the more thoughtful and generous. Tommy who, [illegible] galanteries Mozart and Beethoven could deserve and appreciate the one of real genius. Nor can anything be better because more thoroughly [illegible] than Haydn's perfection, praise and acknowledgment of Mozart's genius,—than his presence with this unknown copy of Mozart, his pupil, Ignace Pleyel, who was brought to London [illegible] a rival [illegible] to balance [illegible] him the [illegible]—than his homely, [illegible] will, refusing as to justice and affection. A life of Haydn with this [illegible] and to his character as a [illegible] has to be written. But from the [illegible] material one, such as which a [illegible] from Gerber [illegible] must of course be left out than from a life of Beethoven, the [illegible] plough [illegible] for his Canzonets. Haydn, though [illegible] a man as Burns, had a better taste in writing his unpressed than our countryman had. It is [illegible] however that neither would have a word [illegible] had their captors been other than Pietists.

In pursuance of Haydn's career, the story of a book has been re-opened by the English translation under review; we call attention to the second of the German volumes here compiled with. Herr Pohl's book is a return, rather for its loss for our country on the details of our doings, [illegible] and notations, which he has collected with amazing industry, are to the English as [illegible] superfluous matter. It is to be regretted that they should be disfigured by such a disproportionate amount of press errors. For such a reason we shall be brief in our review acknowledging as we should the great value of the work to foreign readers. It may tend to dispel the ridiculous ideas which so long prevailed in Germany as to the absence of sympathy for Music in this country. That Haydn was more caressed in its capitals—and with no indiscriminating praise, but intelligently by those whose regard was worth having—than he was as the retainer of Prince Nicholas Esterhazy, no one from every page recording the events of his two visits. Nor less evident is the fact that he valued and lovingly appreciated many beautiful and admirable among his London experiences. The Symphonies which he wrote for Salomon were many a flight bolder than any other of his orchestral works. His Canzonets to English words are the only single songs by him which fer. They remain unapproached by those of any other writer. It was in the [illegible] of England's oratorio performances that the world owes "The Creation." These things have been too ungenerously forgotten by the Germans. It is also true that, in spite of the late hours and surges which are found particularly hard to bear by those habituated to one [illegible] of living, Haydn found keen enjoyment in England apart from the substantial gains he gathered here. It has not been possible to go through the notes of his London pleasures and performances without contrasting him favourably with a bitter genius, who also was honoured [illegible]. It might have been predicted that a man who had seen so much of one to such a class as Haydn had done from his youth upwards should have had a wider and more genial feeling for others than one who only emerged from a very narrow circle after the time of life when habits are formed. But the two composers are as far apart from each other as is fulness from generosity. A more genial example of the temper which every artist would do well for his own happiness and success to cultivate, could not be found than that of dear old Haydn.

We must now return to Lady Wallace's collection. The letters of Philip Emanuel Bach are of far less value than those of Haydn, being merely notices of his affairs on business. The contributions of Weber to the volume are more interesting, as was to be expected from one who commanded the pen of a journalist as well as of a musical composer. They show the bright side of the character in his own attachment to his comrade Gaensbacher and his gratitude to his master, the Abbé Vogler; but they also present indications of the [illegible] which we noted in the badly-written but interesting biography by his son. Unlike the author of "The Creation," Weber could be bitter and unjust to any of his contemporaries whom he fancied rivals. A man in a chronic over-wrought state, unfortunate in habits of mind for powers of imagination, tempting him to imagine and to dwell "on hope deferred"—as to be discerned in the earlier letters. The details of his failing health, ascribable in part, we fancy, to the irregularity of his life before his marriage, are sad to read. On the whole, there is fever in these letters—but there was fever in the writer's mind.

Nothing save these both reflecting the possession of such unusual genius could well be more opposite than the lives and the spirits of the composes of "Die Frederike" and "Elijah." Mendelssohn's letters close this volume as with a strain of good cheer,—saddened though the same be by the recollection of the shortness of the happiest, healthiest, most brilliant, most complete life ever led by Poet. His reputation as one of the most charming among the letter-writers who have delighted the world will suffer nothing by the specimens here translated—principally addressed to his friend Hiremann, the clarionet player. They are full of his kindness, his enthusiasm, his sweet sound sense, his warm hearted affection, and the playfulness, never affected, always of language [illegible] as endeared him to every reader who knew him not and deepened every precious recollection cherished by those who enjoyed the privilege of knowing him. The letters already published are only a part of those that exist. Even in what have been printed there may have been important statements, out of respect to the feelings of persons who may be pained by a sharp epithet which is so often thrown out at the [illegible] of the moment. We shall never cease to regret that, while those were alive who could have put together a rich store of anecdote and recollection, the details of Mendelssohn's visits to England were not collected by those he held in memory in charge. The time is now past. Most, if not all, of his earliest hosts, and many of the friends to whom he trusted himself heart in hand with a frank generous [illegible], have crossed "the bourne," and the store which could have been easily accumulated from their testimony has perished irrecoverably.—Athenæum.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony."

(From the London Times.)

Mendelssohn's reasons for overlooking such a work, even could they be made known, ought to claim little consideration now. Of all the great musicians—and he is surely among the greatest—none ever exhibited such reserve and self-denial about his own compositions. Now that he is gone, it is for history now to render him that justice which he [illegible] denied himself. It is quite enough for them to know that for so many years he kept by him the Italian Symphony which at the time [illegible] the Scotch Symphony, to justify the lovers of his music in attaching small importance to the hypercriticism he himself was wont to exercise in this regard. That any alterations he might have made in his pieces would have been alterations for the better no one for an instant doubts. But he can make alterations no longer, and the world of music is only too grateful to take whatever he has left, satisfied that not a work from his pen exists but does not contain at least something too precious for oblivion. In no single instance, looking at what has already been selected for publication from among his posthumous manuscripts, has this failed to be the case; and till an exception comes to light we may fairly persist in believing that no such exception is at all likely to occur. One thing is certain—Mendelssohn left no instructions to his executors that his unpublished works should be destroyed. On the contrary, he carefully wrote out and dated every one of them. What, then, was to be done? Let us suppose a case that is by no means impossible. The MSS. might change hands. The careful guardians who hold them might bequeath them to others less qualified to look upon them as a sacred trust. And it is not extravagant to suggest that they might possibly come into the possession of persons [illegible] who would venture to dispose of them as useless lumber, or at all events of persons not indifferent to music but indifferent to other considerations, who, without doubt, would find [illegible] an abundant supply of that in which they themselves were wanting. That half a dozen musical reputations might be built upon the contents of Mendelssohn's portfolios will, as things go, hardly be doubted. But better times have come. The scruples of his survivors, whatever they were, would seem to be set at rest, and it affords us real pleasure to state, in correction of a widely-spread belief, that to Herr Carl Mendelssohn, the son, and another near relative of the illustrious master we are exclusively indebted for the works that have recently been produced (the "Trumpet Overture," the "Songs without Words," &c.), together with others about to be produced, the publishers having no further hand in the matter than belongs to them simply as publishers. It is well to state this, which we do on the best authority, inasmuch as it will go far to remove an unfairly [illegible] impression—an impression substituted in [illegible] pain and umbrage where neither are deserved.

The grand symphony in D—the Reformation Symphony, so called—hitherto still in manuscript, was performed Saturday afternoon under the direction of Herr Manns, in presence of the largest audience ever assembled in the concert-room of the Crystal Palace. A more admirable performance was never heard; a more complete triumph has rarely been achieved.

To convey any close impression of such a work without resorting to the aid of examples in musical type, which would be only of service to musicians, is impossible. Nor to ordinary readers would a technical description of its plan, devices, and [illegible] development be of the slightest use. Mendelssohn himself asserted that the meaning of a musical composition could not be [illegible] through the medium of any other language than its own; and [illegible] that language [illegible] to the hearer would be to no purpose [illegible] to translate it into another. But now that the unburied work [illegible] musical circle, and, through the splendid performance at the Crystal Palace, may be said already to have established its claim to rank as one of the masterpieces of its composer, it would hardly suffice to inform the many who, not having been present, are curious about the result, that the symphony in D is a very fine symphony in three parts, composed for the occasion of the 300th anniversary of the Augsburg Confession." We shall, therefore, in as few words as practicable, endeavor to give some account of it, and to state the impression which two hearings, at the rehearsal and at the public performance, produced not upon ourselves alone, but upon the great majority of those who attended either or both.

The symphony begins with a movement—andante (in D major)—the gravity of which at the outset proclaims the work [illegible] of serious import. The opening phrase, led off by the violas, is immediately answered by the [illegible], and carried on in that fine strict style which we are accustomed to associate with the higher order of Church music. When this has been developed [illegible] in the course of its development, the wind instruments give out more easily a second theme of strongly marked contrast, which the stringed instruments answer by a soft modulation [illegible], modulating [illegible] full harmony to the dominant cadence. With this twice repeated the short introduction is brought to a pause. It may be stated here that the cadence, or amen, in question formed part of a Roman Catholic Church service that caught Mendelssohn's attention at Dresden, and that being much struck with it, he adopted the resolution of giving it a place in the symphony, which was then engrossing his thoughts. Those who choose to speculate upon his poetical intention may discern in the introductory portion the [illegible] of what is to follow—the [illegible] of a new faith [illegible] against the mental [illegible] peculiar [illegible]. Nevertheless, as sure and as serene, it suggests [illegible] peace than conflict. Not so, however, the movement that follows—allegro con fuoco (D minor). Here all is conflict, not that of the [illegible]. The opening [illegible] unison for all the instruments except trombones—a conspicuous feature of the principal subject—bears a close affinity to, may immediately spring from, the [illegible] (already noticed) in the second bars of the introduction. Its frequent recurrence throughout the movement, [illegible] and fresh shapes, keeps attention necessarily awake to the fact that the Roman Catholic faith, as symbolized in its music for the church, is still the predominant question.

The two important themes upon which this magnificent allegro is built, though forcibly contrasted, lend themselves readily to the almost evident design—that of a prolonged struggle between contending principles. The first (in D minor) has the breadth and vigor of Beethoven; while the second (in A major), the announcement of which again seems to spring from the [illegible] in the Introduction, reveals the [illegible] of Mendelssohn. Both are wrought out with [illegible] skill, [illegible] of [illegible] any matter which may [illegible] to represent the fierce and obstinate contest [illegible] being waged. Just as the climax would seem to be at hand it is arrested by the [illegible] (in D major) of the harmonized [illegible] from the Catholic Church service—as a [illegible] back at a more cherished belief about to be rejected. After this lull, however, onward as before to the [illegible], the [illegible] character of [illegible] in a coda, or peroration, equal in interest to what has gone before. The [illegible] of this coda is a sort of condensed [illegible] of the allegro con fuoco, [illegible] more [illegible] and [illegible] as end of all—as though the [illegible] reminder of the old faith had brought with it regret without conviction. The effect of this is altogether new and exceedingly affecting [illegible]. The [illegible] of the coda [illegible] the same style as the allegro, before the intervention of the Roman Catholic [illegible]. An [illegible] crescendo leads up to a fortissimo for the whole orchestra; and the movement proceeds in a more impassioned style till [illegible] of the [illegible] ends, somewhat in the manner of the first movement of Beethoven's [illegible] which is in the same key. To say [illegible] it would be superfluous [illegible] first part of the Reformation Symphony [illegible] respects worthy its author. Equally so is the movement that follows (allegro vivace), consisting of a scherzo (in B flat) with trio (in G). Only Mendelssohn himself could explain what this movement signifies in [illegible] of his symphony,—supposing that [illegible] (as is generally held) to have been [illegible] connection with the rise, progress and triumph of the Protestant faith. It little matters, however; and when we say that it is difficult to decide which of its two divisions [illegible] is the more charming [illegible]. The audience on Saturday [illegible] unanimous [illegible] by [illegible] the movement, which was accordingly repeated from beginning to end. It was hard to resist the influence of melody so frankly rhythmical and unobtrusively [illegible].

The third and last section of the symphony consists of four movements, linked together so as virtually to constitute one organic whole. We know of nothing more [illegible] pathetic than the opening (andante, in G minor); and we can easily understand how it may be intended to convey a feeling of despondency engendered by [illegible] with respect to the most momentous problems of life. In this movement he [illegible] that go straight to the heart, [illegible] and just [illegible], with a [illegible] of [illegible] the second theme of the allegro, [illegible] the theme of the [illegible] chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" (andante con moto, in the key of G), the first bars of which are heard from a single flute, unaccompanied, comes like a gleam of sunshine unexpectedly lighting up a chamber where before there had been utter darkness. Mendelssohn has recourse to the rough and popular version of the tune, not to that which appears three times in J. S. Bach's [illegible], and which Meyerbeer, overlooking the fact that the early French Protestants were not Lutherans, but Calvinists, has introduced in the Huguenots. How he has treated it, how after the solitary flute has given out the first three bars, the oboes, clarinets, bassoons and other wind instruments alternately enrich the harmony, faced alternately by the violins and violoncellos (divided), the violins taking no part until the variation that follows (allegro vivace, same key), in which to a bright accompaniment of stringed instruments, the broken snatches of the theme are heard at intervals from clarinet, oboe, flute, &c., the whole culminating in the vigorous and brilliant preamble of the finale—allegro maestoso (D major)—must be left to the imagination of the reader. In the final movement itself the most ingenious devices of counterpoint are brought to bear more through the one theme than the other. Of these not the least important is the turn of "Ein feste Burg" which, however does no make its re-appearance until the first subject, a fugal episode in the relative minor, and the second subject in the dominant major have been gone out at length. From this point, however, the old Lutheran choral is heard struggling for mastery—now on one instrument now on another often seeming as if it would gain the victory, but as often temporarily though never quite defeated. The second theme, first given out by the instrument of wood and brass there, as of a jubilant character, as though to represent the assured conviction of one sure that in the end the truth must prevail. A fugue for stringed instruments at every twice, the theme of which may recall it to of no episode in the second, "Be not afraid" from Elijah. On the second appearance of the fugue, when the chorale joins in the the[ory] of the theme, and the subject were elaborately worked, the chorale. Ein feste Burg, with wind instruments, and which appears in the fugue given as an independently as the last movement of no antagonist, and the combination of the two is one of the most interesting and masterly points of the finale. Others might be cited but we must be content to name the episode at the close of the first part, after the peroration of the fi[rst] and second theme, where, first in answer from bodyful instruments, then in full harmony the the whole of the wind, there appears a new in the accompaniment of a new and striking figure for the violins and other strings, staccato. To conclude, the working up of the whole after the second entry of the fugue combination with the chorale and the re-appearance of the second theme, in the ruling key of the movement, is in Mendelssohn's best manner. The climax is put off with grand effect, and when at length it is reached, the leading phrase of "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott" being given out in lengthened notes by the entire orchestra, fortissimo, we feel that a noble effect has been nobly and thoroughly achieved.

Upon the relative position which the Reformation Symphony is entitled to hold by the side of its composer's other great works, we need not speculate here. That it will obtain very general acceptance as among his best, we cannot reasonably doubt. Meanwhile, a first impression counts for anything, the enthusiasm excited by the audience at the Crystal Palace may be regarded as a significant fact. It should never be forgotten that this symphony was completed in 1830, and that, as Mendelssohn was born in 1809, it was the work of one who had not yet attained his 22nd year. But it did not require the Reformation Symphony to prove that in regard to precocious talent its composer stands forth as the most wonderful phenomenon of which the musical art can boast. The very idea of such a work being devised and planned out by a mere youth is extraordinary enough; the fact of so thoroughly successful accomplishment is still more extraordinary. But now that we have got it it can speak for itself and, as we are greatly deceived it will speak to future times. Often as it has been our agreeable duty to praise the orchestra of the Crystal Palace, and Herr Manns, its admirable conductor, we have never been able to do so more unreservedly than now. What would Mendelssohn himself have said to such a performance? At Berlin, in 1832, he could have heard nothing like it—nor with Habeneck; at Paris either even when Habeneck was conductor of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, much less now, with M. Georges Hainl from Lyons, at its head.

(From the Athenæum.)

Yielding to none in our love for the fame and memory of the last of the great German composers, it may be recollected that we have not shared with many of Mendelssohn's friends and enthusiastic admirers their eagerness to bring to light the works which he withheld during his lifetime as incomplete. The case is not a common one. His orderliness and self-knowledge were as remarkable as his genius. His reserves, therefore, are not to be classed with the oversights and oversights which apply in other cases of posthumous manuscripts. Whereas Bach with all his industry, narrated no care over his music,—leaving interpolations and doubtful, incorrect ed and narratives for his successors to decide on—it was not so with Mendelssohn. The plea that an author's inventions must become public property when once the breath has passed out of his body becomes specious, is subject to limitations. There is something of authority after all in the Stratford epitaph. Many wise and sincere persons, however, have held diametrically opposite views on this particular matter; and so it has come to pass that, in compliance with the pressure of these zeal, certain remains and relics are now appearing one by one.

The Reformation Symphony is probably the most important of the works left by the master which are the light, since we cannot conceive that those who advocate the production of every scrap of writing which came from Mendelssohn's pen would dream of demanding the doubtful pianoforte concertos which are in existence, or either of the ones carefully noted by him in the Thematic Catalogue prepared by his own hand. That the production of the work at Sydenham came need an amount of musical excitement rare in England was to be foreseen. It is not exaggeration to say that it was in not any more wonders are almost before I was heard and received with an enthusiasm which makes remark or qualification next to impossible. It is already thought to be set in its place among its composer's greatest works. One conviction, however, that much remains to be said on the subject, one observes that, no matter at what risk of unpopularity, it must be respectfully expressed. I all be stated in what that under better conditions as ofterwise such was never given. Every essay had been exacted to do justice to the memory of the modern musician most—and most justly—beloved in this country.

Mendelssohn's music is in nothing more admirable than in the characteristic that whereas it is not as shallow it does not torment the listener by mysticism. He wrote by the golden rule that to be great one is to be clear—the rule of Michael Angelo and Handel, of Beethoven at his best period, and Mozart every step a departure from which a (diagonal at how the portraits of mysticism will) a step downwards. In the works of what he laughingly used to call "his rebellious time" (as in his strongest quartet prelude) by the Lord let us wake") he was at times overcome less to show his scholarship, not by "the sweet mildness of art," but by ingenuities of knowledge and construction uncanny in one so young, and which, I may be said, occasionally shut up that freedom of melody and idea which are indispensable to complete pleasure in music. That the use developed by many a stride with every year that passed "Elijah" shows, as compared with "St Paul."

As the Reformation Symphony stands, we fancy it may have been composed and retouched at different periods. It does not present itself to us as an entire work. There is dryness in the first movement and over-labor and very limited phrase, howbeit dignified by the earnest felicity of instrumentation. The scherzo is charming, even among Mendelssohn's scherzi—its essential slightness, not to say frivolity of the elegant theme of its trio being dressed with every orchestral device and grace conceivable; neither device nor grace forced a hair's breadth towards affectation or false effect. The slow movement a mere mar[ch]-word—a Lied ohne Worte entrusted. The Lutheran Chorale is wonderfully announced and amplified. Among the stories to which this Symphony has given rise, is one that Mendelssohn held it back, conceiving himself anticipated—or his idea plagiated—by Meyerbeer, in "Les Huguenots." The finale is grand and spirited; but Beethoven had first written the finale to the C minor Symphony. The peroration is noble, rich, pompous overall to, and in some phrases anticipating, the one in the violin Concerto. But, as a whole, "come what come may," cause is to be found in this Symphony why Mendelssohn declined to send it forth; and cause may be found in it, should an act of acceptance fail to fulfil the expectations of those who have been immediate to announce its triumphant reception as among the most eminent of symphonic art.

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY THE HARMONIC.

The results upon Oratorio of the various antagonistic influences now at work influences springing as on the one hand from the especially spiritual Mystery developed in Germany and, on the other from the musical-drama invented by the Italians, are first recognized in the cropping up of an ambiguous class of productions which cannot be designated as Opera or Oratorio, but which so powerfully affected the development of the latter that we must, on no account pass it. So in Italian we find in the Chorus Spirituale as well as in certain school-comedies of the first half of the 17th century. We will mention among them The spiritual Opera Pastoral or Comedy called "Seelewig" set specially in the ITALIAN fashion by Johann Gottlieb Staden. Nuremberg printed and published by Wolfgang Endtern in the year 1644.* The parts of three Nymphs and Six phonetiones are given to the treble, those of a Matron and several Shepherdesses the [alto] and tenor, and that of a Satyr or "Wood Devil" to the bass. The whole accompanied by fiddles, flutes, shalms, a horn and a theorbo.—Not less remarkable is the Coburg comedy of Jerusalem delivered by the dear Prince Gottfried Duke of Saxony,† the music of which is due to Melchior Franck—born about 1570 in Silesia, died about 1639—one of the most prominent masters of Evangelical Church music. This comedy already bears the characteristic name of Actus Oratorius, all which, however as we shall see, was undoubtedly borrowed from Italy.

Much more purely and significantly affected in such labors than his German contemporaries by influences emanating from Italy was Master Schütz. During the considerable period he resided in Venice and other parts of Italy as pupil of the head of the Venetian school the great Giovanni Gabrieli, he had adopted different and far purer notions both of Opera and Oratorio. While, on the one hand, he learned, on the spot, of about the commencement and effect of the former from such men as Cavalieri (born 1550), Peri (born 1560), Monteverde (born 1568), and Caccini (born 1558), profiting so much by what he learned that he was the first German opera‡ on the other coming, as he did from Northern Germany, where people had accustomed themselves to such a very deep a profoundness in Oratorio, he brought to his task a degree of earnestness, and a moral elevation of sentiment, which, combined with Gabrieli's highly developed theories, could not fail to produce something remarkable.

It cannot, however, be denied that as regards epic construction and form even for Oratorio he still found much to learn in Italy. In that country Oratorio had a very different beginning to which [illegible] in Germany. While in Germany, we had to seek its roots in the Minnesinger, in Italy we find its [illegible] due to the very same [illegible] springing from classical Antiquity, which gave birth to opera.

Goethe's "characteristic" Saint, treated by Goethe with such freedom in the description of his Italian travels, the worthy Philippus Neri—born in 1515 at Florence; died in 1595 at Rome—gave most strangely the name to this whole class of works. Neri erected, in the year 1558, near the church of San Girolamo della Carità, a hall for prayer (oratory), where he collected his followers for their spiritual edification. In order to attract them by the aid of music, he secured the services of Johannes Animuccia, a [illegible] of St. Peter's in the Vatican, under whose direction the choral singing was cultivated. By the year 1575 the circle of Neri's followers had extended so considerably that by a bull dated the 15th July Pope Gregory XIII gave the sanction to the institution as "Association of the Prayer-Hall" "Congregazione dell' Oratorio." From that time forward the musical works performed there, and most of which, as we know, were founded on legendary subjects and words, were called off hand "Pieces from the Prayer-Hall," and, at last and more laconically "Oratorios."—Animuccia is certainly the first master who cultivated this branch of the art; he was followed, though not at first in the fully marked oratorical style, by Palestrina (especially in the [illegible] of the Passion for Passion Week), Giovanni Maria Nanino, Felice Anerio, Luca Marenzio, etc. In the works of Carissimi, 1582-1672, we already find Oratorios properly so called, the [illegible], such as Jephtha, the Judgment of Solomon, being important, inasmuch as they mark the [illegible] in the choice of the subject, which had had before been restricted almost exclusively to the Passion. Domenico Mazzocchi, born about 1590, even added an organ accompaniment. Both these masters were contemporaries of Schütz, who has outlived them. It is therefore more than probable that the [illegible] treatment of recitative in these oratorical works exercised a great influence on the Passion Oratorio composed by Schütz in 1666, when he had attained a very advanced age, though in power and depth of expression the German master left his Italian models far behind.

Harpsichord and Piano.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette" Nov. [illegible])

Herr Ernst Pauer, one of our most distinguished pianoforte professors, has commenced a series of "Historical Performances," the second of which takes place to-day (Wednesday) at the Hanover Square Rooms. One curious fact in all these performances is the introduction of the harpsichord [illegible] "clavering," as it is called in the programme, on which, with more logic, Herr Pauer insists on playing all pieces originally written for that instrument. There are, doubtless, numbers of persons who as a matter of curiosity would like to hear the harpsichord of our great-grandmothers; but if the masters who wrote before Clementi composed music for the harpsichord, then, it should be remembered, was because the piano, that could be performed on the harpsichord, had not yet been invented. Hence Herr Pauer's principle, any music written for the pianos of J. B. Cramer's time ought to be executed on such pianos as J. B. Cramer knew. Beethoven's sonatas should be played on the pianos of the Beethoven period; while the most perfect specimens of the art of Broadwood and Erard should be reserved for the [illegible] more modern music of (say) [illegible] among classical composers and Thalberg among composers of the fantastic school. Herr [illegible] in the same direction would find it [illegible] Beethoven's sonatas could be performed on Beethoven's own piano which, according to the Revue et Gazette Musicale, has been lately discovered, and is, of course, for sale. The works of every composer on each composer's own piano would be a fine basis on which to give a series of Historical performances. The worst of it is that the requisite instruments would be difficult to obtain, and perhaps also obtained difficult to play upon. Chopin's piano, for instance, had a very violent fall in the agitated season of the year 1863, from the second-floor window of a house at Warsaw; and all the Czar's horses and all the Czar's men can never put Chopin's piano together again. But Beethoven's piano, to judge from the paragraph on the subject issued by the actual owners and would-be vendors (who certainly ought to know), is in admirable condition; and we have a dim recollection of a slightly asthmatic harpsichord said to have belonged to Handel, which was exhibited at one of the soirées of the Musical Society of London. The programme does not give the age of the harpsichord on which Herr Pauer, at his first concert, played pieces by Kuhnau, Handel, Sebastian Bach and Friedemann Bach; but, to avoid anachronism, special harpsichords ought to have been employed, the oldest of which should have dated, at latest, from the beginning of the eighteenth century.

To all our objections which we have presented fairly enough and just as they have occurred to us, Herr Pauer might, no doubt, reply that all he does is to play harpsichord music on the harpsichord and piano music on the piano. But on what instrument does Herr Pauer imagine that Bach himself would have executed his Italian Concerto if Bach could have been present the other day at the Hanover Square Rooms? Certainly not on the harpsichord.

Bach's forty-eight preludes and fugues are so well known, now, that Herr Pauer in the highly interesting occasional programmes, his English and French as we, when played by Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé are so often admired, that a less known work may be more welcome, and may serve to show how great Bach could be while identifying him to the [illegible] a former style. This as [illegible] has Madame Goddard and Mr. Hallé have always played the English and French suites on the piano, and performed on the harpsichord the Italian Concerto—with all the respect due to Herr Pauer's remarkable talent—cannot be heard to the greatest possible advantage.

The second part of Herr Pauer's first "Historical Performance" included—a sonata by Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach Sebastian Bach's youngest son, one of [illegible] between the years 1775 and 1787; a piece by Johann [illegible] Haydn a pupil of Emanuel Bach, who visited London [illegible] remained here a year or two, and afterwards went to St. Petersburgh, where he settled and in 1773 died; Mozart's Fantasia in C minor (No. 1); Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp minor (so-called by Hummel); Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," the presentation of which is made the occasion for giving in the programme a lively sketch of that pianist and composer's very varied career, and finally an original Romance by Thalberg, "where," says Herr Pauer, "it was recently become the fashion to slight [illegible] any one," he adds "who will take the [illegible] examine Thalberg's compositions will find that he never wrote a commonplace one, and that, although his part writing may sometimes occur [illegible] of place, it is always clear and without fault. It will be evident," he continues, "to those conversant with the subject in trying over Thalberg's music, that it has been composed on the piano and afterwards transferred to paper. Beethoven and Mendelssohn did not compose in that way, and it is possible Thalberg might have found it difficult to compose [illegible] so well drawn [illegible]." Nevertheless, the [illegible] were used and Herr Pauer [illegible] the [illegible] and entire [illegible] with the expression of a [illegible] Thalberg's best pieces, the productions of one at least acquainted with the primary value of musical grammar once again in vogue, rather than the present much which did the wonders and [illegible] be presented [illegible] of the moral culture.

Herr Pauer's "Historical Performances," especially when studied by the light of his programmes, will be found very interesting and [illegible]. The harpsichord is scarcely wanted. But everyone has [illegible] and a [illegible] for the harpsichord may be the weakness of Herr Pauer.

Her Majesty's Theatre.

The audience who were [illegible] the various theatres on Friday the 6th inst. were treated by a spectacle on which they had not calculated. The Old Opera House in the Haymarket, as it was familiarly called, was being lapped up by the fiercest tongues of fire that have ever brought a vast destruction on substantial property and visionary dreams. To some, the spectacle was before them with a defiant, overpowering fire where the record of the catastrophe [illegible] upon the scene. For miles round the metropolis there could be seen a glowing, trembling canopy of flame-coloured cloud, which showed what fury was then being accomplished beneath it. At eleven o'clock the flames had full mastery of the noble edifice. By one, their progress was arrested; yet not till after a fierce struggle against water to destroy the east side of Waterloo place. But daylight had gone out on Saturday evening, and flames still [illegible] themselves here and there, ready for more mischief, but, cut off from an opportunity, quietly dying out.

In the last opera performed the night previous to that of the catastrophe, "Don Giovanni," Ottavio and Giovanni were sung by two Englishmen, Messrs. Hohler and Santley; Zerlina by an American, Miss Kellogg; and Donna Anna by a German, Mdlle. Titjens.

The opposition to the first house was made early. Farinelli, under the patronage of the nobility and gentry, against Handel's "Rival Theatre"; and after, Handel left the Haymarket for Covent Garden, by 1733 the "nobility and gentry" faction occupied the Haymarket. At the end of about two years both parties were ruined, and Chesterfield's humour led the [illegible] of the Opera as the suppression of an establishment which would be improved by Convocation where there noble crowd would be saving for admission. A quarter of a century later his cautious man had shouted "Wherever I go to the Opera," he wrote to Mann, "I have my mind and my reasons as the door with my ballot-box, and deliver myself up to my eyes and my ears." He had got these to speak of the Opera as St Evremond had spoken long before that "Un [illegible] magnifique, mais [illegible]!"

The queer old house, with its high narrow [illegible] [illegible] and vaulted ceiling, was destroyed by fire in June, 1789. As nobody had the slightest idea how that calamity came about, everybody came to be assured that it [illegible] 'superb' [illegible] susceptibilities had been wounded had contrived a plan that he alone did it, out of revenge! The [illegible] meet the [illegible] with [illegible] indifference. "Is a year [illegible] over the Opera House?" asked Walpole of the sister Berry. "Do you agree with me that there is no reason to rebuild it? The nation has long been tired of opera, and this now a good opportunity of dropping them. Dancing prospered their existence for some time! But the more cyfer was the real support of both, and I like what has been said of some one, that they never speak their true meaning but in the postscript of their letters. Would it not be sufficient to hold an After Piece on the whole supplement, in which people might escape from all assemblies? To be crowded to death in a waiting-room at the end of the entertainment is the whole [illegible] for which one is only [illegible] at the last salutation of it?"

The last "Italian" house—where Horace Walpole and Gray and Lady Mary Coke and the Countess of Ossory figured with cricket and made love and talked scandal, the house in which Senesino sang and for which Handel and Gluck wrote their operas (in none has a few among the long list of brilliant associations of the last century) built by Sir John Vanbrugh—but burnt down in 1789. Till it could be replaced Italian opera found an home in the Pantheon then a theatre. That too [illegible] Lord Mount Edgcumbe's "Recollections" records of, was destroyed by fire. The second Grand Opera-House in the Haymarket, opened in 1791, was built by one Novosielski (a Pole) and some twenty years later was covered and an exterior [illegible] by Nash. As a theatre for the display of the voice, it was [illegible]. When it was desired, the demands for scenic display in Italian Opera were [illegible] in comparison with those we have lived to see and hear during the last five-and-thirty years. The range of how many [illegible] have felt so [illegible] and conveniences. But the aspect of the theatre especially when noble patrons and fine dames figured in the boxes and in "Fops' Alley" was [illegible] and passed to no common degree—a sight to be thought of and talked about now by those [illegible] by grand [illegible] of Mme. and [illegible].

From [illegible] our Haymarket Opera House has commenced [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] in Europe, before St. Petersburg and New York were thought of as centres and before the great [illegible] had followed the law of all [illegible] [illegible] a splendid [illegible] to [illegible]. What a procession of queens of song rises as we recall the names of [illegible] Grassini, Catalani (with her "ten supplementary dolls"), Pasta, Sontag, Malibran, and the three last, but not least, of the great [illegible], Grisi, Viardot and [illegible]! And what kings were there to wait [illegible], such [illegible] as Rubini, Lablache, and Signor Tamburini. Thus in the history of Opera in Her Majesty's Theatre, a long series has [illegible] for [illegible] the performance was wrought up by Mr. [illegible] to a point of perfection utterly unknown till then in this country.

LEIPZIG. The 7th Gewandhaus Concert (Nov. 28) began with an Overture to Aladdin, a MS. work by a former pupil of the Conservatorium, C. F. E. Horneman, a young Dane. The critics speak of it as a work of uncommon talent, fresh, original, imaginative, with a certain coloring of the author's nationality. A lady violinist, from Stockholm, Frau Norman-Neruda, who "takes first rank among the these artists by the manly strength and fulness of her tone, the absolute purity and by the faultless technique," played Rode's A minor Concerto and a Concerto by Vieuxtemps. The Neue Zeitschrift alluding to Mendelssohn's [illegible] the stage of the Gewandhaus hall, thinks that such parade pieces can hardly be called "ver sacrum." Another novelty was the singing of a Swedish male quartet (called in to fill a gap in the programme). They sung national compositions by Lindblad and others, and though the voices were not remarkable for power or beauty the ensemble is pronounced unsurpassable. Schumann's C-major Symphony formed the second part of the concert.

Bach's Trauer Ode (Funeral Ode) and the Missa Solemnis by F. Kiel, were performed in the Thomas Church by Riedel's Society in the latter part of November.—The third concert of the "Euterpe" consisted of the first act of Spohr's Alchemist for the first part, and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony for the second.

COLOGNE. The third Gürzenich concert came on the anniversary of Schubert's death (Nov. 19), and the programme consisted largely of his music: his great Symphony in C, the Overture to Rosamund, and the Kyrie from his grand Mass.

CONSTANCE. The Musikverein, besides its usual Concerts for all the members, gives seven subscription concerts this winter, consisting partly of orchestral and vocal, partly of chamber music, as follows: Bach: Concerto for piano and orchestra, in D minor. W. Bargiel: Overture to Medea; Beethoven: the Symphony and Overture to King Stephen; N. W. Gade: "Ossian" Overture; J. P. E. Hartmann: "Die Goldenen Hörner" poem by Oehlenschläger melodrama; Haydn: "Spring" from "The Seasons;" F. Hiller: Symphony in D minor; Handel: Concerto for two violins and 'cello in G minor; Mendelssohn: Selections from "St. Paul," and Overture to "Ruy Blas;" Mozart: Symphony, Concerto for violin and viola, Aria for soprano with obligato piano and orchestra; C. Reinecke: Ave Maria for chorus and orchestra, Concerto in A minor for violoncello; Schubert: "Parting" Serenade, for Alto solo, female chorus and orchestra; Schumann: second part of "Paradise and the Peri;" Spohr: Overture to "The Alchemist;" Chamber music: a Quartet and a Song by Haydn, a Sonata, for two violins and a 'cello, by Brahms; Beethoven's B flat Trio; and other things depending on the cooperation of Joachim and Grützmacher.

LONDON. At the Crystal Palace on Saturday Mozart's symphony in G minor formed the feature and was magnificently performed before an audience not too numerous. The violinist produced an especially gratifying impression in skilful and brilliantly performed Schubert's "Hark! hark! the lark" in D and the concert romance in "Marriage" by Mr. Sullivan were also successfully given. Spohr's Concertante [illegible] a work demanding all the resources of an artist, was satisfactorily performed by Mr. Henry Holmes.

The last of Herr Pauer's interesting series of pianoforte performances—called Historical Concerts—was given on Wednesday. In the second, Herr Pauer took as specimens the harpsichord music of Lully, Rameau, Couperin, Marais, and Paradies and the more modern pianoforte works of Clementi, Cramer, Field, Chopin, and Schumann and Kullak. The third concert, like the others, was divided into two periods, the Clavecin age, and the Pianoforte one. The pieces ran as follows:

THE CLAVECIN.

La Forlana, La Tendre Nanette, La Tourbillon—(1668-1733)	Couperin.
Suite Seconde ou Rondeau, [illegible] Musette, La Poule—(1683-1764)	Rameau.
Fuga, in F—(1715-1787)	Kittel.
Allegro, in E minor—(1681-1758)	Kirnberger

THE PIANOFORTE.

Andante and Variations—(1732-1809)	Haydn
La Consolation—(1759-1812)	Dussek
Capriccio, in C sharp—(1757-1827)	Steibelt
Andante and Rondo—(1786-1826)	Weber
Presto—(1789)	Kalkbrenner
Impromptu Op. 142, No. 3—(1797-1828)	Schubert
Three Musical Sketches, Op. 10—(1816)	Bennett
Allegro Brillante for Two Pianofortes—(1809-1847)	Mendelssohn

The various instruments were all played with that masterful appreciation of different and opposing styles which makes the thorough artist. In conception and execution Herr Pauer displayed true ability, while the larger part of his lecture afforded food for thought, and served to enliven the attention of the audience.

BERLIN. A correspondent of the London Musical World (Dec. 8) gives the following intelligence:

We are to have a revival and a grand one on the 16th of December—an event a novelty—of Gluck's Alceste, with Mme. Harriers-Wippern in the principal female part. Then we are promised by way of complete novelty Herr Langert's Fabius and the Mignon of M. Thomas, with Mlle. Fredricke Grün as the heroine of the first, and Mme. Lucca as the heroine of the second. M. Gounod's Romeo and Juliet on Shakespeare's title is written here, is also to be produced. Mme. Harriers-Wippern appearing as the Vie daughter of the house of Capulet. The last novelty, for the present with a revival of Wagner's Tannhäuser; the leading characters in which will be sustained by Mme. Lucca and Herr Niemann.

You will be sorry to learn that Mme. Lucca was suddenly taken ill a short time since. It was on the occasion of the hundredth performance of M. Gounod's Marguerite, alias Faust. The gifted lady went on, however, notwithstanding the and sang and finished her part, but not in her usual brilliant manner. The Chamberhall [illegible] be entirely out, and I am glad to say that Mme. Lucca's illness was nothing serious.

Mme. Lucca had sung the part of Marguerite, at the Royal Operahouse, forty-five times; Mme. Harriers-Wippern twenty-seven; and Mlle. Arron eight. It had, also, been sung by Mesdes. Schmidt, Fresle Harting, Geyer, Gentie, Deber and Rembach-Lim. The Marguerite in the hundredth performance was one [illegible] Mlle. [illegible] I should say that, by the list she would be unable, if in her time, of going through the part in her sleep, especially as it is the [illegible] long one. Faust was represented fifty-one times by the late Mlle. De Ahna, and twenty-one by Mme. [illegible] new Mme. Trautz [illegible] had never been [illegible], by a permanent engagement, and also by Mesdes. Ritter, Crux, Frieb, Wilde, [illegible] and a [illegible] number of times each. Seventy-seven times was Herr Woworsky, Faust seventeen times; Herr Krüger four times, Herr Niemann; and once [illegible] Herr Dörner. Herr Salomon "gave the role" of Mephistopheles in a very wise manner, having sung one single evening first for Herr Lindsch. Herr Betz too figured pretty often as Valentin for he [illegible] performed the part seventy-five times. On the remaining occasions, it was sustained by Messrs. Basse, Lang and Niemann.

Another agreeable event has been the revival of Gluck's Iphigenie in Aulis after a long absence of [illegible] years from the bills of the house. (A mistake: it was heard in Berlin in 1861 and the Iphigenie en Tauride also.—ED.) The greatest possible credit is due to the management for having revived this opera and revived it moreover in so perfect a satisfactory way, in so splendid a manner. But here we are no doubt that when I stop so, they were of nothing more of the interest of pure and high art than of more pecuniary success. This independence of money considerations is unavoidably a great point in favor of theatres and other art institutions being supported at least partly by State grants. It is a very well-and everyone knows it is very easy—to pick tame private managements not producing works the [illegible] cost not to pay, though however so he admired as men men of unusual genius. It is not in human nature to do it. But to resume: Herr Stern was conductor on the occasion, and kept both orchestra and chorus up the high standard of excellence. The opera was placed on the stage by Herr Hein. When a play some of your schools in England cannot be transported at this to witness a performance of it. How it would improve their knowledge of classical costume and classical architecture; and what a pleasant mode of learning!

I just mentioned Mme. Jachmann-Wagner. That lady has appeared, Are, as Fides in Le Prophète. Herr [illegible] was Bertha, and Herr Niemann, John of Leyden.

Among the operas performed since I last wrote, I may name as most worthy of record, Il Trovatore, with Madame Lucca, von Edelsberg, Herren Woworsky and Betz; and Don Juan with Mme. Lucca, for the first time, as Zerlina. The part is one which makes a very heavy demand upon her powers. She both sang and acted charmingly. She was compelled to repeat the [illegible] and the last aria.

Crispino e la Comare has been produced by the Italian company at the Victoria Theatre very successfully. Signora Sarolta was a delightful Annetta, and was well supported by Sig. Marchisio, as Crispino. This gentleman who made his debut in the character, is an inconsiderable addition to Sig. Merelli's company. He possesses pleasing, sufficiently well-trained voice, and no small share of humor. Among the other operas performed have been La Figlia del Reggimento, Il Trovatore, and La Favorita.

The manager of the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatre has for some time been nursing his great, with considerable profit to himself in M. Offenbach whose Schöne Helena, Pariser Leben, Blaubart, and Fritzchen und Lieschen appear as in an early sole programme of the bills, though it is true that Mozart's Così fan Tutte has been played a few times. "I [illegible] be [illegible] a penny worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" quoth Prince Henry. "A deal of Offenbach and [illegible] deal of any one else," say I. But the public [illegible] the money and is therefore entitled to take its choice.—A given way [illegible] [illegible] a debut [illegible] at Frau Pauline Schöne-Krüger. I allude to Herr Adolphi from the Stadttheater, Frankfort. I should not wonder at his being regularly engaged and becoming a great favorite.

At Kroll's Theatre, also, does the music of M. Offenbach these attracting crowds. The manager has one and an old concert but [illegible] entitled Tromb-al-cazar first produced at the Bouffes Parisiens. The principal characters were well sustained by Mlle. Meyer, Herren Witte, Bernhard and Haase. The others revivals have been the same composer's Damen der Halle and Das Verlobung bei der Laterne, together with M. Suppé's Pensionat.

The concerts of the Philharmonic Society opened [illegible] with a "bang." The programme of the first concert contained a name which acted like a magnet on the concert-going public. Herr Joseph Joachim was announced to play Dr. L. Spohr's Concerto in E minor and J. S. Bach's "Chaconne." To describe how he played is unnecessary, because you, Mr. Editor, and all your readers, know it already. To say that it has ever been so applauded is, also, rather superfluous since as mighty an ovation; but the month of May—out of Kroll and—is generally an agreeable month. But Herr Jean [illegible] not so tested himself with a style at the concerts of other people he has given concerts of his own, to the utmost satisfaction of all who love what is pure and great in art. Among other pieces executed by him were the Concerto in the Hungarian style, Bach's Violin-concerto in A minor, and his own Second Concerto in G minor (unpublished). The last concert commenced with the overture to Faniska by Cherubini. Faniska is an early work, Cherubini's best work in his relation to Medea and Les Deux Journées. Yet in 1805 the Viennese looked upon it as a marvel of musical composition and usually preferred it to Beethoven's Leonore.

Among the most noticeable concerts have been the Monday Concerts of [illegible] Thomas. The Concerts of the Royal Cathedral Choir, the Quartett-Soirées of Herren Laub, [illegible] [illegible] Grützmacher and Herr Brassin, and the Matinées of Herr Bendel; all of which have presented the public with something worth hearing. The principal attractions at the last Monday Concert were Herr Lauterbach, a violinist from Dresden, who appeared in Berlin a year ago, and Signora Tomasi-Clementi, from Kassel, who sang an air from Donizetti's Rosalinda; "Voi che sapete" from Figaro, and an original romance "L'Eterno" by Tosti. Her voice is no longer what it has been, but her method might be advantageously studied by many young aspirants now commencing their career if they would learn how to make their voice last as Hammer, Beethoven's Sonata in A major, Op. 69; and, alone, a Sonata by Benedetto Marcello, the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. He performed, too, a Suite for violoncello solo by J. S. Bach. The vocal [illegible] was Mme. Herrenburg-Tuczek. The prominent pieces at the Royal Cathedral Choir Concert were an "Antiphon," by Handel; Lotti's eight-part "Crucifixus," in its own opinion a particularly fine effort; and Mendelssohn's "Credo." Haydn, Mendelssohn and Beethoven provided the materials for the four gentlemen of the Quartet-Soirée to exhibit their instrumental power on, while Mme. Harriers sang songs by Schubert and Schumann so charmingly as Herr Hallé's [illegible] that she added [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] of the entertainment.

A great sensation was created in musical circles not long ago by a report that there was a "split" between Herr Liebig and his well known orchestra. It was at first denied, but was afterwards proved to be true. I am not acquainted with all the ins and outs of the case, but the [illegible] of [illegible] are the members. The members of the orchestra made certain demands to which Herr Liebig would not accede. Iron [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] had been [illegible] from the orchestra. [illegible] [illegible] members went and offered to transfer their allegiance to Professor Stern. The latter at first said he would accept a conversation, but found it all impossible. Herr Liebig would not descend one iota from the high ground he had taken up. The consequence is that the orchestra Herr Liebig formed for [illegible] many years has left him and now [illegible] the baton of Professor Stern, who was at length persuaded to accept the honorable post.

BOSTON, JAN. 4, 1868.

Music in Boston.

CHRISTMAS WEEK brought with it the usual performances of Handel's "Messiah," and the absent crowded house of the Music Hall on both evenings (the Saturday and Sunday before Christmas) showed that the great religious work of genius is as far as ever from losing its hold upon the affections of the great mass of earnest music-lovers. The Handel and Haydn Society must by these performances more than have made good their loss by the unfortunate experiment of Thanksgiving week, and must feel in better spirits for the great master's work, the preparation of the oratorio of Passion for the coming "Musical Mass Fest."

On Saturday evening the chorus was in great force, certainly exceeding 500 voices; the orchestra, on a rather reduced scale of numbers, was yet quite effective on the whole; the great Organ played by Mr. LANG, came in at the right moments to supply great depths of bass and background to the massive choruses; the four solo singers all were excellent, and Mr. ZERRAHN as he had made the most of the opportunities of rehearsal (though it is harder to release habitual rehearsing these very familiar things, than it is to acquire better ones in new things), conducted with his usual ability. There were some omissions, for the most part judicious. We must protest again however against the omitting of that profoundly beautiful and touching chorus in the second part: "And with his stripes,"—if only because there Handel comes so near to Bach; but more because without it the later version, the transition from the preceding chorus, "Surely," &c., to "All we like sheep, have gone astray" is unprepared in point of modulation and painfully abrupt. Most of the choruses were sung as well as usual, some of them (old stumbling blocks, such as "His yoke is easy" and "Let us break their bonds asunder") considerably better. Others, and some too, suffered from want of perfect unity of pitch between orchestra and organ.

The new point of interest in the solos was the first appearance in Oratorio of Mr. GEORGE L. OSGOOD, whose beautiful tenor voice, thoroughly refined style and true expression had won such favor in one of the Symphony Concerts. He gave "Comfort ye" in clear, pure, warm tones, with admirable declamation, and sang the air, "Every valley," with a fluency and evenness of execution remarkable for one so young in this kind of experience. In "Thy rebuke," &c., he was almost equally successful, entering into the deep pathos of the scene with true intelligent and feeling. We were sure he was clearly heard by all and conveyed the sense and beauty of the music very satisfactorily; the only want was of greater weight and sustained power of voice—not by any means a thing to be counted first in the order of requirements, inasmuch as soul is more than substance. The want of power was more really felt, though, in the taking and energetic Aria, "Thou shalt break them." We could not feel as some have been so hasty to exclaim, that he "broke down" in it; but he did wrestle with the flood of disadvantage, and that, we fancy, was partly due to nervousness and partly to the fact that he had been overtasked with music which properly and commonly falls to the lot of the Soprano. Mr. Osgood must not be discouraged; his physical development is by no means complete yet, and his career is but begun; he has a beautiful organ, already finely cultivated, and, what is best of all, a musical nature, with refinement and diligence, and a love of Art for Art's sake by no means too common with those who bring voices and ambition to these high tasks. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY showed marked improvement in the bass solos, both in the rich and [illegible] quality of his voice, and in his [illegible] delivery.

Madame PAREPA ROSA, of course, was fully equal to her task in all the mechanism of vocal execution, the art of singing, and thorough familiarity with the music in all kinds of music. The voice was as sweet and the expression pure, we thought, in the opening phrases "There were shepherds," &c. And "Rejoice greatly" was splendidly done. In the great air "I know that my Redeemer" we still feel some lack of sympathetic quality of depth of nature, of inspiration such as made it impossible ever to forget how the Lind sang it. Other pieces too were marred by the introduction of cadenzas and little effects, more in place in the Italian singing. Even the high note to which the voice soared, as in ecstatic ecstasy, at the end of "Take his yoke upon you," beautiful as it was held out, was questionable, if only for the reason that it was too sure to "bring the house down," while it interfered with what was amply atoned, because it [illegible] us getting the same low sweet melody sung three over. Mrs. CARY's rendering of the first-mentioned, as the low key ("Come unto Him") was not as much less worthy of the compliment and its quiet beauty deserved not to be outdazzled by any extra brightening of the Soprano part. Indeed Mrs. Cary's singing of her whole part was as truly edifying as a warm, rich, sympathetic voice, without great weight, but finely cultivated, and sincere, deep earnest feeling could make it. This lady loses honor in the music.

The second night was stormy and reduced the numbers a little, though not much; it seemed to have made greater inroads in the ranks of chorus. And yet, as is often happens for the reward of those who brave the elements in a good effort, the "Messiah" went on the whole with more spirit and precision than the night before. This time Mr. CARTER sang the tenor solos, with greater power and volume of voice than Mr. Osgood, though not with more expression, nor so refined a quality of tone; but the effect was in every way highly successful; and so was that of Mr. RUDOLPHSEN in the bass solos. The rest was as before.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fourth (Dec. 19th) consisted of just two solid instrumental pieces, and no more,—what Artemus Ward would have called a good "square meal" of music. But certainly no concert has been more enjoyed. It held the great audience in earnest rapt attention from the first note to the last. The orchestra was a better one than the last: the welcome face of WULF FRIES was seen in the middle of the group, making as such more in aid, violoncellos, as well as in double basses. We count a dozen first violins good and true, and when the other members of the Quintette Club return as they usually do the last second will be brought to due proportion to the whole. The good free and Herr KELLER's adjustment of leadership in the string department already appear in a greater unity of bowing and common understanding in the string of phrases, while Mr. Conductor ZERRAHN put greater care and more intent in the interpretation of each work as a whole. There was closer approximation also to true pitch in the wind instruments.

The first selection was Gade's "Ossian" Overture (Nachklänge von Ossian), a wonderful tone picture in the way of instrumental coloring. It is one of the Danish composer's earliest works, and gave him fame before the "Highlands" Overture or either of the Symphonies had yet appeared. Hence we have here his individuality in all its freshness; before the wild northern inspiration, by turns tender and stormy, fairy-like or pastoral and heroic, bearing the burden of old war songs in the strong image of the mist, and repeat themselves to mannerism. All that twinge and doom and woods and mellow horns and heavens here could lie in mingle and contrast the colors of a wild northern picture and moreover like legend and in a poetry, is here by a happy stroke of genius and with masterful skill realized. Ossian's long lost is too long. Gigantic figures stalk through the mists; and when the orchestra swells from such a measure to its climax in that final, sombre and hymn you feel the likeness with that old Viking [illegible] in the finale of his first Symphony.—Schumann's D minor Symphony, op. 120 completed the first part of the concert. We described it so fully last year that we need only say that the general impression of its power and beauty was confirmed; nearly all present followed the unbroken series of its movements springing so logically from one germ with sincere delight, and all with sincere respect; for Schumann's music, though some unmusical truly enamored more and to find themselves at home in it, more and more are giving in to his genius [illegible]. It was remarkably well played.

For the second part we had first, the last and greatest of Beethoven's five Piano-forte Concertos, the greatest indeed of all Concertos, called in England the "Emperor,"—that in E flat, op. 73. In the first and most movement, the heroic, in its glorious enthusiasm it seems to tread on air, in mover onward and upward with a devout momentum; while the Adagio is deep burning melody of infinite sweetness, singing itself out as sacred refuge, is altogether heavenly. Out of its deep peace the unaccountable [illegible] of the Allegro takes wings of energy and soars. In a mercenary orchestral and piano work, if you attend to the piano any short time to the other instruments, you less the charm and meaning of the work for it is all one creation. It has had a merely recognition here before, and more than once (in the "Jubilee" Concert in honor of the Emancipation Proclamation, Jan. 1 1863 at one or two of Mr. Zerrahn's Philharmonic Concerts, and in the first season of these Harvard concerts), so that many welcomed it as an old friend. This time its wonderfully rich orchestral parts—rich in magic, ideas, as well as coloring—had much better justice done them than they ever got here before. And the young pianist Ernst Perabo, achieved his welcome task in a way that made the audience as the chords. He played it without notes but he had not merely trusted to that marvellous musical memory that with him, limpid touch alike audible in the most bloom and the strongest passages and that subtle power of execution which makes it a matter of course for him to give a clean, unbroken reading of whatsoever music interests him, even in most preparation but conscientiously in duty to the master and the occasion and himself he had carefully and carefully prepared himself resolved to do his best, and it was the genius. Feeling this he did it. Such a work, so played, is a rare feast.—The concert ended with the great Leonora Overture, No. 3, in C, which never grows old and this time was perfectly well played. The greatest of Overtures after the greatest of Concertos!

The next concert comes at a month's interval, Thursday, Jan. 16. The programme, like the last, contains four pieces. Schubert's Overture to Fierabras, Beethoven's first Concerto, in C, played by Mr. B. J. Lang, and Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas form the first part; and the great Schubert Symphony in C, with its "heavenly lengths," the second.

Advent Singing. Mr. J. C. D. Parker's Vocal Club still holds its own and more. It has become one of the institutions, and the feasts of music to which its few privileged guests are admitted twice a year, once in Spring, are to be marked with a white stone in our musical calendar. Again they have twice sung in Chickering's Hall on the last two Monday evenings, [illegible] was filled with delighted guests. They opened before us the treasures of the Winter's [illegible] in the most acceptable manner. The choir is even better than before. Indeed we have never heard a choir of forty mixed voices so perfectly balanced, so purely musical in tone in all four parts, and finely blended so that not was distinctly heard a little bit, subordinated to the whole [illegible] voice that did not tell. They have all practised ever more, and have held together so long to good purpose.

The programme included first a Choral by Bach wonderfully harmonized, followed by the Cradle Song from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," sung with true simplicity and beauty by Mrs. Cary. Mr. Parker accompanying at the piano, as he did everything except the part-songs. Then came one of the novelties of the Club: a Christmas Cantata, by Ferdinand Hiller consisting of Introduction. Soprano Solo (Angel of the Annunciation). Tenor Solo (a Shepherd). Chorus of Shepherds, with which as it goes on a chorus of Angels (female voices) is mingled, with other choruses and solos. It is a very graceful, elegant, happy composition, full of delicate beauty, but hardly of so marked a character as we had hoped; yet we must own that it improved upon acquaintance. A Trio and Chorus to Latin words from a Mass by Mendelssohn succeeded. Then a couple of very beautiful part-songs: "On the water" by Schumann, and Mendelssohn's jubilant and romantic "Forest Birds." Then a couple of Duets: "Frühlingsgrüss" by Gade, and "Heidenröslein" by Mendelssohn, nicely sung by two young ladies. Then two more part-songs, an exquisite one by Gade, "The tranquil Water Lily," dreamy and mystical enough for Heine's little poem; and one of Mr. Parker's own composition ... The two last in [illegible] by the same pen—a more vigorous and impressive ... of music, which had to be repeated. Then Mrs. Harwood whom we were once free to name, sent than we may thank her for her pure voice and style be heard again in the "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn and Bellini's Rapsody ...

After a short interval, the singers assembled, divided into double chorus, and sang Mendelssohn's 98th Psalm: "Sing to the Lord a new-made song." We think it had never been heard here before, and certainly it is one of the noblest of his shorter Psalms; every image and sentence of the text is most vividly illustrated; the harmony rich contrapuntal, wonderfully effective, and when it comes to "He shall judge the world with righteousness," the grand culmination. All be forever went over. The whole was splendidly brought out,—and so may this rare collection of choice little pearls be blended and arranged by the same spirit, under the same excellent director!

Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, not spoiled by transatlantic West, where their harmony was like manna in a thirsty desert, (to judge from the rhapsodies about them in the Western papers) have returned to their post of duty and will commence their 19th season of Chamber Concerts (four) at Chickering's Hall next Tuesday evening. The programme is a rich one beginning with Mozart's E flat Quintet, op. 20 and ending with one of the last Quartets of Beethoven the great one in C sharp minor, op. 131. The intervening time will be filled by the Piano and Violin Sonata in F, op. 24 of Beethoven played by Miss Nina Perabo(?), a young pianist who comes well recommended from Dublin and Mr. Schultze's Spohr's "Gesang Scene" for violin, transcribed for him, and played by Mr. Hamm, and smaller piano solos from Mendelssohn and Chopin.

On Thursday afternoon of the week following, comes the fifth Symphony Concert.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Osgood, the young tenor who sings German Lieder so tastefully, intends to give a series of concerts at Chickering's Hall, with Mr. Dresel for accompanist, devoting one evening exclusively to Schubert, one to Mendelssohn, one to Schumann, one to Franz, with something of Bach and Mozart every time. An admirable plan, and sure to succeed.

Musical Correspondence.

Philadelphia, Dec. 30.—Sunday evening concerts have hitherto been a novelty hereabouts. The first of a projected series of these entertainments under the management and direction of Messrs. Mark and [illegible] Hassler was given last evening at Concert Hall. The audience was a very large one, the hall being uncomfortably crowded and was mainly made up of representatives of the respectability and intelligence of the city, so that the enterprise promises to prove a success. The undertaking was, in some measure hazardous, in view of the inveterate bigotry that abounds in Philadelphia, the latest manifestation of which was the Mayor and [illegible] sabbatarian ukase [illegible] upon the unoffending Sunday travel. Now that the efforts of these sabbatarian promoters of the public morals have failed in the latter regard, they will doubtless, renew them with an anxiety to stop this kind of equally unholy profanation of the Lord's day. Only however it would be prudent to meet with the same mortifying discomfiture. This was the programme presented last evening:

"Praise ye the Father" from "Athalie"	Mendelssohn.
Overture. Samson.	Beethoven.
Air: "He was Despised and Rejected"	Handel.
Miss Ellen Lemley.
"See der Fromme" from "Lohengrin"	Wagner.
Evening Song. Sung by a [illegible]	Schumann.
Mr. [illegible]
Overture. "Preciosa"	Weber.
Solo for French Horn. "Souvenir"	Lindpaint.
[illegible]
Larghetto, from 2d Symphony	Beethoven.
Recitative and Aria, "Oh! Rest among Mortals"	Schubert.
Miss Ellen Lemley.
Marche des Flambeaux	Meyerbeer.
Hymn, "Ein Feste Burg"	Luther.
Organ and Orchestra.

The Orchestra, composed of some thirty or more of our best resident instrumentalists, directed by Mr. Simon Hassler, performed the several pieces assigned to them with considerable effect. A little practice together will do the string-section harm and will make these performances something of which we shall have reason to be proud. Miss Lemley is young, and has a fresh, very powerful voice, which she needs to control more than she seemed able to do at times. Her singing of the Handel Aria was so great as the pressure upon the [illegible] was too much for [illegible] to expect that the generally agreeable impression of her singing left upon the mind will be confirmed and enhanced at another hearing, when she shall have overcome the nervousness incident to a début.

Mr. Sentz's weekly Orchestral Matinées at the Musical Fund still continue. The attendance has been encouraging and the performances satisfactory. On last Thursday the lovely sixth Symphony of Haydn—called by some the "Farewell," wherefore I know not,—was given. On previous occasions the two Piano Concertos of Mendelssohn were performed by Messrs. Jarvis and Thunder respectively with orchestral accompaniments. Of each performance I have nothing to say but praise. The Jupiter Symphony is announced for this week and Mr. Wm. Stoll, Jr., a young and very promising violinist, whose performance of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in the Germania last Saturday I particularly desire to note as a remarkably finished and interesting performance, will essay a solo.

In the removal of Mr. Hobart Allen to Chicago, we have lost one of the most brilliant and competent of our professional musicians. Mr. Allen is the son of the well known and highly esteemed Professor Allen of the University of Pennsylvania, is the possessor of a thorough musical education obtained in the best schools abroad, and has been very successful in his duties since his return. With the true spirit of an American he has gone westward where he will undoubtedly find a much more extended field of duty. He deserves the warmest welcome that the friends in his new home can extend to him. May he, happily, receive it! Mercutio.

New York, Dec. 30.—The Second Concert of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society took place on Saturday evening, Dec. 21st, with this programme:

Symphony in C	Schubert.
Pianoforte Concerto, E minor	Von Weber.
Miss Alide Topp.
Overture, "Othello"	F. Ritter.
Fantasie, "[illegible]" with Orchestra	Liszt.
Miss Topp.
Overture, "Calm Sea and happy Voyage"	Mendelssohn.

It is only within the last ten or fifteen years that this Symphony has been performed, and it is difficult to understand how such a noble work could have so long (Schubert died in 1828) remained unknown to the musical world. The opening Andante and the bars of horn solo are fitly entitled by Schumann "Horns of Elfland faintly blowing." It is easy to perceive how a work of such genius took so strong a hold as it did upon Schumann's admiration. In it there is the symmetry of Mendelssohn, the depth and breadth of Beethoven, the elaborate instrumentation and peculiar quaintness of Schumann, yet through it all the unmistakable individuality of Schubert himself.

When all the numbers are so admirable, it is impossible—without occupying too much space—to enlarge upon the merits of any particular one. The Allegretto in A minor (2d movement) is perhaps the most attractive. There is something exceedingly subtle the movement resembles the stealthy march of the low bass notes taken by the violins and contrabass. The theme itself is charming.

The Scherzo is finely worked up; the Trio in A, which breaks in upon it, being a gem. The Finale, grand and broad is a sort of foreshadowing (as it were expression) of the closing movement in Schumann's C major Symphony.

The "Othello" Overture, by F. Ritter although written in a most scholarly, logical and musician-like manner, yet lacks freshness and decided originality.

Miss Topp, a young lady of some years, and a pupil of Von Bülow, played the Weber Concerto with much [illegible] of expression and firmness of touch. The element of tenderness and feeling missed, however, in a considerable degree lacking; further there was a little uncertainty with regard to her playing, precisely with the orchestra.

It may be heterodox to hold such an opinion, but the Concerto is certainly [?] a most uninteresting composition. Miss Topp played without notes.

The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Bergmann's careful leadership, played admirably, every point of light and shade was faithfully observed and completely rendered.

On Saturday Evening, Dec. 28, the Mendelssohn Union gave in Steinway Hall the first performance of Mr. G. F. Bristow's new Oratorio "Daniel." The orchestra numbered 60, and the chorus about 150,—40 male and 110 female voices. Mr. [illegible] conducted. J. P. Morgan presided at the organ, and the soloists were Mme. Parepa-Rosa, J. R. Thomas and Miss Hutchings.

Extended analysis is out of the question, and I can only say that the work is most carefully written and scored, but many of the numbers are melodious and pleasing. The orchestral accompaniment to the chorus in A minor (No. 13) is excellent, somewhat Mendelssohnian in character; indeed there are strong suggestions of that master throughout the entire oratorio. The chorus No. 11 is very well worked up. The recitatives were all very monotonous, and were, as a rule, badly given. This was especially the case with No. 17 "To you it is commanded!" which was bellowed by the "Herald," as if it expected to taste of terror.

In the chorus No. 15 it was very evident that the soprano were by far too few, and their voices were drowned by the orchestra and the organ. It was also noticeable that the voices and instruments had not been drilled sufficiently together.

Daniel's Aria "Break off thy sins," (No. 20) is a very attractive number and was fairly sung by Mr. J. R. Thomas. He received an encore and sang a portion of the Aria again. The effect of the repetition was slightly marred by the fact that the orchestra, through some misunderstanding, were not within hailing distance of the soloist; the result was [illegible] of accord. The soprano Aria in F sharp minor is very fine, and in the hands of a first class artist would have made a most decided impression.

Mme. Parepa sang with her usual ease and taste. Mr. Thomas did finely. With regard to the tenor a charitable silence shall be maintained. Miss Hutchings sang [illegible] her voice [illegible] very [illegible] and [illegible] depth [illegible] alone [illegible] were hard and [illegible]

The audience was a very large and tolerably attentive one. The applause, however, very [illegible] was of the [illegible] and [illegible] character [illegible] have been owing to ignorance as to where the laugh came in.

It is greatly to be desired that the public should have another opportunity of hearing Mr. Bristow's works. With all the [illegible] assisted by competent artists, Daniel could not fail to make a stronger and deeper impression than it did. B.

VASSAR COLLEGE, POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.—Mr. F. L. Ritter, the accomplished musical director of this institution, has projected a series of musical soirées to be given by the pupils, resident lady teachers and artists engaged from time to time, the programmes to consist entirely of good music, like the following, for the first Soirée, Dec. 18:

PART FIRST.

Overture to "Don Juan," arranged for 2 pianos.	Mozart.
"The Sabbath Morn."	Mendelssohn.
Allegro and Adagio from the Sonata in F Major	Mozart.
Scotch Song, "[illegible]"	F. L. Ritter.
Song, "[illegible]"	Schumann.
Sonata in G Major [illegible]	Beethoven.
Wedding March, arranged for 2 hands.	Mendelssohn.

PART SECOND.

Andante and Allegro from the Symphony in [illegible] arranged for 2 hands, [illegible]	Beethoven.
Duo, "I would that my love"	Mendelssohn.
Rondo in G Major, Op. 51	Beethoven.
Song, "The Wanderer"	Robert Franz.
Andante from Sonata in [illegible] Op. [illegible]	Beethoven.
[illegible] "The Wings of Song" [illegible]	Thalberg.
Evening Song	Mendelssohn.
Overture to "La Dame Blanche," arranged for 8 hands.	Boieldieu.

THIRD ASSURANCE; LISZT.—The Western Musical Review (Indianapolis) has a letter from Leipzig, dated Oct. 25, 1867, of which the following is a specimen. The story is amusing, but so we may about the "American success."

Liszt arrived here on the 19th, and took rooms at the Hotel de Pologne. The news of his arrival spread rapidly among the students of the conservatorium, and aroused no little excitement. In the same evening a party of four or five of the American students—prompted by a wish for the romance as well as curiosity to see the famous pianist—started to find him. They traced him from place to place, until they came to the house where he was spending the evening, and it was this occasion as well as the romance and the catch a glimpse of him as he came out, but after they were endeavoring to learn positively where [illegible] in the house [illegible] they attract the attention of the host, who came to the door and inquired what they wished for. They explained that they were students from America, who were very anxious to see Liszt and were anxious to see him [illegible] the host became kindly disposed, and after a brief consultation with his wife said:

"I think I may invite you in—[illegible]—yes, I think I may"—and ushered them in to a room in the [illegible] the place every day [illegible] into a brilliantly lighted salon where was assembled a large company at the dinner. They found two young ladies playing Liszt's Faust Symphony, [illegible] arranged for two pianos while Liszt was sitting near and listening, and occasionally playing a few bars with them. Liszt was by no means displeased at the course which the young men had taken in thus visiting him without an invitation, and as they were treated to cake and wine, and besides to make them believe "as only at home" they passed a most delightful evening to the [illegible] and [illegible] listening to the playing [illegible] a wonderful artist.

Encouraged by the experience of the previous evening, one of the party (Mr. James M. Wilson, of Newport, R. I.,) called on Liszt at his rooms the next morning. His description of the affair is very laughable, and I regret that I cannot give it in full. He found Liszt on the [illegible] trying to convince an old man who came to ask an [illegible] and [illegible] ing the interview he was several [illegible] speaking in a room like so many soldiers, around each heard from Dr. Franz Brendel and other musical [illegible] very gravely and silently [illegible] permission to come. Mr. Wilson had no letter and so told solely upon American tact, [illegible] be candid, gave in Europe [illegible] he [illegible] his card with "an American" was not upon it, and he [illegible] was [illegible] for at last upon. The "[illegible]" [illegible] and he was again very kindly received. He played Chopin's E flat Polonaise which was highly complimented by Liszt, who played one piece through after he [illegible] with such remarks and suggestions as he learned and made, and honored him with an invitation to visit him in Rome.

It is the general idea in America that it is a difficult thing to gain an audience with such men as Liszt, and yet he has met an American [illegible] to extend rather than [illegible] of German [illegible] to friend. Where [illegible] on this occasion [illegible] not flatterering to artists, and it is always successful.

Upon making his way, the Americans who were [illegible] outside happened to know how he [illegible] and were [illegible] [illegible] they learned that he had not enough had a [illegible] a letter or an invitation. He says I asked the Cantata [illegible] long time to [illegible] such a course of action.

Liszt wore, when I saw him [illegible] black [illegible] [illegible] very long and [illegible] after the usual fashion for a Roman Abbé, and a broad-brimmed hat [illegible] looked rough enough to have been through a dozen campaigns. The only [illegible] of color [illegible] them [illegible] was a beautiful [illegible] rosette [illegible] [illegible] buttonhole of his coat. In person he is tall and commanding, while his large eyes peering out from under great over-arching eyebrows and his long light-colored hair, combine to give him that lion-like look which has so often been remarked.

IRISH MELODIES, by Moore and Stephenson.

Whoever spends a Sabbath in the country remote from towns and great routes of travel more especially in the South, will hear a class of tunes which strike the unaccustomed ear as peculiarly wild. For the most part they are in the minor mode, and have a strange way of modulating. Yet in these curious melodies there is a certain pathos which one will seek for in vain in the more fashionable music. There is reason to believe that these strange old airs are of Celtic origin, and quite different from our common church music. It is here attempted to give some account of their peculiarities.

These airs seem to be naturally divided into three classes. In the first class belong those which are most widely different from our ordinary music. They are derived from this scale, which we consider the true Celtic Minor Scale.

It differs from our usual minor scale in having a major sixth and minor seventh, and in being related to the major key one degree below; whereas the German minor has a minor sixth and major seventh, and is related to the major scale a minor third above. This change in the relation of the sixth and seventh, and the consequent change in modulating to the relative major, account for the peculiarly wild expression that these melodies have to Teutonic ears. We give two melodies as examples. The first is more characteristic than the second. It is called Hurry.

The second example is called Kedron.

Another class of these airs do not have the sixth at all, but by their progressions show unmistakably that they are found in the same scale as the preceding. Here again we give two examples. The first is called Tender Thought.

In accordance with the custom, I have given this most the signature of the relative major, although the characteristic F sharp is not in the melody. The whole tenor of the melodic progression is such I think, as to indicate the relative major to be G. The second example is like unto it, and is called Solemnity.

Still another class of these airs comprises those which, although founded on the same scale tones as the preceding, bear a relation to the concert major key more in accordance with the German usage. Here are the two scales:—

Scale of Tender Thought.

Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La, Si, Do, Re.

Scale of Tuckbridge.

La, Si, Do, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La.

Of this class we give also two examples. The first is full of the gloomy pathos we should expect to find in the music of the Druids. The shadows of the oak and mistletoe, and the terrible sacrifices of the old gods, are not foreign to such strains. It is called Idumea.

Slowly, with subdued tone.

The second example has none of the sombre gloom of Idumea. It has tears, but they are tears of affection rather than of grief. It is called Tuckbridge.

In comparing these with any Teutonic minor melodies we cannot fail to be struck with the entire absence of that effeminate quality that characterizes the Teutonic minor. Of this effeminacy the Germans have supplied them consciousness by their turn for distinguishing the minor scale; namely male, soft. The major they term dur, hard.

There are also Celtic melodies in the major mode. These commonly omit the fourth and seventh tones of the scale; and this has been regarded by some as a distinguishing feature, but I think, with insufficient reason. Secular melodies of Scotland and Ireland have sometimes had these tones. The following is the Celtic Major Scale. The small notes indicate tones commonly omitted in sacred airs, but used at pleasure in secular.

The minor third seems to be a favorite progression in Celtic music. In the major mode they attain this progression by almost invariably striking the sixth of the scale before the tonic. Two of these melodies follow. The first is called Bloomer.

The second example is probably the original form of Golden Hill.

The unmistakable Scotch character of the tune will, I think, be apparent to any observer. The inversion of the rhythm in the third measure (♪ for ♪.) is a Scotch peculiarity; and throughout we seem to hear the "benignant hum of that old worthy the bagpipe" as has been humorously suggested. In the correlation of phrases these airs have the peculiarity that the last phrase is a recapitulation of the first, or something of much the same purport. In Teutonic airs, on the contrary, the correspondence is between the first and third, and second and fourth phrases.

Another noticeable peculiarity is the tendency of the modulations. In this music the favorite modulations are from the major to the relative minor, or from the minor to the relative major. But in German music it is more usual to modulate into the dominant or subdominant of the prevailing key. These modulations are scarcely ever made by Celtic melodies.

There is reason to believe that these Celtic scales are identical with certain ones used by the Greeks. According to the Greek system of musical science there were three genera in music:—the Diatonic, Chromatic, and Enharmonic—and, omitting certain tones as directed by their scientific writers, their melodic scales were as follows:

DIATONIC SCALE. (Melodic form)

CHROMATIC SCALE. (Melodic form)

Digitized by Google

EUHARMONIC SCALE. (Melodic form).

The omitted tones were employed whenever, in the judgment of the composer, a good effect would result from their use. By inserting one of the omitted tones—indicated by the small notes—the Diatonic Scale becomes the Celtic Minor Scale in Eb. This form of the Chromatic is identical with the Celtic major scale. The Euharmonic gives us the Teutonic minor scale minus the fourth and seventh.

There is another class of tunes found in our church music which are less peculiarly Celtic in structure and spirit than those we have been citing, yet have a very perceptible infusion of the Celtic cast. Such are the Lowland tunes of the Scotch. Windsor, Avon, and Aylesbury are examples. Indeed I do not know of a Scotch minor melody in all our tune repertory that is unmistakably Teutonic. Somehow the German minor airs are so effeminate and depend so much upon harmonic support, that they have not been able to win their way to our people's hearts as tunes, simply. Those of these that are apparent exceptions to the sweeping charge are those whose ethos of the Celtic more than average Germany so ages long gone by. Some of these tunes are evidently remnants of old English carols, which in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, were sung by itinerant minstrels, mostly of Celtic blood. The following air is a case in point.

GOLDEN CITY.

What can be more appropriate than this melody to Barry Cornwall's beautiful lyric, commencing:

> "There is a land immortal,
> The beautiful of lands;
> Beside its ancient portal
> A silent sentry stands.
> He only can undo it,
> And open wide the door;
> And mortals who pass through it
> Are mortals never more."

Those of our readers who are familiar with Helmore's "Carols of the Sixteenth Century" will readily observe the similarity of quantities between Golden City and the carol "Paul at Athens"* in that book. These carols, be it remembered, were the tunes of itinerant minstrels. The only itinerants who sing such strains now-a-days are those of the white canvas. Can their nomadic life affect their musical taste?

Many of the structural peculiarities of this music may justly be referred, I think, to the fact that from time immemorial the bag-pipe seems to have been the national instrument of the Celtic race. It certainly was known to the Greeks and Romans, and we are told by Suetonius that Nero, among his various musical accomplishments, was a bag-pipe-player. The well-known peculiarity of this instrument is that one or more tones are kept sounding throughout a musical performance constituting what is called a drone. The upper tone of the drone is in unison with the lower tone of the chanter—or that part of the instrument is called which plays the melody—while the lower tone is an octave below. This constant buzzing of the tonic requires the whole melody to contain few tones not consonant with it. The Celtic scales are developed from one point of crystallization, the tonic; but Teutonic* scales crystallize around three points: the tonic, subdominant and dominant.

It does not appear that the Celts ever practised part-singing, further than for a portion of the chorus to perform a drone while others sang a melody. Like Nature's songsters, the Celts delighted to pour out their artless tuneful melodies. The more civilized and artificial Teuton on the contrary delights in the changing devices of counterpoint and the rich luxuriance of modern harmony. Between two such beautiful charmers how shall we choose?

* Query. Why not Teu-tonic instead of Teutonic?

* Also given in Dr. Lowell Mason's "Hallelujah."

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY EMIL BRUMBER

If now we examine Schütz's four Passions, taken from the Gospels, and composed a capella, when he was in his 80th year, compositions springing from so many artistic elements inherent in the period itself or handed down by it and from the harmonic realization of these which was already taking place in the composer's mind, we cannot help confessing that it was these works which really prepared the ground on which oratorio could be raised to Bach and Handel, its last pinnacles. With the exception of the congregational part, we here find strongly marked the musical elements and the spirit characterizing Sebastian Bach's Matthäus-Passion. Here, as there, the separate personages introduced speaking the text of the Bible are, in opposition to the previous four-part system adopted for the whole Passion, treated as single voices, that is represented by a recitative-like or melodic solo, though the form is sounder with Schütz than with Bach. In Schütz's Matthäus-Passion, this solo treatment rises on one occasion even into a formal and regularly finished "Duet of the false Witnesses." As was the case in Bach, and seven times in the Matthäus before him the narrating Evangelist also, is musically personified. But the similarity between these two German composers, separated from each other by an entire century, is most astonishingly evident in the short "Jews' choruses," coming in with great dramatic effect and full of passionate emotion, in the Passions according to St. Matthew of both. The parts of these choruses, consisting of musical exclamations, or the characteristically and sharply marked tone-phrases, are, when examined in score, like each other even as far as the eye is concerned to say nothing of the musically so crouching and aggressive spirit embodied in them. In Schütz no less than in Bach, entreatingly Christ is introduced speaking: there is a wonderfully glorious and overflowing handling of the melody in the recitative, besides much more we might mention. But one great difference between them is that Schütz, who, considering also he is but may be placed side by side with Bach even as an instrumental composer, was the greatest and first operatic composer in Germany, while Bach was limited to sacred and instrumental music. Schütz was, therefore there can be no question—though the fact in no way detracts from Bach's greatness—the more varied and more objective of the two masters, and for this reason we can speak of his subsequently exerting an influence upon Handel, who, for plastic objectivity was superior to the ideal Bach. Only as we shall see later there Christian and classical element that Schütz in his Operas and Passions kept tolerably distinct were destined to be blended by Handel in our and the more kind of work, namely Oratorio, which, in consequence, then first rose to all the importance of a musical epic.*

Among Schütz's successors in Germany, we must distinguish Sebastiani, born at Weimar in 1622, died 1672. His Passion was probably the first in Germany that could boast of a complete instrumental accompaniment: 2 violins, 4 viols, 1 bass continuo, with organ, lutes, theorbos, and viola di gamba. We must likewise mention Johann Theile, born 1646, at Naumburg (the reader will remark that Saxony and Thuringia were still the scene of the development of this entire branch of art), died 1724.

While these two masters, who belonged principally [illegible] a bet in a German more was a national tendency as exemplified for oratorio in the retention of Luther's rendering of the text of the Gospel, a rendering as much adapted to the sentiments of Protestantism, and as the addition of a new and popular element, by the introduction of the congregational part in the form of those chorales, with which the people were all acquainted, and which they had sung for a century, we perceive oratorio at the same period in Italy becoming more and more restricted to art music properly so called, and a public previously schooled to understand it. The most musical masters in this style are Marco Marazzoli, born at Parma, in 1600, died 1662, who produced about twenty oratorios, and the great Alessandro Scarlatti born at Trapani, Sicily in 1659 died at Naples in 1725.

With the beginning of the 18th century we meet in Germany the forerunners of Handel; among others, Reinhard Keiser. This musician—born in a village between Weissenfels and Leipzig in 1673, died at Hamburg in 1739—rendered good service by the way to the development of opera in Germany. We possess no less than 116 works of a dramatic nature by him. He was, also, very fertile in the sphere of Oratorio, including oratorio itself and oratorio allied to it. We may mention his Christmas Cantata, his Passion as a poem by Brockes, his Passion according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, and his oratorios: Der für die Sünde der Welt gemarterte Jesus (Jesus the Martyr for the Sins of the World); Der zum Tode verurtheilte und gekreuzigte Jesus (Jesus condemned to Death and crucified), &c.—Mattheson too, born in 1681 at Hamburg, died in 1764, who wrote 24 oratorios, and Telemann, born in 1681 at Magdeburg, died in 1767 though both saw the light of the world only three years before Handel, and so were friends of his, must be counted among his forerunners.*

To prove this, we need only remind the reader that Handel did not seriously devote himself to Oratorio till he had attained the age of fifty, while most of the labors of Mattheson and Telemann in the same field are to be referred to the middle age of both, and consequently may have influenced what Handel did.

While calling these men forerunners of Handel, we would not be misunderstood. Just as little can Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher or even Marlowe when regarded from a higher point of view be termed the forerunners of Shakespeare, with whom all they have in common is merely a general likeness in the form, the persons, and the language of their pieces, a superficial connection of affinity as regards the selection and treatment of their subjects, and a vague kind of family resemblance, characterizing generally their time and nation. Keiser, Mattheson and Telemann did not furnish Handel with more than canvass, colors, and frames, that is, so to speak, the materials with which the great master was to work. In this instance, also, it is merely the outward habit which connects with immortal genius those men, who, however eminent in their own day, possessed only talent. With regard, however, to pregnancy of ideas, to realization and idealization of artistic form, to depth of feeling, or grandeur of sentiment their productions compared to Handel's are like copper to gold.

Before considering the position occupied by Handel whom we feel inclined to regard as the father of pure tone-poetry in the real and more restricted sense of the word, we have to say a few words concerning the place of his great contemporary Sebastian Bach, with reference to Oratorio.

Johann Sebastian Bach, who, as we all know, was born in 1685, at Eisenach, and died at Leipsic in 1750, represents the acme of all Christian sacred music, as developed from the introduction of the Gregorian cantus planus, about the end of the 14th century till past the beginning of the 18th, that is, the last blossom of a development of more than a thousand years. We find, therefore, in his works, the results won by the great Netherlandish, Italian, and German masters, on the Roman Catholic side, in the 15th, 16th 17th, and 18th centuries, that is to say, before, contemporaneously with and after the Reformation, in formal nature and deeply intense religious expression, and we find them combined with the evangelical and popular spirit peculiar to Protestant church music which sprang from the song and the choral, the Passion Plays and the Passion Oratorios.* It is, therefore, self-evident that the master's compositions, even as regards their form, but frequently by means, I am considering their passionate expression, his Matthew-Passion and his Johannes-Passion, the all which would make of him, must be permeated by a touch of thoroughly lyrical feeling since each, as we have already shown, was innate in all church-music. What strikes us in these is not only the outbursts of pity, pain, idealized love, or sorrow in the composer's heart, worked up by him, on contemplating the martyrdom of the Lord, the uttermost limits of feeling. We may see it as exemplifying what we have said, the, emotional, and apparently as dramatic chorus, "Sind Blitze, sind Donner verschwunden." In the Matthew-Passion a chorus which is, at once, has the echo of the communion in Bach's own mind, and the ideal congregation connected with him. Not looking back beyond Bach's masterpieces, we can see the connection again with a more remote period of semi-secular-religious Mysteries, which merely at present half as a more idle play and a simple manner. In an old French Mystery the Angels address to God the Father who is with the Son during the Crucifixion of his Son, the famous words "Seigneur n'en aurez-vous pas honte d'estre telement votre fils?"—We cannot, I believe, deny that the "Jews' Chorus" in the Matthew-Passion is characterized by thoroughly human life, but this, also, springs from a state of the composer's soul, wrought up by subjective emotion. Such was absorbed in contemplating the sufferings and the death of our Lord that the whole chain of events has become a fact immediately present to him and is, therefore, portrayed in his inward vision a plastic fullness, and with the most expressive intimations. The events on all sides merely His own salvation but that of the whole world depends, are no more events long since past, he himself is an eye-witness of them, he feels them as directly actual and true. Thus his highly wrought mode of expression appears to be no more than the other side of that religious lyricism and ecstasy which is mirrored in the devout chorales, sometimes carried to too great a pitch of painful emotion, in the treatment of the vocal parts, in the airs and duets, as even in the manner, so profoundly lyrical, in which the recitative of the narrating Evangelist is treated. If we remember, in conjunction with this, the way, characterized now, as it were, by timidity, now by growing confidence, and now again by child-like endearments, with which Bach addresses the Saviour, as he would his dearest friend, using such expressions, for instance as "Liebe süsse seele liebstes," in the conclusion of the Matthäus-Passion, in the chorale Gottes Zeit as in the cantata of that son who possessed, perhaps more inward affinity with him than any of the others, Christian Bach (1735—1782) "Ich lasse Dich nicht!" where the soprano voices exclaim so fervently "Mein Jesu!" besides answering with the whole chorus "Ich lasse Dich nicht," we must feel convinced beyond a doubt that Bach was connected only in a secondary degree with epic poetry. This is apparent moreover from the limited number of his Oratorios. Properly speaking he possessed only two, since we can scarcely include the Christmas Cantata among them. In these two works, also, Christ appears as the personal object of the love of Bach's soul, his friend, and rock—as the one only central point of his thoughts and feelings.

How different it is with Handel, with whom we may conclude our sketch, since he stands before us as the real founder of the musical Epic, and, in the same line—the Homer—as the model, which never has been, and probably never will be, surpassed of the whole branch of art.

The profound and characteristic difference between Bach and Handel is that Bach represents the highest point to which the development of sacred music attained under purely Christian influences only. Handel, on the other hand, is the very highest master of the style that of necessity resulted from the alliance of Christian civilization and humanity with the traditions of classical culture and views as handed down through the period of the Renaissance. If consequently Bach excels Handel in evangelical enthusiasm, even as in fervor of expression if, as a far more subjective and more passionate nature, he gives himself up to Christ as the ideally Beloved One of his soul that which say, if he deserves to be called the best in every sense where the composer steps in the foreground with his own personal feeling in Handel, on the other hand, we are first struck with that objectivity and varied power of expression which all in as easy on the most opposite subjects with equally inexhaustible plastic capability, marks the true poet when at forget at his work. In Handel we are first struck with that greatness and boldness, that glowing heroism, distinguishing alike the hero, and him who sings the hero's deeds. It was, therefore, Handel who first showed us in music as in other arts, the true interpreter in all the purity of his kind that is, freed from everything tending to restrict the work of art. The fact is the more significant because, though, as we have already remarked, Oratorio was more favorable to biblical subjects than the Epic the Oratorio was not destined to give the predominance, before the secular and heroic element took its place of sentiment more particularly subject as in the case of the whole composition. As a matter of course, a great national bard, as a hero, is all his solitary, is not conceivable without a God without moral precepts, and strict grandeur to which in the case of Handel must be added the fact that the class of subjects previously prevailing in oratorios, as well as his own feeling, caused him to find the most lofty theme and the source of all that is great in the one primitive God of the Old and New Testament. But as the very fact that he did not treat that God merely according to the New Testament, so evangelically; not, as a word merely communally and subjectively, like Sebastian Bach, but Handel's heroic-ideal one. For him the God of Joshua, Jephtha, Samson, and Solomon though in his oratorio the same is not according to the period and vision portrayed by Handel the New Testament God of The Messiah, but the national God of Israel, conceived entirely in the spirit of the Old Testament; a zealous God, who, by his miracles, though still more by the arms of the heroes aroused by him, chastises the Heathen the Philistines; a God who takes vengeance even unto the third and fourth generation, leading His chosen people from punishment and repentance to victory and triumph. While, however, in the composer's soul, the humanity resulting from his Christian culture is wedded to the Heroic principle, he raises the story of the Jewish heroes, as Homer raises the Iliad, to the Universally-Human, or the absolutely Beautiful and Sublime. In the morally elevated and pure enthusiasm of such choruses as "O mach' uns frei, von unserer Feinde Tyrannei!" in Judas Maccabæus, or the nobly moderated delight of victory in the triumphal song "See the conquering Hero comes," from Joshua, the most civilized people of the present day thinking of the struggle for their freedom, or surrounding their hero after a well-won battle, might take part.

Schubert's Symphony in C.

From the Crystal Palace Programme.

The estimation in which the instrumental works of Schubert are now held in England is a remarkable instance of a sudden growth of reputation, after a long period of neglect. Twenty years ago, it is not too much to say, that, except in one or two, to the musical public of England, Schubert was known only as a writer of songs. No concert programmes, none of the numbers of the musical societies, at that time ever included a sonata, a quartet, or a trio of his. His Symphony in C major had been rejected with ridicule by the leading band of the metropolis even though presented to them by so high a judge than Mendelssohn himself—in fact, his existence as an instrumental writer was absolutely unknown to the public. Since that time however things have materially altered for the better. Schubert's Sonatas, Impromptus, Moments musicales, and other pianoforte works, are among the most favorites at our most popular concerts, and divide the honors with those of Beethoven himself. His Quartets and Trios are now constantly heard, and within the last few years his great orchestral works are beginning to force their way to that high level in the popular favor to which their great merits will doubtless fully entitle them. Of the last mentioned works the most important are his Symphonies. Of these he left behind him—in a more or less perfect state—nine, of which the following is a complete list:—

No. 1.	In D major
" 2.	In B flat,	1815.
" 3.	In D,	1815.
" 4.	In C minor—"Tragische Sinfonie,"	—1816.
" 5.	In B flat,	1816.
" 6.	In C major	1818.
" 7.	In E,	1821.
" 8.	In B minor,	1822.
" 9.	In C major	1828—the year of his death.

Of these, all but two (Nos. 7 and 8) are complete. Of No. 8, the two first movements alone were finished. The MS. is clean and unblotted as any fair manuscript by a copyist, but with a singular gran and neatness in the writing, which marks the hand of the dear composer himself, breaks off abruptly at the will of the scherzo.

The adagio and andante were lately published and are well known to the audience of the Crystal Palace Concerts, having been performed on the 6th April and 5th October last. No. 7 exists MS. indeed, in a sketch only in a sketch. It was first heard of in the possession of Mendelssohn, who is said to have commenced orchestrating it, but it would appear that it is no longer to be found among his remains. No. 1, the work which is to be played to-day, was published at the instance of Schumann and Mendelssohn, in 1840. The remainder are still in MS. in a dusty cupboard, in the house of Dr. Schneider, a well-known amateur of Vienna, and since the writer had the honor and pleasure of examining them during a visit to that city in 1860 he was recently enabled to make through the kindness of the Directors of the Crystal Palace, who were ready to adopt any suggestion for increasing the interest and worth of the Saturday Concerts. Dr. Schneider was good enough to permit copies of Nos. 4 and 6 to be taken and it is hoped that before long an opportunity will occur of presenting some portions at least of one or both to the Crystal Palace audience, and it may be a revival. Hardly less interesting that that of Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony. I take the opportunity to mention that in the same rehearsal I was fortunate enough to discover the whole manuscripts of Schubert's music to the "Drama of Rosamunde" — which portions have been already played here — the original part-books, lying as they had probably lain since the first representations at the Theater an der Wien 1823.

The original MS. of the Grand Symphony No. 9 in C major, which is played to-day, is in the library of the Musik-Verein in Vienna, where I examined it in company with Mr. Sullivan. The volume consists of 4[illegible] pages in oblong quarto. The handwriting, like Schubert's usual autograph, is perfectly neat and distinct, except where it has been altered by the composer. The alterations are confined almost entirely to the first three movements, but in those they abound. The fact of their alteration is remarkable, because in general Schubert did not make alterations. His scores are usually very free from them. He appears to have written under the influence of a kind of immediate inspiration without rough sketches or any of the other processes to which great musicians commonly resort — as Michael Angelo is said to have hewn his statues straight from the marble, and when once written he appears as a rule, never to have returned to his work. Indeed, the rapidity with which his compositions succeeded one another is almost incredible. In the opera of Fierabras the 1st act, consisting of [illegible] large pages, [illegible] in [illegible] days, between the [illegible] and [illegible] May 1823, the 2nd act, 300 pages in [illegible] days between the [illegible] May and the [illegible] June. The last movement of this [illegible] quartett, by no means restricted in length, was finished off in the dead of a night. In these [illegible] half, the hour and minute of beginning and ending being carefully noted by Schubert himself. And as each of these compositions was no sooner completed than [illegible] a fiery musical artist [illegible] to the shore or [illegible] and it could have had no opportunity of recovering. The C major symphony, however, almost of all his symphonies, is an exception to this rule. He seems to have felt how it was to be [illegible], and gone over it and almost acted severally. [illegible] had passed since he threw off the [illegible] beautiful fragments in B minor [illegible] The interval was occupied by chamber music, operas, and vocal music of all descriptions, and now that he summoned his highest order of orchestral composition he set his ideas down. [illegible] only one alone, namely the Song of the Sours. It was composed in March and on the 19th November he was no longer alive. What is more proven than its [illegible] its noble sentiments to the amazingly careful and authentic and correct [illegible] the first three movements were [illegible] — the lovely opening phrase for the horns which forms the theme of the introduction has been [illegible] subject of the allegro — and [illegible] a considerable part of the movement was completed, so that the correction had to be made over and over again. In the andante there are many alterations of minute moment but the most remarkable of all is in the adagio [illegible] the [illegible] a beautiful and [illegible] effect is produced by the sudden introduction of a new melody which after being played by the flute in the key of C, [illegible] by the [illegible] and first violin in C minor, a change which [illegible] [illegible] the whole of this passage [illegible] [illegible] between the [illegible] of the [illegible] previously written. The Finale shows a [illegible] from corrections; the hand of the composer seems to [illegible] carried him in [illegible] a [illegible] of the glorious music itself.

It is impossible in the limits of a concert programme to give any description or analysis of the [illegible] work. Nor is it less difficult to single out any part of so splendid a work as this Symphony for especial notice, where all parts [illegible] as the full of beauty and grandeur. But if a writer may be allowed to mention that which affects him most, he would mention the opening and the finale, and perhaps [illegible] the [illegible] the movement. There is something inexpressibly magical in the soft opening phrase for the horns alone, with its [illegible] of the strings to its close. In the slow movement there is a wonderfully touching passage where the horn seems to [illegible] note after note, and [illegible] the orchestra is all hushed and still, as if an angel had descended into the room and were [illegible] among the instruments. But should we not [illegible] others, they are all eclipsed by the finale, which is one of the most glorious, if not the most glorious movement in the whole realm of music. It is one [illegible] of impetuous passion from beginning to end, with a rhythm so strongly marked that it is impossible to resist it [illegible].

Nothing is [illegible] of Schubert's [illegible] of his [illegible] in this movement as what pictures to [illegible]

(if any) be had in his mind. [illegible] sentiment of the writer which [illegible] somewhat fanciful and [illegible] (and [illegible] after all) may perhaps be pardoned in [illegible] the [illegible]. According to this legend, then, the finale represents the story of Phaeton and the Horses of the Sun. It opens with a [illegible] of the wood and [illegible] the very [illegible] and [illegible] interview between [illegible] Phaeton [illegible]. It is equally great. Phaeton [illegible] the chariot and takes [illegible] round with the reins. Then off they go the team pulling hard, as horses of the sun should pull. Once or twice he manages to arrest their pace, but only [illegible] and they soon resume their furious course. Then comes a passage describing their [illegible], which conveys to perfection the feeling of the wavering and [illegible] down to the [illegible]. After this, the second [illegible] and [illegible] Phaeton [illegible]. The sky is dying and the hill [illegible] begin to blaze from the sun. The [illegible] and together and begin to [illegible] At last [illegible] the [illegible] youth can no longer control them, and the steeds [illegible] with the [illegible] of their [illegible] and [illegible] into the waters of the Adriatic. — So far the legend which need not [illegible] repeat with [illegible] Phaeton or no Phaeton all [illegible] allow that the finale is a perfect marvel of spirit and vigorously [illegible] to be the [illegible] of [illegible].

Vocal Music.

[From "The Voice in Singing," from the German of Emma Seiler.]

It is a matter of complaint among all persons of good taste who take an intelligent interest in art, and especially in music, that the singers are becoming more and more rare [illegible] formerly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] lack of [illegible] the [illegible]. The [illegible] all [illegible] without reason, when we [illegible] in [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] very [illegible] [illegible] the last century and come down to the present. The [illegible] shows us plainly that the art of singing has descended from its former high estate, and is now in a condition of decline. When we consider what is said in the [illegible] works of [illegible] Burney, Kiesewetter, Brendel and others, and compare it with our present poverty in good voices and skilful singers, we are forced to [illegible] of the voices that [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] as well as [illegible] the [illegible] of singers — male and female — appearing at the same time.

* * * It appears that far greater demands were made upon singers than than nowadays. At least, history celebrates, together with the great men [illegible] of the [illegible], the unsurpassed beauty of their singing, the noble tone, the thoroughly cultivated [illegible] by which they showed themselves [illegible], and produced upon their hearers an effect of [illegible].

On the other hand, how sad is the condition of vocal art in our own time. How few artists by cultivated voices are there! And the best that there are, [illegible] they are used up and [illegible]. Among [illegible] and more recently Tichatschek, are exceptions to be made.

Mediocre talent is now often sought, and rewarded far beyond its desert. One is often tempted to think that the public at large has [illegible] a [illegible] capacity of judgment when he [illegible] the reputation of one of [illegible]. Let a singer, male or female, only [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] than [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] is [illegible] out of place, [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible]. In fact, we [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] no [illegible] [illegible] comment. Let the personal appearance of the [illegible] be handsome and prepossessing, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] about [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible]. The [illegible] of the art of singing [illegible] to the [illegible] of good voices and [illegible] of voices is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To [illegible] it appears as the [illegible] consequence of [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] the art of singing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] developed [illegible] [illegible] its [illegible] of perfection.

* * * The art of a [illegible] in [illegible] of the seventeenth century in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] more and more by [illegible] of the opera, [illegible], the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at the composition. This rendered necessary to the singer the most thorough aesthetic culture, going hand in hand with the culture of the vocal organ. For only thus could he succeed in acting upon the souls of his hearers, in moving them and carrying them along with him in the emotions of [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible] ruled. The dramatic [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] is still [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] conception of the music. [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] of the voice (Tonbildung) and to the [illegible] of [illegible] of our modern [illegible] [illegible] in the art of singing, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] element — the decline of this art [illegible] in part to be [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] the [illegible] of those [illegible] singing masters [illegible] and [illegible] have [illegible] more and more [illegible] [illegible] of the present day [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] what is [illegible] by them. This is [illegible] the beautiful tone of voice (Tonansatz) which must be considered the foundation and first [illegible] of fine singing, is more and more [illegible] [illegible] male and female, and [illegible] [illegible] importance to [illegible] perfect form to the creations of the sculptor.

But the [illegible] [illegible] technical education of the earlier singers [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in order to [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]. The applause of the [illegible] [illegible] such [illegible] to become the fashion among artists. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] them [illegible]. By the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] into the hands of [illegible] singers, who [illegible] [illegible] the female voice. In accordance with their own [illegible] which could not be otherwise than [illegible] the [illegible] existing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the difference between the male and female [illegible] of [illegible]. As, in our [illegible], people are [illegible] to [illegible] that they know all about [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] undertake anything, [illegible] [illegible] singing is generally [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by many persons [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] thorough acquaintance with the organs of singing, what comprehensive knowledge of all the [illegible] of [illegible] and what aesthetic and general culture, the teaching of singing requires. Very few persons [illegible] clearly understand what is meant by the education of a voice, and [illegible] what qualifications [illegible] and [illegible] should be [illegible]. The [illegible], for instance, is very [illegible] [illegible] every musician, whatever may be the branch of music to which he is devoted, and especially every singer, is qualified to give instruction in singing. As [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] such is the wide diffusion and popularity of music beyond all the other arts, that the want of a [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] of a recognized sound method of [illegible] becomes more and more urgent, and although we have in these times distinguished singers, male and female, as well as skilful teachers, yet the number is very small and by no means equal to the demand.

[illegible] every evil as soon as it is felt to be such, so is [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] removal, already in various [illegible] attempts are making in the department of the [illegible] of singing, to restore it as perfectly as possible to its former [illegible] [illegible] and if possible to a [illegible] [illegible] higher condition. It was natural that the attempt should first of all be made to revive the old Italian method of instruction, and that [illegible] strict adherence to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] down to us [illegible] we should [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] vocal music was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Without considering [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] any [illegible] — and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] — [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that any [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] anything [illegible] know how to educate a voice. Thus many [illegible] of Italians have become popular teachers in other countries.

The old Italian method of instruction, in which vocal music owed its high condition [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] old singing masters taught only according to a sure and [illegible] feeling for the beautiful, [illegible] by their faculty of [illegible] observation, which enabled them to do [illegible] of what belongs to a sure [illegible]. Their [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] without [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But after the true and natural way has once been forsaken, and for so long a period only [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] have been heard and taught, [illegible] almost impossible by [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] old and proper method of teaching. With our higher degree of culture, men and things have greatly changed. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] longer [illegible] [illegible] and content to [illegible] [illegible] the true within the [illegible] of scientific principles.

[illegible] [illegible] has already done much to [illegible] the formation of musical forms [illegible] art. Mathematics and physics have established the principal laws of sound and the processes of [illegible] in accordance with which our musical instruments are now constructed. Philosophical inquiries have succeeded also in discovering the eternal and unchangeable laws of the art upon which the musical influences of melody, harmony and rhythm depend, and in thus giving to composition [illegible] and forms [illegible] which no one can now [illegible]. And more recently Professor Helmholtz, in his great work, "Die Lehre von den Tonempfindungen," has given to organs of all kinds a scientific ground and basis. But for the science of the human voice, in singing science has as yet furnished only a few lights. The well known experiments of Johannes Müller upon the larynx give us all that was known, until very recently, respecting the functions of the organs of singing. Many singing masters have sought to found their methods of instruction upon these discoveries [illegible] at the same time putting forth the boldest [illegible] in regard to the functions of the organs of singing in the living subject. But they have thus [illegible] than these modern men, so [illegible] reference to the formation of the voice [illegible] the [illegible] of their pupils, and for the rest let them sing as they please.

These partial treatments of science, and the unfortunate results of its application, have injured the art of singing more than benefited it, and created a prejudice against all scientific investigations in this quarter among the most distinguished artists and teachers as well as among those who take an intelligent interest in the department of music. It is a pretty common opinion that science has nothing to do with the improvement of voice and nothing for the culture and preservation of the voice in singing. And the belief all regarding science and art as opposed to each other renders it extremely difficult [illegible] a hearing for the results of thorough scientific inquiry in this direction.

Science itself admits that it can neither create artistic talent nor supply the place of it, but only furnish [illegible] aids. Besides, with the whole vast nature of music, no forms of thought [illegible] have anything to do. It has [illegible] Through [illegible] of sound, the expression of emotions as they rise in the human soul with respect themselves [illegible] It is [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the tone. It speaks directly to our consciousness. At [illegible] in every human being, and is enabled to form for itself a [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] deep in human nature. The [illegible] shows that festivals with songs as the expression of their devotion [illegible] and nations of [illegible]. [illegible] the [illegible] as the [illegible] of their poetry and regarded it as the chief aid in the culture of the mind.

But together with its purely internal character as its [illegible] and formal side, for it can act [illegible] to the æsthetic feeling, and to [illegible] this feeling [illegible] the right feeling, so it [illegible] he understands how to read and [illegible].

Everything [illegible] it is to be made [illegible] to the perceptions of others, requires a form which [illegible] material, as well as instruments, may be more or less perfect, [illegible] which all that [illegible] the sphere of our perceptions, [illegible] To discover and establish the natural laws which form the basis of all our forms of art is the office of science; to fashion and [illegible] these forms and [illegible] the task of art. In singing, the [illegible] in tones [illegible] and [illegible] for the expression of every [illegible] of feeling. To set forth the natural laws by which these tones are produced is the business of physiology and physics.

This is then not only no useless [illegible] to the art of singing, but a physiological and a physical [illegible], a [illegible] exact knowledge, appreciation, observance, and study of which [illegible] should be observed and [illegible] as [illegible] of [illegible] possible.

In the physiological [illegible] vocal art we have to do with the [illegible] and strength of the organ of singing in the act of uttering sound, and under the [illegible] of sound [illegible] take place in certain tones (the [illegible] being transcended).

The physical [illegible] comprehends the [illegible] and control of the air flowing in vibrations of sound from the lungs through the trachea, and the position of the [illegible] glands and parts of the mouth which serve as a sounding-board to the voice.

But the evidence of vocal art, and the spectral [illegible] of the form [illegible] the seventh, comprise the whole domain of [illegible] and poetic beauty.

Musical Correspondence

NEW YORK, JAN. [illegible]—The [illegible] of Mason and Thomas's concerts of chamber music (for the present season) took place in Irving Hall on Saturday evening, Jan. [illegible] The artists were Theo. Thomas, 1st violin; Mosenthal, 2d; Matzka, 1st viola; [illegible] Bergner, 'cello; and S. B. Mills, piano. I subjoin the programme:—

[illegible] string	Mozart
Sonata A, op. 47, piano and violin	Beethoven
Quartet, [illegible] string (posthumous)	Schubert

Curiously an attractive array. The Quintet was well and [illegible] played [illegible] I need scarcely [illegible] [illegible] I may particularize the Adagio, which was played with sweet strength and [illegible] effect. The sprightly Finale in G major has the genuine, fresh [illegible] Mozartean inspiration.

Mr. Mills made his first appearance in public, [illegible] his return from Europe in the famous "Kreutzer" Sonata. He was warmly greeted and created a favorable impression by his performance of his portion of that work. There seemed, [illegible] however a [illegible] want of clearness and crispness in certain passages in the first movement, as also (less noticeably) in the Finale. I have heard this Sonata played by Arabella Goddard and Joachim and the performance seemed [illegible] perfect.

Mr. Thomas played superbly. We have gradually become so accustomed to that gentleman's [illegible] [illegible] anything which he undertakes, that we sometimes overlook the fact that he is one of our finest violinists. His performance will not compare unfavorably with that of Joachim in the [illegible] In [illegible] he deserves the greater credit for acquitting himself so well, because, just in the middle of the first movement, one of his violin strings snapped and an interruption and delay of some minutes was thereby occasioned. Such an accident [illegible] of course [illegible] and [illegible] Mr. T.'s coolness and [illegible] were notable.

The Schubert Quartet was given with much élan. The most interesting movements are the Andante ("Song of Death") and the Finale; the latter is the [illegible] most fanciful and most fascinating thing which one can imagine [illegible] To describe the Andante is simply to [illegible] it cannot be described. It suggests—in some [illegible] way—Bürger's "Lenore."

The audience was not large—three, or perhaps, two hundred people present—and the hall was uncomfortably chilly. The concert was [illegible] long owing to Mr. Thomas's violin accident and to the fact that the [illegible] did not commence until quarter after eight.

Great credit is due to these faithful and unfaltering artists for their earnest endeavors to advance the standard of Art in our city.

NEW YORK, JAN. 13.—Mr. Thomas's 3d Symphony Soirée was given on Saturday evening, Jan. 11 at Steinway Hall. Mr. Mills was the solo performer and the programme was as follows:

8th Symphony, op. 93	Beethoven.
Lieder [illegible] "und Frühlingsnacht."	Schumann.
Mme. Dalgh.
[illegible] and Rondo, [illegible]	Chopin.
[illegible]
[illegible]	Liszt.
Lieder "[illegible]" and "Cupido"	Schubert.
Fest-Ouverture, (posthumous)	Mendelssohn.
Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81	Schumann.

The 8th Symphony with its Hayden [?] Allegretto and vivacious Finale is perhaps somewhat [illegible] and [illegible] in the [illegible] of the noble series of symphonic works which have so justly established the undying fame of Beethoven. The orchestra was particularly excellent in those rapid transitions from fortissimo to pianissimo, which are so characteristic of the [illegible] movement: the [illegible] crescendo passages in the latter were admirably [illegible].

The Schumann and Schubert Lieder were robbed by the coarse and slovenly manner in which they were sung by a new aspirant for public favor, Mme. Dalgh. It was evident that she had not the slightest conception of the significance of passages which [illegible] and overflows the "Ich grolle nicht." Farther [illegible] [illegible] the effect was terribly harrowing.

Liszt's so-called Poem was what [illegible] the usual sort: the usual waiting for the appearance of an idea, the usual agonizing suspense, the usual rapid changes of key and the usual want of form, [illegible] or purpose. It seemed as if some member of the orchestra, whose province it might be to make prominent some theme or melody, had been unable to make his appearance, and that the "Poem" had been [illegible] without him—in other words, Hamlet with the role of Hamlet omitted.

Refreshing and cheering, after this "Liszt" performance, came the Genoveva Overture, which is the genuine, prophetic, future music. Something for which a thorough and loving appreciation shall yet come.

Mr. Mills played the heavenly Romance (from the Chopin Concerto) delightfully; he wove the [illegible] of touch and tenderness of feeling that is that exquisitely romantic music. The Rondo was given with the crisp strong manipulation which constitutes one of the marked features of his artistic excellence. The Franz Schumann [illegible] second [illegible]—a most attractive composition and most artistically rendered—[illegible] a hearty double encore as is [illegible] To this Mr. Mills responded, in the first instance, by simply bowing, and in the second upon the renewal of the applause, by playing a charming Étude in C sharp minor by Chopin.

The audience was large and really appreciative. There seemed to be a very general and kindly satisfaction manifested in the substitution of Mr. Mills, as soloist, for Mr. De Meyer who had been announced to appear at this Soirée.

NEW YORK, JAN. 13.—On the evening of the 8th inst. Mr. A. Dossert began a series of his "Grand Concerts (Sacred-grand)" at Steinway Hall with the following programme:—

Andante and Allegro, Offertory in E major, for the Organ.	L. Dossert.
Mr. E. Dossert.
"Ich liebe Dich"	Händel.
H. Colburn.
Quartet, [illegible] op. [illegible] strings	Cell [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
Grand Valse of th[illegible]	A. Thomas.
Mme. E. Dalgh.
Mr. Jules Topp.
Andante [illegible] Violin.	Ferd. David.
Mr. L. Heyland.
[illegible] No. 1 Op. 36, [illegible]	F. Mendelssohn.
[illegible]
Mme. E. Dalgh and H. Colburn.
Grand [illegible]	Liszt.
Mr. Jules Topp.

The unique feature of this enterprise consists in the fact that in each concert two string Quartets are to be performed, with, of course, the usual amount of trash to float them.

When we consider the paucity, nowhere in New York of late [illegible] and cultivated listeners, we hardly feel disposed to blame Mr. Dossert for treating the public to a conglomeration so anomalous as the above list, in which the beautiful F minor Quartet "shines like a rich jewel in an Ethiop's ear."

And even [illegible] this beautiful work, so bright with Mendelssohn's own peculiar charm, with its wavering lights and shadows delicately blended—[illegible] was almost murdered outright by [illegible] playing; but it was only in the passage marked [illegible] that the violins and 'cellos [illegible] of that [illegible] and [illegible] of design which is the charm of quartet playing.

The other Quartet is [illegible] enough in its construction, but weak and [illegible], untouched by what somebody calls "the Promethean fire of genius."

Mr. Dresel's organ [illegible] were decidedly French [illegible] but were well played.

We refer [illegible] to the [illegible] of the "Flying Dutchman" and [illegible] of the past [illegible] in the spirit of [illegible], we may as well ask why it is that Mr. Trapp [illegible] his cleverness, devotes her really fine talents to the thankless performance of Liszt's rambling and [illegible] pianoforte pieces which, whatever merits they may be said to possess, are certainly most [illegible] distracting.

The other solo performances were not remarkable.

The next concert [illegible] will take place on the Fifth inst. when Haydn's Quartet in G major op. 76 and Beethoven's E flat major Quartet, op. 74, will be given.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 18, 1868.

Music in Boston.

The only musical events of consequence during the past fortnight have been the revival of two of the old standard series of Concerts: those of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and the Orchestral Union; and a Symphony Concert.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, now composed of Messrs. WM. SCHULTZE, CARL MEISEL, THOMAS RYAN, EDWARD HEINDL (a [illegible] and most admirable flutist, whom he [illegible] in the second viola), and WULF FRIES, have entered upon their nineteenth season of classical Chamber Concerts, giving the first of the series of four at Chickering's Hall, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 7, to a large, attentive and eager audience. This was the programme:

Quintet in B flat, op. [illegible]	Mozart.
Sonata for Pianoforte [illegible]	Beethoven.
Miss [illegible] and [illegible]
"Gesang Scene," Violin Concerto [illegible]	Louis Spohr.
Arranged for Piano by [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] Song without words [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]
Grand Quartet, in C sharp minor, op. 131	Beethoven.

The Mozart piece is not found among his Quintets proper, nor [illegible] number. Most of it sounded like a very early work, simple, naïve, rather antique in cut, but with the charm of the young Mozart melody and clearness. Only we could not help fancying that the Finale may have been added at a later period on account of the [illegible] of [illegible] with the quick bright Allegro. Mozart's biographer [illegible] this [illegible] our memory is not mistaken, [illegible] Quintet of Beethoven [illegible] the same [illegible] of the classic [illegible] works in that form; what would he say to this? After [illegible] through Köchel's huge thematic Catalogue of Mozart, we discover the Quintet in its original shape of a Divertimento for 2 violins, viola, bass and 2 horns, composed in 1772 when Mozart was about 16 years old. The famous G minor Quintet [illegible] of the tribe was written [illegible] years later. Was not all the Divertimento [illegible] it into a [illegible] respectable Quintet for strings alone we do not know; it was so published by André of Offenbach, as Op. 68. It was on the whole well enjoyed, but that [illegible] smoothness of the rendering was sometimes marred by high notes a little harsh and not quite [illegible].

The well-known Beethoven Sonata Duo in F suffered somewhat from the embarrassment of the young pianist, whose debut it was, who evidently failed to reach the hall in season and had to play her part in anything but a cool and self-possessed condition. This made her touch [illegible] and heavy, though she gave evidence of good clear, honest execution. There was an [illegible] about her [illegible] and careful rendering, and though we hardly think that Miss [illegible] is yet prepared to shine among such pianists as our concert rooms can boast, we have no doubt she will fill a useful sphere in some large more-loving town both as teacher and as concert artist. For she is earnest, modest, well-taught and engaging in manner and appearance. The Mendelssohn Lied (the "Duet") was taken too slow; her best success was with the Chopin Impromptu.

Spohr's "Gesang Scene," often called Scena Cantante or the "Dramatic Concerto," is a capital violin piece,—perhaps the most interesting of all his music for that subtle, searching instrument, and in that sense it has no [illegible]. But the [illegible] about a [illegible] piece of it for the flute is, that the accompanying instruments (quartet of strings in this case) are so much more searching and expressive than [illegible]. A flute however well played, (and Mr. Heindl did it marvellously well, as a [illegible] of breath, an [illegible] of [illegible] apparent) must sound tame and dull in contrast.

The great thing of the evening, that "posthumous" Quartet of Beethoven, was unspeakably interesting for earnest music-lovers and students to follow.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The first Wednesday Afternoon Concert occurred this week. The day was snowy and the audience not so large as the music deserved, which was indeed excellent. The orchestra, of about 30 instruments, [illegible] led by CARL ZERRAHN. The programme included the fine Concert Overture in A by Julius Rietz, which only improves upon acquaintance, and the second Symphony in D of Beethoven, which gave great delight. The lighter pieces were a very pretty new Strauss Waltz ("Fairy Tales") [illegible] arranged Duet from William Tell, "Frühlings Erwachen" (Spring's awakening), by C. E. Bach; and "Rund du Lara [illegible]" by [illegible].

The SYMPHONY CONCERT of Thursday, one, for the first part two very [illegible] Overtures [illegible] the [illegible] by Schubert, and the Ruy Blas by Mendelssohn; and between the two [illegible] Piano Concerto of Beethoven, in G, played by B. J. LANG. Part II was filled by the [illegible] Symphony in C, about which there has been [illegible] something [illegible] from Mr. Manns' Crystal Palace programmes in London; only a fig for the [illegible] at the end!

"La Grande Duchesse," &c. &c.

"[illegible] when [illegible] the [illegible] of the French we must be heartily funny [illegible] against [illegible] —Lord [illegible].

"In Offenbach's [illegible] Duchesse [illegible] which [illegible] have been [illegible] the Opera Comique, where the greatest masterpieces by Grétry, Boieldieu, Hérold, Meyerbeer, Auber, &c., have been performed, and that such music is only pleasant to hear once in [illegible]."—Letter from Paris.

"What [illegible] the Journal of Music [illegible] of the great musical event of the past week."—Boston Evening Transcript, Jan. 8.

So much the worse for the "great event" (arrival of the Duchess) — [illegible] a fair inference. So much the worse for the Journal of Music [illegible] what the Transcript [illegible]. Perhaps it will be as much the worse for the Transcript before we get through. Our smart [illegible] neighbor, which on the whole we think [illegible] of its propensity to fling [illegible] —mostly [illegible] because altogether vague and [illegible] of nothing —and [illegible] thought it would the whole [illegible] them. Therefore, had we [illegible] Daily with [illegible] daily column of "brief jottings," it had been easy to fling back [illegible]. No mention? Why? Because the person who appears to edit the "Trans." with such wonderful [illegible] we might say identity in all the newspapers [illegible] of the Journal of Music. The close agreement [illegible] witnesses is fatal to their testimony. Because of the selection of our [illegible] under the obligation [illegible] of Mr. Bateman or any [illegible] impresario, we write about what interests us, and what we think should interest the friends of Art [illegible] in an artistic, not a business point of view. Frankly, our first conviction after seeing the "Grand Duchess" was that we [illegible] the better, especially since all the papers had already said too much. Such a manifest attempt to write a thing into notice and forestall public opinion, such exaggeration of all the facts as there has been in this case we have very seldom seen. A thing entirely trivial has had more fuss made about it by the Press than if it were one of the grandest masterworks of Art. In fact, though but [illegible] (and what [illegible] extravaganza does not?) has been proclaimed as a grand triumph, the conquest of [illegible] by a new kind of a musical genius, whom we are all henceforth to hug to our hearts and forget that there was any genius in melody a Mozart or Rossini! Really good things do not conquer [illegible] in this sudden way,—at all events they do not so command the instant unctuous allegiance of the Press.

But we will give our reasons for not joining in this glorification of the Duchess with which all the newspapers are ringing.

1. We deny that its arrival is a "great musical event." Musically the thing is of the smallest worth. The music is commonplace, nothing often [illegible] of a grade hardly above negro minstrelsy. In the rest of its melodies, in a certain piquant accent, it is very French; but a German has only [illegible] in any musically creative sense it is not; there are more [illegible] musical ideas, more delicious [illegible] in any five minutes of "The Barber" than in the whole of it. It is full of tunes, they say: tunes [illegible] one that are sure to be whistled in all the streets, and ground out on the hand-organs. True; and because they are sufficiently vulgar and [illegible] [illegible] like flies and mosquitoes in the dog-days would we [illegible] them! The great favorite of the new papers, the [illegible] "Sabre de mon père" is positively flat [illegible] for a [illegible]. These things are of the very essence of clap-trap. Even what has such things all [illegible] originated? The [illegible] and we say [illegible] so much an "Overture"! The whole charm consists in the fact that the music (like the play) is often [illegible], and always very light. But musically considered by itself [illegible] more than the [illegible] of a Quadrille Band; the more accompanying instruments, and [illegible] while you watch the play about as much as that does while you watch the dancers in a ball-room. Stripped of costume and stage show who would sit through this music in a concert? Worst of all is that the music nearly lost its music: the music never for a moment forgets itself enough to have some heart in it as Mozart's always does even in the most comical situations, thereby idealizing all manner [illegible] which it is the very nature and business of music to do. This is music bastardized, as far as possible from naive in its simplicity, totally devoid of identity as poetry. It lends itself to the purpose of broad farce with the same pretence [illegible], having nothing on its own account to say, but merely to [illegible] the play along and lift its feet as in a ballet.

[illegible] by Google

The cleverness of Offenbach consists in the ready knack he has for turning off light, empty melodies to fit the funny nonsense on the stage and to contrive odd surprises [illegible] in the voices and the orchestra to make it more laughable. Now and then, to be sure, you detect an allusion to other composers, burlesque imitations, however, of airs among them of music—but not nearly so many as so happy as the active fancies of our newspaper critics would persuade us. Perhaps the frequent instances of the sort is the scene of the Duchess as one at the beginning of the third act contains in the performance here. It is a palpable allusion both to the "bénédiction des poignards" in the Huguenots, and no more other things. It is where the conspirators suddenly change the tempo of their dark [illegible] music which has the gentlemen are brought in and yield before them and they all go in sharpening their swords, the orchestra touching an allusion note at every mention of sharp points.

Thus there is anything like "musical wit" in the work we fail to see, and we do not deny that there can be such a thing as musical wit; we find it in Rossini's "Barber." In a way a comic opera, and holds it to be very enjoyable; but here there is nothing [illegible] or long enough to suggest it: it is burlesque extravaganza.

But why all this stir? Who ever heard before of Offenbach as taking a [illegible] among the musical composers? Surely [illegible] with musicians, he [illegible] musical world as such he [illegible] such reputation and is hardly mentioned. The Opera Comique of Paris, the Opera Buffa of the [illegible] have called out the finest powers of musical [illegible]. But this thing is no opera comique, as some might suppose innocently [illegible] the Opera Comique in Paris, as shows how though in their way laughable and [illegible] as buffooneries of Offenbach. Just now to be sure, for the first time, he has written something for that theatre in Robinson Crusoe and we are told a fairly general [illegible] it is received as a [illegible] of a piece which believes but leaves a better character. Perhaps the [illegible] of the Bouffes a company, opened in Paris, in the same direction the Duchess "conquers Boston."

2. But what is this Bouffes Parisiens, whose advent raises such a panic in our newspapers and to which crowds and reporters (by [illegible] of [illegible] the Bostonians) are so eager to pledge the unconditional surrender and allegiance of Boston? Always a name is at least questionable respectability, what we have stated as its very low theatre, its first forms of the Offenbach Muse as well as her later haunts the Variétés [illegible] has been devoted to the sports of broad farce and burlesque which, even without music and in spite of [illegible] always finds plenty of admirers, but which under the floating, sparkling guise of gay and graceful although very common music and all the pantomime of stage [illegible] from winking or unconquering women [illegible] tolerate [illegible], double entendres, to low appetites, which are palpable enough to the practiced imagination as of those for whom they are intended. In a word, such theatres exist here to pander [illegible] of the most blasé [illegible] of the great wicked City of Paris. It is eminently Parisian, but its character also is a [illegible] rites. Offenbach presented himself with just the gift for [illegible] music to this vulgar business [illegible] for writing which turns a sheer medley of musical [illegible] a kind of musical argot to go with the scene thing.

At any rate the Bouffes and Offenbach have ever been the specialty of certain minor theatres; and though they have their cult all over Europe we never [illegible] in any principal or royal opera house. Then a Berlin, where we were [illegible] half bored by the "Orphée aux Enfers," it was at the little Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt theatre, and not at the Royal Opera house nor the Victoria where such things could not possibly have gained admission. On what little could they gain at the Opera Comique in Paris,—until now. Many here no less but the Bouffes [illegible] brighter more extravagant and funny sort of Commedia, but they are not for a moment to be confounded with that. They ask to pass as [illegible] dignity of comic opera, they are coarse, de pro forma in their entire conception, both of plot and character and music they are full of coarse [illegible], which is the serious part of them and the music they [illegible] in Paris is [illegible] far modest eyes, but is not so long as all to enliven, [illegible] and lift the burlesque up.

The extravagance of the Grand Duchess, therefore, [illegible] far from [illegible] respectable. And, strange to say, the very thing which is the attraction in our "Academies of Music" is most apt amidst in it, completely the curtain to be raised after it has once charmed [illegible] upon a spectacle the [illegible] have ever seen upon the stage at least in the impersonation of a woman and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] Cancan. The very word is Parisian [illegible] to ears polite. This scene itself peculiar to low theatres, so legally prohibited and has to look out for the vigilant eyes of the police. Indeed, it was once report he says it is associated with whatever have a [illegible] and dissolute in [illegible] of Paris [illegible]. We are credibly informed that on the fête-day of Napoleon, 15th of August, license to perform the Duchess was asked and refused by the Emperor, on the ground that it was not a thing fit for his dear children to be entertained with on that day—No doubt all have it has [illegible] signed from here, but the imported article is bad enough.

3. We must also charge the newspapers with most extravagantly overrating the success and triumph of [illegible] in Boston; as if "Boston" had been unconditionally "conquered," because many people were delighted with the fun and the [illegible] of the [illegible] from. Such statements, too, as that a better [illegible] once more and [illegible], and had [illegible] more and more enjoyable, must be taken with a large grain of salt. One never would suspect it from the newspapers, but we put our take express there of the opinion here and of [illegible] and disgust are very [illegible]. [illegible] a good of the audience of the [illegible], and [illegible] themselves as far having had the patience to sit through it in the hope of finding something [illegible] who gave their [illegible] and found entertainment [illegible] the [illegible] of the more [illegible] on the part of the [illegible] we must admit [illegible] hundreds of [illegible] light music [illegible] who are [illegible] and lastly with [illegible], who enjoy the "Barber," the "Flauto d'Amore," Ernani [illegible] and [illegible] Trovatore or [illegible] Huguenots (and we are of them) found this thing [illegible] and [illegible]. There, as it shows being "nothing offensive in the most refined audience" to the action we could each count a score or two among the most intelligent of its [illegible] persons by no means prudish, who, having seen it once, will not go again nor consent to have their daughters see it. No doubt many [illegible] and refined persons of a larger [illegible] witnessed it, have been more or less carried away by it, and not following the French librettos carefully, have gone smiling, or [illegible] their [illegible]. Thank heaven youthful innocence and modesty carry their own protection with them in their own unconsciousness which sees not and suspects not the [illegible] around it so innocent and true.—The presumption that Boston [illegible] may be fairly seen by the amount [illegible] is utterly carried away and conquered by the Duchess. [illegible] the [illegible] of chance, one of those large [illegible] which was only [illegible] from reporters' pens, and meant to serve for advertisement to other centres on which the Duchess and her [illegible] have set their eyes for conquest. Sweet [illegible] them for the Impresarios to call under such [illegible] their high-sight [illegible] [illegible] wait, for do they not keep among their [illegible], one whom they call their "manager of the press," unless they happen to be the [illegible] of the "local press" too well [illegible]? [illegible], the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] wholly?

In [illegible] for the good name of our city that [illegible] seems to be [illegible] about in [illegible] as [illegible] as such grand [illegible] opera of Offenbach we have [illegible] again [illegible] of years and [illegible] to supplement those who expressed what has been waiting [illegible] for expression, having thus far found none publicly. Strange, that while these things have been pretty generally felt [illegible] has not been one word said of it in any of the newspapers! But then the [illegible] [illegible] the artistic and the moral value of the opera-bouffe all [illegible] in this question, will at least be an open question.

We have not too much [illegible], as perhaps for the patience of our [illegible] but we must still put in a caveat against a confounding of [illegible]. It will be said [illegible] you cannot [illegible] Duchess because you have no pleasure in music that is light and sparkling [illegible] of the [illegible] and funny but want always what is [illegible] and classical, etc. This we can [illegible] not only in that article, but many a time in the course of [illegible] [illegible] while we had a [illegible] [illegible] to serious Italian opera, have we [illegible] delight in the Italian buffo and [illegible], as a thing of [illegible] in its way.

Again, it will be said: This is of nothing [illegible] in Don Giovanni, why so squeamish then about the Duchess? The cases are wholly out of relation to each other. In "Don Giovanni," or "Il dissoluto punito" as Mozart called it, we have the most solemn of tragedy throughout the [illegible] the awful [illegible] of the impenitent [illegible] the music the dissolute [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] is [illegible] tracked at every step and haunted by the shadow of the [illegible] from the first scene it [illegible] and [illegible] by Death stalking into the midst of [illegible] by the lofty character of Donna Anna. If the Don [illegible], [illegible], it is not he, but the poor [illegible] that [illegible] our sympathy for in [illegible] it. The music [illegible] all nervous [illegible], [illegible] revealing the inner truth and [illegible] of things. [illegible] Mozart's opera by the [illegible] and [illegible] sublime [illegible] tragedy of life, of universal scope, with comedy and [illegible] as in Shakespeare or in human life [illegible]. But in the French thing what [illegible] indecent in the very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]; [illegible] there is no moral [illegible] anywhere [illegible] [illegible] made of good or bad [illegible] a joke, no triumph of innocence to be [illegible] the simple love of Fritz and Wanda [illegible] as much [illegible] as the old fogies and conventional [illegible] of the court [illegible] with the [illegible] we have said [illegible] [illegible].

"The Voice in Singing."—The extract which we give upon another page is a specimen of the [illegible], the [illegible] and [illegible] admirable [illegible] of this [illegible] book, of which we mean to speak more at length when we [illegible]. Meanwhile we strongly recommend it to all who are interested in the art of singing and the true culture of the voice, and give [illegible] Annie [illegible] the following notice in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

"The Voice in Singing." Translated from the German of [illegible] by a Member of the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

The hearty thanks of all who are interested in the advance of the art of music in this country are [illegible] due to the translator of this most valuable work.

In this book we have the results of the [illegible] [illegible], earnest study of one who, deeply imbued with a [illegible], and realizing that art, to be true, must spring from natural causes [illegible], as we are only made aware of their [illegible], these causes are [illegible] has by the most diligent and [illegible] investigations in physical and physiological science, made herself thoroughly mistress of the [illegible] and effects in the production of sound.

By [illegible] the [illegible] of Garcia, by means of the laryngoscope, far beyond what that eminent teacher found possible, and after long practice by an [illegible] use of the [illegible] the organs of the throat being enabled to move [illegible], thus [illegible] to view the [illegible] in action in the living subject, the author has been able to set at rest a [illegible] important to the teacher of singing [illegible] to the [illegible] of the voice [illegible] its laws. We [illegible] to her investigations and [illegible] adjustment of the different registers of the human voice; for, to quote the words of [illegible], Professor of Physiology in the Royal [illegible]. We are to her [illegible] a [illegible] of the position of the larynx and of [illegible] the production of the several registers of the human voice, and she appears especially to have brought to a final and satisfactory [illegible] the much vexed question respecting the [illegible] of the so called falsetto [illegible]. She has been associated with the best powers possessed by Germany in the department of the theory of music and physiological science, standing by the side of the celebrated physiologist Helmholtz, when he was engaged in his physiological-acoustic work upon the [illegible] of the vowels and the nature of [illegible] [illegible]."

While scarcely feeling competent to review this book thoroughly in all respects, we may still express our appreciation of its [illegible] [illegible] and when we consider the [illegible] and years of [illegible] research necessary to [illegible] the results here so clearly, concisely and forcibly stated, we [illegible] impressed with the fact that no selfish motive has prompted the study, but a sincere wish to benefit the cause of truth in science and art.

Having [illegible] sketched the rise, development and decline of the art of singing, which forms the [illegible] [illegible] the present condition of the singing [illegible] with the past and to be almost ready to realize that the art of singing is a dead art, that is [illegible] [illegible] by her thoroughly scientific [illegible] and conclusions that though apparently dead, it can be revived and made to bloom well all its former beauty by [illegible] of showing those natural laws which are the foundation of all art.

She [illegible] herself to be [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] the patient [illegible] [illegible] but the true artist. This is [illegible] the last chapter on the aesthetics of the art, [illegible] is to be found much that is truly original and beautiful.

We commend the book to all who are interested in the [illegible]—to the teacher of singing and [illegible] in his work, to the physician who seeks to know the true path [illegible] to the physician, whose difficult task it is often to attempt the cure of throats [illegible] by false systems of singing, to the educated [illegible] who is willing to admit that [illegible] there is something more profound than the mere [illegible] of the [illegible], and to all who have a real interest in the triumph of true [illegible].

We congratulate Philadelphia that among her citizens she is able to number one so highly gifted as the author of this most interesting work.

New Haven, Conn.—Loomis' Musical Journal (occurring at [illegible] in the "City of Elms") [illegible] [illegible] its readers on the artistic opportunities of the past year, enumerating:

First.—The [illegible] of [illegible] at the [illegible] Art School. This collection of art specimens was made a great exposure [illegible] for taste and appreciation of much in this department. Many people came from a great distance to [illegible]. The receptions were attended by the most brilliant audiences; the rooms were [illegible] always with [illegible], and the exhibition was such as to [illegible] and be noted down as an important event in this year's history.

Second.—The Philharmonic Concerts were a rare [illegible] and [illegible] which one of us [illegible] character [illegible] one would have credited the statement [illegible] years ago that it would have been supported here at this time. The programmes included Beethoven's Symphonies No. 5 in C minor, No. 4 in F Major and No. 7 in A Major; also the Overtures to Der Freyschütz, Euryanthe, "Merry Wives of Windsor," "William Tell" and "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Concertos of Mendelssohn in G Minor and Beethoven in [illegible] Major and other selections. [illegible] conducted the concerts with great success.

Third.—The Mendelssohn Society [illegible] during the year two oratorios, viz: [illegible] "Eli," and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The chorus was of good and in both concerts, and was assisted by the best solo talent from New York and Boston.

Fourth.—The [illegible] concerts, early in the year, were really enjoyed. Miss Ives played very finely the Concertstück by Weber and a "Rondeau Brillante" by A. Schmitt, also Weber's "[illegible]," the [illegible] Sonata, and a transcription of "La Charité" by Liszt, besides an original "[illegible] Waltz," a composition of great merit. The programmes included also the Overtures to Gazza Ladra, Zampa, Crown Diamonds, Fra Diavolo and Semiramide.

Fifth.—The Chamber Concerts, of which there have been six, have afforded a delightful [illegible] of [illegible] selected from the best works of Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn. Miss Ives also played at these concerts a Concerto from [illegible] and Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B Major. Vocal selections from Beethoven, Mozart, and Schumann were also on the programmes.

Sixth.—Organ concerts, and good ones, too, have been given here during the year, embracing some fine selections, at the the management of genuine [illegible].

Seventh.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, have given us two concerts containing [illegible] good part of classic music. They were assisted by Addie S. Ryan as soloist.

Eighth.—We have had also the operas the "Barber of Seville" and "Trovatore," both of them excellent renderings.

Ninth.—Miscellaneous concerts of all descriptions have been numerous, and included some of the best artists in the country. We have had [illegible] of these.

Taking the year as a whole, it has never been approached by any year preceding, for the production of musical entertainments.

New Orleans, Wis.—Here are a couple of programmes, performed last month, which show a [illegible] [illegible] miscellaneous direction [illegible] the two principal musical organizations of this city. The first is that of the 149th concert of the "Musical Society."

Overture—"Les Dragonnades" [illegible]	Meyerbeer
[illegible] Aria for Soprano from "La Traviata"	Verdi
[illegible] "Song for tenor with [illegible]" [illegible]	[illegible]

Nohl's "Youth of Beethoven."[1]

(From the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, translated for this Journal.)

BEETHOVEN'S LEBEN von LUDWIG NOHL. Erster Band. Die Jugend 1770–92. (Wien. Markgraf 1864.)

When in 1859 the Life of Beethoven by A. B. MARX appeared many may have hoped to see their long cherished wish fulfilled, that at last a picture of the Master's life was built up on firm foundations and the correct points of view afforded of the development of his creative power. How sadly they were deceived was thoroughly and decisively proved by A. W. THAYER in a criticism[*] which was given in German in the 49th and following pages of the Deutsche Musik-zeitung for 1861, and which closes with the result, that Beethoven's Biography still remained to be written. The hopes, thus demolished however, may have been immediately revived by the fact, that the minute knowledge of facts and circumstances relating to Beethoven evidently resting upon his own researches, which Thayer exhibited [illegible] him out as having a special vocation for the task; and indeed it soon came out, that he was actually engaged in the work. But it was already known that a Life of Beethoven was to be expected from the pen of Herr OTTO JAHN; his preface to the "Mozart" hinted this, and divers articles (upon Fidelio, the complete edition of Beethoven's works, &c.) have appeared more or recent convey [illegible] to speak of the work.

Thus, then whatever was necessary for the memory and the due estimation of Beethoven was perfectly provided for; and the only question now was when the completed works would be before the public. Suddenly the musical journals announce that Herr LUDWIG NOHL is busy with the labors preparatory to a Life of Beethoven and no long time passes before the first part of the work under the special title "Beethoven's youth," merely crowded lies before us. Herr Nohl has won the musical public's knowledge of his existence through various writings prepared during the last few years. In quick succession have appeared:—in 1860, "Mozart, a contribution to musical Esthetics;" 1861 "The Son (Geist) of the Musical Art;" 1862 "The Magic Flute;" 1863 "Mozart;" this last, a Biography, is reviewed in No. 47 of the last volume of this Zeitung.† Whoever has looked through these works or had patience to read them, to him Nohl's a mission to become the Biographer of Beethoven must seem, for a twofold reason in the highest degree doubtful.

First, the absolute dependence upon other writers in the historic parts of his productions, especially the Mozart, to which he yields himself and his frequent citations of long passages of their works, particularly out of Jahn's Mozart leave it in doubt whether he has any conception of the obligations and dignity of scientific investigation. And then the views, which he has hitherto promulgated in relation to Beethoven hardly allow any hope of real estimation of the Master to be expected from his pen. We let pass in general here the turgid and bombastic phrase-making of Nohl's methods, which nowhere holds to any given technical principles, but refers every phenomenon at once to the "history of the human soul;" but the manner in which he has shown itself in relation to Beethoven is, for our present object worth recalling to mind.

Thus, there we read in the first publication, p. 30: "But just the superabundant affluence of thought (in Beethoven's Sonatas) especially in the Adagios, far too often hinders their transparency and free movement—a certain sensuous effect (?) is not avoided,—a clear statement of the musical idea is not attained." On page 58 [of the same first publication] Mozart and Beethoven's natures are compared: the former had life-warm blood in the veins, the other—alas! "has Homer's Gods. Hence, p. 58 Fidelio, compared with Mozart's operas, comes off badly: the forms have not gained independence of the orchestra: the music does not necessarily belong to the situation: and where it "does go with the scene, it has a wooden tone—something empty"—not intimately adapted to the words. Compared with Belmont and Constanze, Fidelio and Florestan seem "to have at best fish blood (schon?) in their veins." With all this there is not a want of fanfaronade exclamations upon Beethoven's greatness, which, however, is for the most part sought outside the sphere of music.

In his second publication the strong contradictions retire somewhat into the background. On p. 414 it is said though that Beethoven's superfact narration a counterpart is to be remarked in many a later work of his (also by Herr Nohl!) and p. 240 all sorts of faults are found in the great Mass [the Missa Solemnis] that the author has changed his main opinions, however, is nowhere appears.

But whoever in consequence of all this, might naturally expect in Nohl's Beethoven to find a trace of his character in its Gold-chef let him open the book without anxiety. Beethoven has in the meantime become the type of the German folk: he is the representative of the grand compelling ideas of his time, in the edifice raised by his predecessors, he has added the tower, necessary to its perfection.‡ "Beethoven was to be the first who should bring this art into the sphere of the highest human intellectual achievements" (p. 788). "Beethoven's genius alone had power so to carry out the great work of Mozart, viz. the development in tones of the depth of human feeling—that not only music but humanity was a gainer" (p. 265). These vague and hyperbolical utterances may doubtless awaken doubt as to the conversion of Nohl in real upward progress: we have therefore to consider, whether as his work as a whole, it has produced good fruit.

The preface instructs us as to the object of the work; in contradistinction to his Mozart Nohl has now to seek for himself, in the main, his materials, and to lay his own foundations. The fact that this had not previously been adequately done, leads him into a critical examination of previous works upon Beethoven. While speaking of the printed Biographies, he mentions also the "Fischoff manuscript" as he calls a collection, now in Berlin, of written notices upon Beethoven, exceedingly various in character which after his death was made by friends, preparatory to a biography. One might naturally think that this would fall under the head of original sources. On the other hand, Nohl does great wrong in omitting here a work which for him, as he afterwards says—and in a far higher degree than he says—has been of important service to him throughout. It is an article upon Beethoven's life in the Brussels "Revue Britannique" Vol. 4, 1861 p. [illegible] of which Nohl says, in a note (p. 364) it is written not without knowledge of the subject, and a few errors excepted.* throughout trustworthy. The article is, however, but a translation of one originally written in English for the Boston Atlantic Monthly (1858 No. [illegible] 444 et seq.) and its author is no other than A. W. Thayer. Whatever is given on the basis of this article, clearly goes, to the account in value—not, to be sure, to Nohl's credit—who since he expresses the hope, that his book will be for the history of music and not alone for that of the Master as an original authority," is bound first of all to examine and give his own authorities conscientiously.

The work is intended to be in four volumes, three of these Biography, one for the consideration of Beethoven's compositions. These proportions, as well as the entire principle of separating the master's creations, the grand events of his life, from the life itself, must arouse the strongest doubts whether the author really comprehends his task.

The first volume, now lying before us, contains Beethoven's youth—from 1770 to 1792 and thus, too divided into three periods, of which Herr Nohl makes also the same number of books. The first book has a sub-title, "Dreams." If those which follow—"Dawn" [Dämmerung] and "Awaking"—did not stand in connection with this first there would be temptation to believe that the author is referring to his own dreams.

Much promising and emphasis begins the first chapter entitled "Lower Rhineland!" thus:—

"In the not great number of men in whom that which is peculiar to the German character [Wesen] has expressed itself in all its significance, and who just on this account have come to be world historical personages, belongs pre-eminently also Ludwig van Beethoven."

And now in a long dissertation, the nature of the German Intellect [Geist] and its influence upon the history of humanity is placed before us; the Germans, in contradistinction to the ancient peoples, had "considered the world more especially from an intellectual point of view" had "striven to spiritualize the earthly."

The serious as well as the gay of the German nature character are referred back to this primal conception, ideal conceptions of the world and the contradictions which naturally follow thereupon, and at once applied to Beethoven, of whom still now not a word has been heard. Self-consciousness, pride, obstinate fire, contentiousness [Rauflust] (in Beethoven's case degenerated into spiting) naughtiness [Ubermuth] (as B.'s case the fondness for changing his lodgings and for going his own way ?) love of strong drink— a very German characteristic—all, combined with the beautiful and noble phases of the German nature, are found in Beethoven.

Should any one question the right of Herr Nohl to employ such high-sounding, all-embracing forms of speech—let him not be disturbed. Vischer is so rated by Nohl, must in the second part of his "Æsthetics," take all the responsibility. But what perverseness is this—to begin Beethoven's biography with Cæsar and Tacitus and trace back the composer of the Eroica to the idea of Germanism!

The pattern of German character becomes, particularly special and is applied to Beethoven's native country, that of the Lower Rhine. Now follow the commonly received, but in fact very doubtful, distinctions between North and South Germany, according to which the intellectual, earnest element combined with a certain dreaminess, are characteristic of the former,—but certainly not of the people of the Rhine. Yet, moved up to Nohl and in contradistinction to the Westphalians "those stolid, honest friends of ham and pumpernickel," as he—himself a Westphalian and therefore no unprejudiced judge—calls them on p. 44, these Rhinelanders have the opposite to give to life form and artistic expression. Here he pictures the gay temperament of that people, their festivals and dances, their tables d'hote, their wine.* The Rhenish appetite is a belly marked characteristic of Beethoven (p. 350) he is a forgetter on what is the same (p. 11).

* For example: "But the Rhenish soil, to indulge, this wine, the best, which it puts in, is great enough to produce that celestial oil, which gives it fragrance and juice, and yet not so great as all the other, it crushes from this flavor, poetry [illegible] wine table." &c. &c. p. 44 [illegible]

Upon this geographic-ethnographic basis for a view of Beethoven's character follows the historical as a second chapter, headed "Ancien regime" displays the political and social condition at the close of the last century. Here too, Nohl assumes the air of the profound historian and politician treats of the grand object and laws of a State, "the universal schoolhouse of humanity" (p. 21) "which has not the nightwatchman mission to protect the mass in the material existence" (p. 22) but to promote its higher development. He points in a few words to the consequences of States in the progress of history, emphasises the importance of the Reformation, and then dwells more fully upon sovereignty as the time of Louis XIV. and during the last century. He bemoans the wretchedness of the people of that era, and the consequent decay of good morals; but, "to comfort those who make themselves familiar with history" he lays stress upon the point, that in such times the intellect seeks activity in other directions. Bach, Handel, Lessing, represent that intellectual struggle. Art flourished, a radical tendency made itself felt in opinion and action, Goethe and Mozart appeared. The French Encyclopædists and an explaining the mental condition; as the first of practical acts of the century appears the Declaration of Independence of the American colonies, at a time when "the majority of Teutonic fogies [Philister] were busy casting their theological ideas," (p. 19) and then a picture of mighty intellectual and political wrestling stands displayed which is to give us a basis for the comprehension of Beethoven "the greatest progressive man of that century" (p. 43)

The dumfounded reader asks for object and aim in these reflections in a biography of Beethoven; he is still more astonished, when he learns, that the fountain whence here and elsewhere, Herr Nohl has drawn his historic and political radicalism is no other than Johann Scherr's "Blücher und seine Zeit" [Blücher and his Times]. The industry of Scherr may deserve credit; his tendency and coloring find admirers as the case shows,—but nothing can mark more strongly Nohl's utter want of judgment and taste, than his taking a work of this character as a basis for the biography of an artist. Naturally, he is satisfied with this one pale source, and to avail himself of other, not unknown, reputable sources by Hausser, Perthes, &c. or of independent research of his own,—it never occurs to him.

By degrees, however, Herr Nohl must draw nearer to the real task before us. That though that great artists for the most part have had their birth at ancient seats of culture (Bach, Haydn (!) Lessing, Schiller (?) brings him (p. 46) to Bonn as such (?). Here then he has gone back to old Roman times, next notices the elevation of Bonn to the position of Capital of the Electorate, describes the spirit which here developed itself and condenses a strong, as preserves the dissoluteness of the Electors Joseph Clemens and Clemens August word for word after Scherr. At last he comes to Maxmilian Frederick (1761–1784) and his minister Belderbusch; for a local history the Rheinische Antiquarius III. i. p. 596 et seq., is a rich source, which he also uses where he says nothing about it. For instance, after he prints, p. 56 the passage from the English traveller Burnham, and the liberal discourse of Peter Ansch p. 12, he might well have told us, that he had taken both from the Rheinische Antiquarius.

Now it was Max Friedrich who first discovered and promoted the budding talents of Beethoven; that brings the author p. 59 to the Elector's interest in his music and theatre. And here he has really made an approach to some work of his own, and has brought together out of the Gotha Theater Calendar, the Electoral Court Calendar, Forkel's Musical Almanac, the reports by Junker in Cramer's Magazine, and other similar sources, notices of the members of the theatrical company and the orchestra, which, though not complete, nor even digested into a clear picture, had not been previously collected thus, and contain some useful information. Beethoven's father and grandfather are here first named as well as his first teachers.†

After this long introduction, "which rather resembles a journey in a post coach of the last century than a modern railroad tour" (p. 69), Nohl will explain to us the effect of all these relations and circumstances upon the development of Beethoven. And so begins, p. 70, the story of Beethoven's birth and youth; we must know at the outset, that Nohl for all his facts is dependent upon Wegeler's "Notizen," and still more upon the article by Thayer mentioned above, and often adopts word for word their statements without giving credit; we could name many passages of the kind did space allow. What is really his own is almost exclusively the long æsthetic reflections and fantasies, the nature of which is well enough known from his former writings. After repeating the well known facts in relation to the family and to the childhood of Beethoven, with the necessary embellishments,‡ Herr Nohl comes to his teacher, Neefe, and, with right, thinks it proper to give us an account of the man. Although he had most excellent materials for this in Neefe's autobiography [Allg. Mus. Zeitung I. p. 241 et seq.] he has not succeeded in giving a clear picture of him as a man and an artist; the manner in which he speaks of Neefe's style of composition leaves it doubtful whether he has really made himself acquainted with the works, which he mentions as still in existence. Without any sufficient reason he disputes Wegeler's statement, that Neefe had little influence upon Beethoven and that the latter had often complained of the former's too severe criticism; but he here gives the rein to his fancy and talks † Thayer's Introduction on the Beethoven is a chronological, a broad as is [illegible] the American and English reader [illegible] the history of the music and theatrical establishment of the Electors of Bonn beginning the commencement of the last century and continued to the year 1784. He uses the above named authors, he [illegible] his materials for the most part from the original documents of the "Düsseldorf Archives," [illegible] the notices of and documents relating to the Beethovens. [illegible] this Introduction [illegible] it has a special claim upon the attention of the reader as being the only work from which can be obtained any adequate idea of the constitution and capabilities of the many [illegible] which [illegible] by Germany which were [illegible] down to this century. The only [illegible] [illegible]. The whole is however kept separate from the Biography and can be omitted by the reader.

‡ Thus Wegeler mentions three brothers of Beethoven, and Nohl, of course, the same; while Thayer adds two sisters and a brother of the family with names and dates of birth and death, all found by him in the records at Bonn.

§ Of the grandfather Ludwig van Beethoven, of whom very little is known (this was written before the publication of Thayer's book), is affirmed, [illegible] he was [illegible], which still a few [illegible] in [illegible] founded on [illegible] upon [illegible],"—that is, he had run away from home. [illegible] much of Nohl's supposed mode of instruction—as he is always extremely ready to supply the want of facts by improbable assumptions.

In this connection, Beethoven's first works, the three pianoforte Sonatas, which appeared in 1783, dedicated to the Elector, come under notice, and upon these Herr Nohl reads us a short Commentary. In the same connection Thayer had introduced (in the Atlantic Article) Dwight's opinion of these Sonatas. That the reader may see with what marvel Herr Nohl copies not only facts but the opinions of others, we place the two side by side.

Nohl, p. 34.	Dwight, as copied by Thayer in Atl. Mon. Monthly.
"They are of little importance, as the work of a child, for they stand little, of which the pianistic [illegible] was [illegible], in a style so [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible], so [illegible] and [illegible], that we clearly see, how well Nohl understood the [illegible] of the midwife at this period. The Sonatas have original ideas, they [illegible] decided [illegible], I [illegible] you, for the [illegible] of this period [illegible]."	"These Sonatas, from boys' work are indeed remarkable. They are [illegible] the [illegible]. There is no [illegible] about them. [illegible] do [illegible] [illegible] and well pronounced, and so [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible], in a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Truly [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of the Sonata form, and [illegible] its [illegible] [illegible]."

After mentioning some of Beethoven's earliest compositions, among which Herr Nohl will place the Dogaressa, op. 23, there follows a chapter with the heading "Sebastian Bach," but he will greatly err who expects anything satisfactory here upon Beethoven's artistic culture. Starting from the fact that Beethoven at that period [illegible] played Bach's "Wohltemperirte Klavier," Nohl dreams away through several pages upon Bach's influence on Beethoven, to be sure this is not to be recognized in the earlier works, and moreover Beethoven has rarely spoken of Bach; but then it was just that, which was most in accordance with his own nature, of which he was least conscious; his later works, especially the Missa Solemnis, show, according to Nohl, this influence already. Now everybody who knows Beethoven, knows that no such direct influence of Bach upon his productions exists. Not until his last works did he then employ the art of polyphony and then with a purpose. In the beginning and middle of his career both in form and matter he stood on the ground of the Haydn-Mozart development. The [illegible] spirit of Bach, which Nohl especially dwells upon, was certainly not represented in his pianoforte works; and they were all that Beethoven in his earlier years knew of him. Whoever thinks he sees this influence deeply pervading the Missa Solemnis, has understood neither that work nor the spirit of Bach's church music.

For Herr Nohl, however, so certain is this influence, that he deems it necessary to go into a consideration of Bach's character and of the rise and progress of church music. The phases of this progress he makes contemporaneous with the revolutions in the church; some examples from this, p. 104, posits: "It is thoroughly characteristic that the church of the Middle Ages, for the natural position of its conscious state of all its thought and sentiment, took account with her tendency to good so that even in our times a more [illegible] apprehension of the sensual-profane life and gaiety in all northern countries; while, on the other hand, the new church purposes (to Christ) the more, with his self-conscious will for the good, as the ideal of human effort." Thus Nohl—the profound theologian. The first period is represented by Palestrina, &c.; the second by Bach. Contemporaneously, the effort to blend the two together—the spiritual-intellectual and the worldly-sensual—the Northern and the Southern—led to the invention of the Opera (p. 107). The new conception of the world, among the Germans, rooted itself more in the depths of the sentiments, in the heart; but Bach was not yet reached by this novel emotion.

After laying down these new principles, Herr Nohl turns again to Beethoven, and discourses upon his education. This was scanty. Beethoven always remained unskillful in Arithmetic, knew but little Latin, a little more French. History? "It is only before 1800 a Koblenz[?] was allowed to teach history in the Prussian schools" (p. 113). Certainly in Beethoven's case the public must have been at fault. But then his going to a common school brought him nearer to the people, hindered him from knowing the upper classes exclusively; yes, he was also the first (before Haydn?) who introduced popular human ennobled into music. The unfortunate circumstances of his family might well have hardened him; his pursuit of music was not of a character to refine and purify him (p. 116, and yet just before, we are to take as a fact the deep impression upon him made by Bach); a noble compensation for all these deficiencies was supplied by the Breuning family about whom he has brought together p. 118 the all-known facts of Wegeler's Notices.* Here Beethoven made his acquaintance with German literature—according to Nohl especially with Klopstock, Goethe and "his brother in spirit" Schiller. Much, however he might have already learned in the Electoral theatre; for no one understands Beethoven until he reflects upon the influence which the dramatic art exerted upon him, for music "is all real music is everywhere dramatic." "As music in fact as a part of what constitutes opera, separated from it and elevated to independent importance in the invention of opera" and with the development of all the modern music has its origin in dramatic declamation.* [illegible] was suggested by his recitation of the drama (p. 122) a glance at history proves it. [!] How may Mozart have been inspired when seeing the Singspiele! Ph. Em. Bach learned from the drama to compose characteristic music for instruments, because Haydn had not opportunity to see so much, he never reached the dramatic, expressional Mozart; moreover Reichard learned from the drama his perfect declamation [!]; and so forth "Beethoven." Are not his Symphonies real dramatic paintings? (p. 127). But then that is natural, since Beethoven working in the orchestra as viola player (which it is true we do not so precisely know until 1789) had early learned a great deal. There follows now a list of performances in Bonn, drawn up from the Theater Kalender, from which it is easily interesting to learn that among them were works of Mozart and Gluck. That Beethoven once spoke upon any such youthful impressions, gives Herr Nohl very little trouble —the memory of them had vanished; or he had no occasion to talk about them.

We have already advanced into the following period; it must therefore be noted, that on the 15th April, 1784, Max Friedrich died. Shortly before Beethoven had petitioned for the appointment of assistant Court Organist;* his petition however was rejected; a fact hitherto unknown, which Nohl obtained from the documents obtained from the provincial archives at Düsseldorf, and prints p. 133. One is rejoiced at last to hear something new about Beethoven; only it is strange, that heretofore his organ playing had had but a passing mention. Upon the whole, at this point where Nohl closes his period of "dreams," we must with regret lay stress upon the fact that he has taken no little pains to give us a vivid and characteristic picture of the character and disposition of the boy on the basis of the known data. The high pictorial and tremendous principles with which he at a later date fills him, must so far as possible, have been noticeable in the boy; but how we are to conceive of him in his intercourse with others, how his talents and musical taste exhibited themselves in his early years, what sort of a boy he was—on these points Nohl knows nothing to say.

(Conclusion next time.)

*Thayer's chapter on the Breunings not only adds much to Wegeler's interesting data, but shows conclusively that Nohl is to put you out of the way in his chronology.

The reader must not forget that all of this is Nohl's language, not the reviewer's.

Is a supposition from Thayer. [illegible]

*A very slight study of Chappell's "Popular Music of the Olden Time," or any work of the character, shall then at once carry at [illegible] Nohl's [illegible] [illegible] on to the winds.

*Thayer's researches—very full and to the point—showed, that so far from opposing this appointment, the Elector appointed the boy to the place. This was done nearly a year before Max Franz came to Bonn and three years before the alleged date of Count Waldstein.

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY KARL NEUMANN[?]

(Concluded.)

Were it allowable to compare two poets of such different periods of civilization, we should say, Handel the Homer of Music: he is certainly one, place him as Gervinus does, with Shakespeare. It is not that, up to his fiftieth year, we find Handel devoting himself to [illegible] as to other compositions. But all the operas cannot drive from them everyone as very [illegible] that his genius had not yet found its proper sphere. While his operas have disappeared entirely from the stage, and lost in total the memory of the public, his oratorios now and then one or other of them revived in them—his works plainly many of them gave evidence of success—performed at a musical festival of Germany as a permanent all their [illegible] works. Pre-eminently in the central pieces of the performance pre-eminently the Sing-Academies of Germany and of the musical world for this celebrated a service both in Germany and England. Lately they have forced their way even to America, Sweden, Russia—and Paris itself. We need then here assert that Handel's popularity as a composer of Oratorios, [illegible] on the increase, just so much so we feel certain that it will continue for all time. That which in all Gervinus lies in comparing Handel with Shakespeare was, notably on the one hand, the [illegible] of the poetic spirit to power with which Handel in the same clearly and invariably objective manner as Shakespeare, treated subjects so different as are the materials of Deborah, Esther, Athaliah, Susannah, Theodora, Semele, Samson, Solomon, Saul, Joseph, Judas Maccabeus, Joshua, Jephtha, Belshazzar, Hercules, Alexander's Feast, Acis and Galatea, The Messiah, Israel in Egypt, &c.; and, on the other, the fact that he, in the very same whole we are generally compared with his English contemporaries, as a true and a full poet only Shakespeare is; Handel's, perhaps, Love too was suited to the drama of [illegible] of [illegible] so many of the [illegible] and [illegible] expressed in of the [illegible] of the above Oratorios, we feel on the part of our [illegible] as an equal degree by Handel and by Shakespeare, so grandly more national divine and heroic individuals. This parity has already been applied to Handel by the nature of the epic poet; but the drama is common to Handel's Oratorios never goes beyond the limits of the musical Epos, nor we might almost say that even the way in which he is [illegible] and treated in characteristics of the [illegible] of [illegible] details. How tremendously effective for instance is the chorus in Israel, "The Horse and the Rider has he [illegible]." The continuous [illegible] of the movement and feeling [illegible] the tremendous event to become [illegible] our [illegible] eye; we are actually spectators [illegible], though of good courage, [illegible] thanks to the power of a [illegible], which by its very [illegible] and freedom [illegible] as the [illegible]. Were we to place this chorus on the stage, it would drag; it would be heavy and [illegible] from the very breadth, mode of operation, and climax, which we [illegible] [illegible] at the side of the [illegible]. [illegible] began [illegible] at their words, [illegible] would the respective [illegible] and [illegible] of the two [illegible] be if placed [illegible] on the stage. Even The Messiah [illegible] [illegible] by Handel [illegible]. [illegible] Bach [illegible] to the Passion, Handel shows in the [illegible] [illegible] of his [illegible] by St. [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] by the Angels to the shepherds at Bethlehem until the time of his sufferings and the Resurrection. Nevertheless [illegible] where he [illegible] [illegible] Handel is [illegible] Bach [illegible] on the whole, has [illegible] a certain [illegible] of [illegible] and dramatic weight of [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] where the [illegible] of each of the two great masters really lay with regard to Oratorio. We must not forget [illegible] that Handel was [illegible] to English [illegible] from [illegible], Pilate [illegible], and the Jews, [illegible] and speaking according to the Scriptures [illegible], He [illegible], who could [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] favorable [illegible] for the development of dramatic [illegible], and the [illegible] sphere which was the [illegible] of his soul. The central [illegible] of Handel [illegible] on the contrary, the history of the struggles of the Jewish people for their freedom [illegible] and material, though [illegible] [illegible] The Messiah. The struggles [illegible] Handel [illegible] the struggles of the Greeks and [illegible] [illegible] already [illegible] Handel [illegible] the classical [illegible] in Hercules, Alexander's Feast, Theodora, Semele and Acis and Galatea. We have here to do with the classical [illegible] [illegible] the period of the Renaissance, as is shown by the titles of his operas, among which we [illegible] Rodrigo, Agrippina, Theseus, Admetus, Alexander Severus, Agrippina, Nero, Julius Cæsar, Mucius Scaevola, Parthenope, Xerxes, Pastor Fido, Floridante and Atalanta and Berenice.

Just as [illegible] the [illegible] the Greek, [illegible] Handel [illegible] from the English [illegible] her and his [illegible] did not take place [illegible] the [illegible] for a century after it had taken place [illegible] and [illegible]. Handel [illegible] the [illegible] period, [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] period. It is [illegible] that the [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] before Mendelssohn [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. As the [illegible] of the [illegible] we may [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] from 1659, [illegible] and [illegible] 1659, [illegible] of Frederick the Great. The [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] and subject [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible], Haydn [illegible] [illegible] who, [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] Oratorio, [illegible] from an [illegible] [illegible] compared [illegible] [illegible]. In the path opened [illegible] by Handel [illegible] great Joseph Haydn, who, in The Creation and The Seasons, [illegible] the range of subjects for Oratorio. [illegible] [illegible] instrumental [illegible] together with [illegible] of the landscape and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with regard to Handel's [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] with [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] from the [illegible]. In the [illegible] [illegible] of Oratorio [illegible] Spohr, Schneider, [illegible] [illegible] and Felix Mendelssohn, [illegible] [illegible] followed by the [illegible] to be compared to them.

The [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] of all the known composers of oratorio, numbering [illegible] 200, from the 15th century up to the present time, establishes the fact that Germany was always the principal country for the development and cultivation of this class of work. Next came Italy, though, as we see [illegible], with quite another tendency. Oratorio appears to have progressed [illegible] in France, a country which, in other branches of music, could be [illegible] mentioned with Germany and Italy. In Germany again, we find the majority of oratorio composers in the North, that is to say, in the native land of Protestantism. Of such composers [illegible] Eastern Germany [illegible] [illegible] North Germany [illegible] [illegible] among [illegible] Bach and Handel, from [illegible] and [illegible]. Even the [illegible] in South Germany belong mostly to the Protestant [illegible], namely Franconia, Suabia, Baden, and the Middle Rhine, while Bavaria and the [illegible] appear almost [illegible] [illegible] a striking and [illegible] [illegible]. The oratorio composers born in the 17th and 18th centuries were nearly all natives of Saxony and Thuringia. It is, therefore, in the centre of Germany [illegible] of Protestantism, that we [illegible] the cradle of Oratorio. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the Reformation; [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the endless [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] Luther's [illegible] and the whole civilized world.

Mr Barnett: "Ancient Mariner"

From the London Chronicle

It is pleasant to welcome the meritorious work of an English musician who, having practised in other branches of his art now ventured on Cantata of The Ancient Mariner [illegible] one of his [illegible] most important [illegible]. Mr J. F. Barnett had earned a right to the consideration of the Philharmonic [illegible] by his Symphony produced at the [illegible] of the Musical Society, when those gentlemen offered him a commission to write a Cantata for this year's [illegible], the result of which is his setting of Coleridge's celebrated poem.

The feeling is to be respected which prompts a musician to seek among the classics of another art for a theme worthy to exercise his own. It implies some diffidence to hope rather less inspiration from the universal work of a kindred muse than to rely solely upon composers [illegible] [illegible].

It is a great work which the present work that, while it [illegible] preserves the [illegible] character of the poem, it [illegible] adequately renders the full expression of its [illegible] beauty and presents it rather in the charmed light of a fairy story than the ghastly gloom of a delirious dream. The verses are so [illegible] ... they are [illegible] in the [illegible] of the [illegible] ... the sense of visions ... which an [illegible] ... the [illegible] of [illegible] ... [illegible] of musical expression [illegible] ... and [illegible]. The [illegible] has fallen a legal [illegible] of poetry which owing [illegible] ... [illegible] to [illegible] ... perfect are been [illegible] by the [illegible] and strong emphasis [illegible] ... The composer has however [illegible] the [illegible] the poem conveys [illegible] ... by [illegible] as the close of the Cantata [illegible] ... the opening by the Mariners' Chorus to the lines commencing—

"The ship was cheered, the harbor cleared."

It is true they are not here in [illegible] words, but the suggestion of this [illegible] is surely that the ship [illegible] ... with the thought of happy [illegible] ... and [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... is materially enhanced and the melodious character that pervades the whole work is justified. The [illegible] ... of desolation and remorse which with Coleridge leaves a soul [illegible] which the Ancient Mariner rehearses ... narrative.

There is one fault manifest throughout the Cantata—the redundant repetition of words. It is indeed admissible ... of a sentiment, to reiterate a line or even a single expression. Thus, to repeat "I love," "I hope," or "I rage" is [illegible] to represent the continuance of the state of feeling, hoping or raging. Upon this principle, it has been the custom of all composers to reassert a cantabile movement upon a brief sentence, repeated as frequently as the flow of the melody requires; because this brief sentence gains whatever condition of feeling may be the consequence of the dramatic action. They have always distinguished this from the recitative, portraying the current of emotion that leads up to the moment of reflection, in which the words are never or rarely repeated. Thus this custom, however, is much narrowed by the [illegible] of our own time, conspicuously by [illegible] and [illegible] ... than [illegible] ... cannot be expressed ... [illegible] ... expressed by [illegible] ... in many cases [illegible]. I not [illegible] ... [illegible] ... between and before them were, [illegible] ... the repetition of phrases ... the purpose of showing that the [illegible] ... [illegible] ... of the poem ... [illegible] ... on this account, few phrases run with [illegible]. The [illegible] to the [illegible] of the work ... the Wedding-Guest and the Mariner [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... the new-comer and experienced ... which is [illegible] to enable a [illegible] ... to the [illegible] ... and the [illegible] ... I may [illegible] from Mr Barnett [illegible] ... and [illegible] his [illegible] ... principles of [illegible] ... [illegible] ... regard to the [illegible] ... conviction that the [illegible] ... has been, [illegible] ... by words. Mr Barnett however appears to have confounded general principles with particular forms, which, when they are mere forms, are [illegible] conventional ... the songs of Mendelssohn (those published by him [illegible]) ... whose production may [illegible] ... the whole ... of the [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... construction, combined with [illegible] regard for the principles on which these forms are [illegible] ... of the [illegible] ... this series, will show a glance the [illegible] ... with the [illegible] ... of the writer. Mr Barnett has [illegible] ... which much [illegible] by the [illegible] ... of an [illegible] ... [illegible] ... constructive measure ... [illegible] ... comprehensible, the [illegible] ... [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... of [illegible] ... from the [illegible] ... The [illegible] ... Barnett's [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... of the [illegible] ... northwards, where the [illegible] ... of [illegible] ... [illegible].

Among all that is charming and much that merits far higher commendation, it cannot be denied that there are some technical points of design and of [illegible] open to question. A work however ... of the present is to be [illegible] higher standard than the [illegible] ... of the [illegible] and it would be ... the purpose of [illegible] ... for [illegible] ... to [illegible] ... of [illegible] ... from such [illegible] of musical [illegible] ... would [illegible] ... importance in proportion to the [illegible] ... of the Cantata, and in proportion as he ... Beethoven's Biographers.

We notice occasionally, in the American and English press, paragraphs, in which the Volumes (respectively) of Thayer's and Nohl's Beethoven —covering substantially the same part of the master's life—are placed upon a level, as repositories of the facts of the same period. Indeed one from an English periodical, unfortunately admitted into our columns (Journal of Nov. 9) leaves the reader to infer that in that regard Nohl's book even deserves the preference. How far this is the case with the first volume, the reader may decide with some degree of confidence upon perusing the review of Nohl's Vol. I from the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung (the most important German musical journal)—a translation of which we begin in the number. Of the notes, those followed by a B are given in the original; the others are added by the translator. As to the mere quantity of new facts, and their due chronological arrangement, the comparison will go far in favor of Thayer's book which however covers but a small portion of the period embraced in the recently published volume of Nohl—which, we have reason to think, has gained somewhat from the necessity with which the first was criticised by all the competent German authorities.

Music in Boston

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The 5th, on Thursday afternoon Jan. 16, was one of the most fully attended and most interesting, to judge from the faces and the silence of the audience—by far the best sign—rather than from the clapping of hands. Silence is sometimes put the opposite to "apathy." A preference for purely instrumental programmes has manifestly grown upon the audience in these concerts; accordingly the feast again consisted of a grand Symphony, two Overtures and a Concerto, thus:

Overture to "Fierrabras"	Schubert
Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1, in C major, Op. 15, (first time)	Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Largo—Allegro scherzando. (Cadenzas by Moscheles.)
Overture to "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
Symphony in C major	Schubert
Introduction and Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Finale.

Schubert was here represented in his best and especially. But it seems hard that his splendid Overture to Fierrabras shall never get here a hearing. Twice before heard in Boston, in which alone one can come into true relation with such music, been disturbed. One late comer than ever, the belated people would keep bustling into the seats until the very end of it, spoiling the pleasure of the rest. It is too fine a work to be allowed to go unappreciated. Tasking the full force of the modern orchestra, it does not deal in mere sonority, covering paucity or commonness of ideas by imposing brilliancy and fulness of instrumentation. It is thoroughly a musical full of unexpected, ... with which the whole work is instinct. The long tremolo crescendo with which it opens (seen to a charm by the unusually large mass of strings,) in the dark E minor key, is as stirring as the opening of Macbeth. A rich burst of four horns follows; but then how sad a theme is taken up, still by the horn. In short, panting phrases, which, short and simple as it is, is deeply, subtly wrought into the whole texture of the overture, giving way now and then to a fortissimo Allegro, which for vigor and intensity is hardly to be matched even by those in Weber's Overtures. The wonderful felicity and finesse with which each pregnant bit of theme comes back again and again, in other keys, in other groups of instruments, still with fresh interest and still the same, shows the imaginative, plastic art of a great, master, true tone-poet. This young man "has the divine spark in him," said dear Beethoven looking over some of his so late composed ones.—Those who did then resolutely shut up out disturbance, were deeply moved by the Fierrabras Overture.

A good thing to compare with it, and form its pendant on the other side of the Concerto, though far from equal to it only more taking at the very first apprehension, was Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas (C minor). Also very dramatic, and not a little out of the usual vein of Mendelssohn. It brings in a speaking sort of theme, a short broken phrase, the bassoon being all of spokesman; but this is not deeply wrought into the whole texture, as in the Schubert work; the themes succeed each other more in the free and simple way, then traces as open melody exposed to ears that have no taste of the loss of being themselves a polyphonous involution (a unusual variety in unity). But it is a fresh, original absorbing overture, never dull and never trivial.

We must speak of that day's performance of the great Schubert Symphony in C as perhaps the highest achievement in symphonic interpretation thus far of a Boston orchestra. A thousand or two people that day quite forgot the dread of a long Symphony and after listening to the four acts of the four long movements, each more glorious and uplifting than the last, could with a sigh of satisfaction echo Schumann's "heavenly length." Surely all but a used of it a whole we copied last time from the Crystal Palace programme, is more than justified in each fine hearing that we get of it, and this was a fine hearing. For masculine and a flight of inspirations lofty, long and glorious, we can look to no other Instrumental work except the greatest of Beethoven's. This is pure creative musical genius, in its most earnest effort, with consummate mastery of largest means. "Glorious" is the word for such a Symphony; you mount Jove's eagle for a flight above the clouds as soon as you submit yourself to its enchantments. "Perpetual repetitions" authors of the same passages and phrases? Yes, as there is in the motion of strong wings, as say of chariot wheels that bore the prophet up. But none the less, perpetual variety exquisite contrasts and surprises, new colors marvellously diffused on everything by some subtle magic of models one of instrumental combination. Think of that opening recitative the soft fairy horn! then the two bold contrasted, yet related, of the two main themes of the Allegro: the first so bold adventurous, heaven-storming, ascending the air for the sublime flight,—the second gay and jubilant happy songs and harps ... careering through the air from the elated voyagers,—both richly mingled with a wealth of charming accessory thoughts. Then the thoughtful solemn march of the Andante con Moto,—a movement feeling upon its own deep, delicious thought, so that its strength is still "renewed like the eagle's." Once, midway in the march, a reverie or trance seems to come over the movement,—we insist (in the words of the article above alluded to), "that wonderfully touching passage, where the horn sounds faintly note after note, while the rest of the orchestra is all hushed and still, as if an angel had descended into the room and were gliding about among the instruments." Then the rousing unison of the strings as the Scherzo bids you shake off dreamy thoughts and soar again, and the quaint ... be aware of the piping reeds and listen now a singing chant, mixing in a human barbaric fondness, soon passing in later quite new colors softly falling as the bassoon or to gather some sweet little majestic flower of a fresh musical fancy. Then the Trio, with its sumptuous pomp of buoyant and triumphant rhythm! But grandest of all, say we too, is the finale, with its stupendous energy, when it has acquired full swing after the smart challenge of the opening subject answered by the answering triplets of the violins with all the reeds accompanying in thirds, as if all the rainbow-winded spirits of the air came hovering round. As it goes on we hardly wonder that the author of the "legend" (Crystal Palace programme) should have dreamed of Phaeton and the Chariot of the Sun. Was there ever a bolder or a more inspiring idea (except the marble tread of Mozart's statue of which they must have reminded more than one) than those tremendous thumps in unison upon the key note of the Symphony which startle you at intervals toward the end.

The newspapers are continually announcing "the musical event of the season"—meaning commonly for the time being, any cheap sensation that is loudly advertised. Of course we do not take them seriously; but seriously speaking what musical "event" can one ... convert in the experience of all the music that fills that can be considered quite so rare and so significant as such a listening to such a performance as we had that Thursday of such a work as Schubert's Symphony in C? Mr. Zerrahn may be proud of his orchestra and of his work that day.

Beethoven's Concerto in C, the earliest of the five, though hitherto entirely passed over in favor of the greater ones, fully justified Mr. LANG's choice. It is of a lighter genial effect than the last three, neither of such deep and spiritual poetry as the one in G nor at all of the great heroic fire of the one in E flat. But we think it was found more interesting than the No. 2 in B flat, which we heard last year, and it is full of charming invention, fresh and well-developed thoughts, and of the young Beethoven power. It is very much in the vein and in the style, especially the Largo, of some of the early Sonatas. And the three movements are very individual in character. Nothing could open more amply than the orchestra does in the introduction, and the themes for treatment spring up most naturally in the piano-forte and orchestra lend equal ... narration now by turns and now together and the whole development is graceful, then symmetrical, delightful. In the piano part there is no great striving after brilliant effects or running intricate embellishment. The ornaments are simple, neat and graceful. There was abundant opportunity for the player to show his good taste, the sum of reserved power, the subjection of Joft, thoroughly practiced hands to expression, all which Mr. Lang assuredly did show. And no less in the religious rich repose of the slow movement and in the piquant, sportive Rondo of the finale. It was a most smart and happy rendering of a charming composition with which all were glad to have made acquaintance. To speak of improvement in so accomplished a master of the instrument as Mr. Lang has been for years, would seem superfluous almost; yet we must note with pleasure the more ease and subdued force which he now shows in the strong passages, without any sacrifice of contrast or emphatic point.

The programme of this week (of which we shall speak in our next number) is of quite a different character, light or yet hardly less interesting. Instead of a great Schubert Symphony the smaller ones in the old familiar forms, a pair of Mozart and Haydn,—the latter the one in G which played so in the third concert; the Mozart is the No. 1 in D without Minuet. The Overtures Beethoven's Coriolanus and Mendelssohn's Melusina. And Mr. OTTO DRESEL, yielding to the solicitation of the whole Committee, plays the Pianoforte Concerto of Mendelssohn.

The seventh concert will come on Thursday, Feb. 13, and will consist of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the Overture to "Anacreon" by Cherubini, Weber's Jubilee Overture, and the E minor Concerto of Chopin played by Mr. HUGO LEONHARD.

The plan of the eighth and last Concert is not settled. The idea of repeating the Choral Symphony is abandoned partly for want of time, leaving it to be given with greater means, in the Handel and Haydn Society's Festival next May. Perhaps Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" for piano, orchestra and chorus, which seems to contain the first germ of the Symphony, will be performed; with perhaps a portion of the Schubert Symphony (for which there is much call), or else the Eroica; and another feature would be the "Meeresstille" Overture.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS. Winter has not smiled on the Orchestral Union thus far; snow and cold have ruled this season. But the concerts have been excellent, both in the choice of the lighter music and, if perchance in no the same place, with the same clarity of execution, must yet draw crowds to the Music Hall. Last week they gave the first Symphony by Gade (C minor); the Overture to Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; and the pretty one to La bouche by Auber; a lovely new Strauss Waltz (op. 2[illegible]) called "Neueste Leben" (Latest Life); Strong's crumbling again; and Mr. SCHULTZE, whom it is pleasant to see in his old place at the head of the violins, played a Violin Solo, "Fantasie," by Molique.

This week's concert was particularly good, in matter and in execution. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture was very delicately rendered; and the beautiful E-flat Symphony of Mozart, with its stately Introduction to working Minuet and Trio, its continual sprinkling of fresh charms through all the movements, surely all forgot the snow-clad roads without. The sweet, solemn music of the Bridal Procession in Wagner's Lohengrin, which somewhat overcrowded and crowded in the harmony, was heard with interest. The Favorite Waltz was one of the most exhilarating of the tribe and was called "Village Swallows." Mr. HEIMENDAHL gave a good Cornet rendering of a popular German ballad "How fair thou art." The concert ended with the Overture to Yelva by Reissiger. The bassoon and clarinet parts, on which Mozart seems to depend, made themselves very fascinating in the Symphony.

Next Wednesday we hope the Union will have a crowded hall.

GIRLS' HIGH AND NORMAL SCHOOL. We spent a most interesting hour last Saturday in this school in Mason Street,—the fine flower and completion of our public school system. It was a musical exercise—a concert in fact—arranged by Mr. EICHBERG, who has been their teacher for the past year, for the sake of the Board and friends of the pupils, and for the pleasure of some of the School Committee and a few invited guests. The young ladies, forty or five hundred we should think, made the whole room a sense of beaming intelligence and beauty. There was a set programme, in which three-part choruses by Abt, Rossini, &c., beautifully sung by the fresh maiden voices, alternated with a choice of classical Chamber music. There were the Andante and Variations from Beethoven's string Quartet, op. 18, No. 5, played artistically by Messrs. Eichberg, Ford, and the brothers H. and A. Suck. Nothing could enhance the inevitable charm of the music more than to see the sweet seriousness of thought in all those young faces. The Allegro and Adagio from Beethoven's Violin Sonata in F were finely played by Mr. Eichberg and Mr. Sharland, who's singing teacher in the Grammar Schools, whom we may compliment upon the confidence he has so quietly acquired as a pianist. A "Song without Words" by Mr. Eichberg, really beautiful, was played by himself (violin) and Mr. The, or to the reed organ; followed by an arrangement for violin, organ and piano of the Andante in Beethoven's E-flat Quintet. Mr. Sharland played some of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, then by a good "Neapolitan March" by Mr. Eichberg, he merrily announced by him as "by a German composer of the last century."

All these fine things found eager audition. Truly of classical Chamber music in a free school! Is not this a new idea? And it is not an admirable one! This is bringing models of pure art, the masterpieces of music, home to every pupil in the advanced classes, and is like surrounding their school room with the immortal works of Raphael and Titian. Refining influence, a higher taste, must come from it. Art in its higher mode a quickening here, at the same time that, beginning at the other end, in humble rudiments, they are taught to read simple music and to sing. A brief examination by the teacher occupied a pause in the concert, and in few unexpected questions showed the girls to be clear in the rudiments about intervals, major and minor scales, &c.; and that they had been successfully taught to identify the notes of short musical phrases played to them, and to write them for the teacher to write upon the blackboard.

DEATH OF MORITZ HAUPTMANN. Another of the foremost musical characters of our time has passed away. Not alone teacher, loved and revered by all the Leipzig musicians (of whom we have not a few here in America), he was then the occupant of old Sebastian Bach's place as "Cantor" at the Thomasschule and professor at the Conservatorium, died in Leipzig after a somewhat lengthy illness, on the third of January. Only last October they were celebrating his 75th birthday and his 25th year "Jubilee" as Cantor with feast and music worthy those his eminent positions. A brief notice in the Neue Zeitschrift tells us:

"Hauptmann was born in Dresden, Oct. 13, 1792. His father, superintendent of the board of works there, seeing the boy's strong tendency for music, had him at an early age instructed in the violin, the piano and in harmony, although intending him to be an architect. He finally came in to the favorable reception of some of his son's attempts at composition; he yielded to his wish and sent him for more earnest musical studies to Spohr in Gotha. A year later 1812 he got an appointment as violinist in the royal chapel in Dresden. In 1813 he took leave of absence to go and study half a year in Vienna, whither Spohr had gone as theatre conductor. In Dresden he lived till 1815, and in that time wrote a Mass in G minor (now lost) and other church pieces, many songs, a string Quartet, a Violin Sonata, occasional Cantatas, Hymns, &c. In 1815 he went as music teacher with the family of Prince Repnin to Poltava, where he found time to pursue his studies in counterpoint, mathematics and natural sciences, and to compose various compositions, especially his opera Mathilde. In 1820 he returned to Dresden, where he lived a private musician till 1822, and composed his early Quartet op. 7, and his two Masses in F minor. Then he was called as violinist in the Court orchestra in Cassel, in which position, cheered especially by Spohr, he remained for twenty years, exercising a great influence as a theoretic teacher and creating several of his principal works, such as the Salve Regina and the G minor Mass. His opera 'Mathilde' was repeatedly brought out there with success. In 1841 he married Susette Hummel, daughter of the Director of the Academy there.

In 1842 he was called to Leipzig as Cantor and Music Director of the Thomas Church, and in 1843 he became a teacher in the newly founded Conservatorium.—The good he has done there for a quarter of a century is too well known to need more words at present.

MR. PAINE'S MASS.—It is now pretty certain that we shall soon have an opportunity to hear this very elaborate and meritorious composition of our young countryman,—a Mass on the largest scale—too large to be available in the Church service,—for full chorus, orchestra and solo. It was warmly received last summer in Berlin; and now the friends of Mr. Paine, including the President and Professors at Cambridge and many of the most musical citizens of Boston, have resolved that the heavy pecuniary risk be at so shall be no bar to so having a fair hearing here at home. We take pleasure in publishing the following note:

Boston, Dec. 6, 1867.—J. K. Paine, Esq.—Dear Sir,—We have heard, with much pleasure, of the appreciation with which your Mass was received by the severely critical audience at the Berlin Sing-Akademie. In the hope that your efforts in a noble and difficult region of art may be vindicated and well appreciated by your own townspeople, we would suggest that you take measures for the production of your composition in Boston the coming season. Assuring you of our hearty cooperation in any way in which we can be helpful. Thomas Hill, your Cheerfully. Benjamin Peirce, Thomas Hill, E. N. Agassiz, Asa Gray, F. H. Peirce, H. W. Longfellow, J. R. Lowell, R. W. Emerson, J. M. Forbes, Thomas G. Appleton, J. S. Dwight, Samuel Jennison, O. W. Holmes, [illegible].

Mr. Paine having accepted this invitation and subscriptions having come in liberally and eagerly, the Concert will be given on Easter Sunday Evening (April 12) in the Boston Music Hall, with a Full Chorus from the Handel and Haydn Society, the Orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association, and the best Solo talent. The price of tickets, with reserved seats, is One Dollar each. Those, whom the subscription paper has not reached, will find Mr. Peck, at the Music Hall, heartily ready to aid them in picking out good seats.

A COMPLIMENT WORTH HAVING.—The following has already been the rounds of the newspapers, yet our musical record would not be complete without it.

THE ABBÉ LISZT AND THE MESSRS. CHICKERING. —The Abbé Liszt, the greatest of European pianists, has just addressed to the Messrs. Chickering the following bewing hence the only testimonial in favor of a pianoforte maker which he has ever given in Europe or America.

[TRANSLATION.]

ROME, Dec. 26, 1867.

"Messrs. Chickering: It is very agreeable to me to add my name to the concert of praises of which your pianos are the object.

To be just I must declare them perfect, and perfectissimes (superlatively perfect).

There is no quality which is foreign to them. Your instruments possess in the supreme degree nobility and power of tone, elasticity and security of touch harmony, brilliancy, solidity, charms and prestige, and thus offer a harmonious ensemble of perfections to the exclusion of all defects.

Pianists of the most pretensions will find reasons [illegible] from them agreeable [illegible] in favor of [illegible] which truly do honor to the art of the construction of instruments—the role of the critic is as simple as that of the public: the one has but to applaud these conscientiously and with entire satisfaction, and the other but to procure them in the same manner.

In congratulating you sincerely upon the great and decisive success obtained at the Exposition at Paris I am pleased in anticipation happy continuance of the same in all places where your pianos will be heard and I beg that you accept, gentlemen, the expression of my most distinguished sentiments of esteem and consideration."

(Signed) F. LISZT.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—This association, which completed the thirtieth year of its social life yesterday, met in its new and pleasant library room No. 180 Tremont street, last evening, for the first time to elect officers and transact the ordinary business of the annual meeting. Mr. Henry W. Pickering, the president, occupied the chair. The record of the last meeting was read by the recording secretary Mr. Henry Ware. Mr. John S. Dwight read the report of the directors, which was a document of considerable length and great interest, presenting an encouraging view of the condition of the association and offering several valuable suggestions for increasing still further its efficiency and usefulness. The report of the treasurer Mr. Samuel L. Thorndike, showed that the expense of fitting up the new room had necessarily encroached somewhat upon the income of the society fund and expressed a belief that the fund could be restored by proper economy during the coming year. The librarian's report mentioned many valuable additions to the library during the past year. The old board of officers, consisting of the following gentlemen, was re-elected:

President Henry W. Pickering.
Vice President John S. Dwight.
Recording Secretary Henry Ware.
Corresponding Secretary Francis H. Underwood.
Treasurer Samuel L. Thorndike.
Directors at Large C. P. Curtis, B. J. Lang.

The association now numbers one hundred and ten active and some honorary members. The annual supper will take place at the rooms of Mr. J. B. Smith, caterer in Hollis street, next Monday evening.—Advertiser Jan. 31.

NEW YORK, JAN. 30.—On Saturday evening Jan. 11th, at Irving Hall occurred the second of Messrs. Mason and Thomas's soirees of chamber music. Mr. Mason was the pianist and will alternate, during the season, with Mr. Mills at these concerts. The audience was about as large as on the former occasion and we had the appended programme:—

Quartet, Andante. Op. 1	Volkmann.
Trio in B flat. Op. 99 Piano	Schubert.
Quartet, Eminor. Op. 59 No. 2	Beethoven.

Of the Volkmann Quartet it may be remarked that one ought to hear it—or any other new work—several times before giving a decided and absolute opinion: but it is safe to say that this Quartet seemed to lack unity and force and is of unequal merit. For instance the third movement, an extremely neat Presto with a beautiful pizzicati Trio, has nothing in common with the other movements: it would appear that no sustained purpose underlies the whole.

The Schubert Trio is too well known to musicians to need many words: the Andante—practically a song without words—taken finely in a solo by the 'cello with piano accompaniment, is calculated to delight even those whose appreciation of advanced art is very small. In rondo, the essence of melody

Mr. Mason played the piano in his usual polished, refined and gentlemanly style: but why will he not give us a little more fire and passion? That is just the one thing needful to make his playing very enjoyable.

The effect of the Beethoven Quartet, as well as that of the other pieces, was somewhat marred by the fact that the 'cello was not in accord with the other instruments: this was, of course, painful.

Why would it not be well for Messrs. M. and T. to adopt analytical programmes? At the Monday Popular Concerts and at the Musical Union (London) pamphlet programmes are given containing—often—the sketch of the composer of each work performed and also the themes from the work itself: these little books are very attractive and interesting and find a ready sale at the concerts I have mentioned—from one reason: firstly because of their intrinsic excellence and secondly because one can get no other programme: they are accessible by one only at a concert. I have one in which there are some twenty pages devoted to Beethoven's Sonata Op. 106 and to Madame Arabella Goddard's performance of the same.

The next Soirée will be given on Saturday evening, February 7th, when the Beethoven Piano Trio in B flat Op. 97 will be the principal attraction.

JAN 27.—On Saturday Evening, Jan. 25th, occurred the 3d Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert. The orchestra numbered [illegible]; Mme Ackermann (soprano) Mr G. F. Hall (bassoon), Messrs. Schmitz and Lotze (French horns) and F. Letsch (trombone) were the soloists. I quote such portions of the programme as are worthy of notice:—

1. Symphony No. 3, Op. 56. A minor	Mendelssohn.
2. Trio, 2 horns, 2 horns and trombone	Bergmann.
3. Poème Symphonique. "The Ideal"	Liszt.

The "Italian" Symphony—as it is termed—was written in 1833, and although called No. 4 is really No. 3, antedating the "Scotch" (No. 3) by some two years, and was not published until after the author's death. It is of course a charming work: the freshness and grace of the opening movement, the quaint tone and beautiful sadness of the Andante, (I once heard this movement played by Pasdeloup's orchestra in Paris and it was enthusiastically encored), the graceful movement of the Minuetto with its warm horn-suggestive bass Trio, and the wild rush and hurry of the Saltarello presto,—all form a whole of wonderful variety, completeness and unity. It was well played: had the orchestra been larger the effect had been finer for a little thinness was now clearly noticeable. A fine analysis (by J. S. D.) of the Symphony was printed upon the programme.

The Trio by Bergmann for two French horns and trombone is a very pleasing composition: while not surprisingly original it is melodious and attractive and some of the harmonic changes are very new: the transition of the theme from the original key into G-major has a pleasing effect. It was deservedly encored.

Mme. Ackermann sang an Aria from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro. She seems to possess a very fair voice and a sufficiently good memory to sing without score: unfortunately she sang fearfully sharp and there was at times a quarter of a tone between her voice and the orchestra. I noticed a printed notice at the foot of the programme, to this effect:—"The vocalist for each of the remaining concerts will be the best available." I am to infer—I suppose—that good singers refuse to cross the Fulton Ferry.

The "Ideal" poem performed at the Symphony Soirée two weeks ago, was inflicted upon the patient Brooklynites, who bore the infliction with noble fortitude and a cheerful resignation pleasant to behold.

At the next concert the attractions will be Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Mozart's C F Concerto in D minor to be played by Richard Hoffman.
